The Hymns stand as a particular example of a very old genre that survived throughout antiquity. A hymn is essentially a poem sung in praise of a god, often with a request or prayer. The word “hymn” can be used as a generic term, or to designate a specific genre, such as Pindar’s hymns. Over time, a wide variety developed. A hymn might contain narrative, long or short, such as some of the Homeric hymns. A hymn might have cultic function, such as the Kretan hymn found at Palaikastro that invokes Zeus as the greatest kouros (fourth century BC, possibly older). A hymn can be purely lyrical, such as those of Mesomedes (mid-second century AD), some of whose works survive with musical notation. We find hymns as dedications, inscribed on pillars or walls, such as the four hymns by Isidoros of the Fayum (88–80 BC). Some scraps of poetry found in the magical papyri, often metrically faulty, have been titled “hymns” by scholars, but one should regard the reconstructed versions by the editor of the papyri, Karl Preisendanz, with caution. Philosophers wrote hymns, too, such as the Stoic Kleantes’ Hymn to Zeus (early- to mid-third century BC) and the surviving group by the Neoplatonist Proclus

(fifth century ^{AD}). Prose was also a vehicle for hymns. The story of Atlantis that Kritias tells is prefaced with a thanks to Sokrates and also noted as a kind of hymn in honor of Athene, whose festival, the Panathenaia, was taking place (Plato Timaios 21a). A number of prose hymns were written by Aelius Aristides (mid-second century ^{AD}). Hymns can also be embedded in other works. In Apuleius' Metamorphoses, Lucius has had it with being a literal ass, and, after bathing himself seven times in a river (seven being a holy number according to Pythagoras), he invokes Isis the moon goddess in hymnic style (11.2). Finally, Ovid, as one would expect, plays with the genre when he has his lovesick Apollon call out to the fleeing Daphne the identity of her pursuer in terms that are typical of the genre: a list of favorite cult sites and the wide powers of the divinity addressed (Metamorphoses 1.515–524). The joke is that it is the god himself, not the petitioner, who utters the hymn; the inversion is both a mocking and serious testament to the power of love.⁸

Our composer has freely drawn on this venerable tradition. In addition to literature and religion, philosophy, too, has made its mark, though it is difficult to adduce parallels with certainty. Stoicism seems to have been particularly influential. Such hymns as those to Ether, the Stars, Physis, Boreas, Zephyros, Notos, being personifications of natural phenomena, may point to Stoic influence. So may the invocation of Pronoia (Providence) in the proemic piece (line 30). The prominence of the fiery element as found, e.g., in hymns 5.4 and 66.4–5 would further appear to reflect Stoic belief. Yet it could be argued for some of these (and others) that the deciding influence was from the Pre-Socratics (e.g., Empedokles, Herakleitos), Pythagoreanism, and even Neoplatonism or Neopythagoreanism. There is so much fusion of different philosophical ideas in this collection that the only thing that can be said of them in this regard is that they represent a confluence and a monument to the syncretism that characterized religion in general during the Hellenistic and especially Imperial era. Their composer was not interested in creating a religious or philosophical system. The initiates wanted to protect their lives and save their souls. And to this end they needed the good will of every god and every daimōn. The texts that they used in their rites are interesting not so much as poetry but as repositories of religious ideas, frequently borrowed from a wide range of older literature and expressed by a means peculiar to a category of the hymnic genre. Careful linguistic study of the provenance of many of the epithets in the hymns—especially the hapax legomena—may help us answer some of the vexing questions that surround them.

Like all religions, Orphism had its profound religious beliefs and taboos. The animal sacrifice has a very special place in Greek religion. Those who participate are witnesses to the proper execution of the ritual that involves the sacrificial meal, always performed as an affirmation of shared religious beliefs. It is no accident that Orphism preached respect for animal life and abstention from eating the flesh of animals. Belief in the transmigration of souls, originally a Pythagorean one, made this prohibition necessary. For the Orphics, purification from guilt and pollution was a spiritual necessity, especially since they believed that punishment for wrongs committed in this world was inevitable. If it did not take place in a man's lifetime, it would certainly happen in the subsequent one. The things from which an Orphic had to abstain threatened the purity of his soul with miasma, pollution. Purification, katharsis, did not simply free the soul from impurity but also protected a person from punishment and gave him the hope of eternal life in Elysium. Those who reached the underworld and its various punishments, all borrowed from Greek mythology, stayed there. They were then the unredeemed, doomed to be eternally deprived of the transmigration of their soul and thus the chance for redemption.⁹

The supreme god of Orphism was Dionysos, and at the center of this religious faith was a cosmogony different from the one we learn from Hesiod's Theogony. Orphism preached the simple idea that the world was born from an egg. This primordial egg hatched out the first god, Eros, who was later named Protogonos and Phanes and who was said to be both male and female. He then created the world. The Hesiodic succession of Sky, Kronos, and Zeus was retained. Appended to this was the story of the death of Dionysos at the hands of the Titans, who tore him to pieces and devoured him, and Dionysos' eventual rebirth.¹⁰ This significant theme was reenacted by the ecstatic worshippers of Dionysos. Central to Orphism is the idea that the body is evil and the soul is divine. In fact, the body is a tomb which serves as a prison for the spiritual entity we call the soul. The material part of man, the body, is the evil inheritance of the Titans. The spiritual part, the soul, comes from Dionysos, an immortal god and the son of Zeus. It is obvious that the Homeric concept of the living body as the man himself and of the soul as a pale lifeless shadow of him is completely inverted in Orphism.

The relation of Orpheus to Dionysus is peculiar. Both are connected with Thrace. Dionysos is a god of transitions.¹¹ Orpheus obviously could cross the boundaries of culture into nature and back. He descended into the underworld to recover his beloved Eurydike and came back alive. The meaning of this myth is twofold. Heavenly song can conquer death and so can devotion to the beloved. But Eurydike, "wide justice," remains in the world below, desired but tantalizingly beyond the reach of the living. The mythic prophet Orpheus dies a strange death; he is torn to pieces by Thracian maenads. This death is analogous to the one Dionysos himself suffered. Clearly the practice of Dionysian orgies, of tearing wild beasts into pieces and devouring their limbs, is a ritual connected with the tragic dismemberment of Orpheus. Maenadic women also in a state of ecstatic frenzy killed Pentheus, king of Thebes. In so many ways, Pentheus in the story that is so powerfully told by Euripides in the Bacchae is the surrogate victim. Pentheus dies so that Dionysus may live on forever.

Bits and pieces of Orphism are evident throughout the collection, but there is very little about Orphic theogony, anthropogony, or eschatology. To be sure Protogonos is equated with Phanes and is addressed as “born of the egg, delighting in his golden wings” (hymn 6.2). Orphic anthropogony is alluded to in the hymn to the Titans (hymn 37.4–6): “From you are descended all toiling mortals, / the brood of the sea and of the land, then the brood of the birds, / of all generations of the world born of you.” Kronos and Time (Greek khronos) are characteristically equated at hymn 13.5 where Kronos is called “begetter of time.” And certainly the phrase “dreadful Necessity governs all things” (hymn 3.11) must have been pregnant with meaning for the initiate, since Necessity mated with Time to give birth to Ether, Khaos, and Erebos. There is no hint anywhere of animal sacrifices and of meat eating, even if Dionysos himself is addressed as “ōmadios” (“taker of raw flesh”). This we may interpret as a concession to the non-Orphic side of the god and as part of the comprehensiveness of poems that are essentially conjuring formulae. Interestingly enough, it seems to be the persistent Orphic aversion to the crime of ōmophagia (eating of raw flesh and thus also the dismemberment of Dionysos) that accounts for its suppression in the hymn to the Titans (hymn 37). Also Orphic, but not uniquely Orphic, is the sentiment expressed in the varieties of the concluding formula that the addressee grant a good end to a life, since a good life on earth attended by the proper rites of initiation and purification constitutes some sort of guarantee of rewards, or at least of escape from punishment in the afterlife. The idea held by the Orphics that the body was a prison for the soul is expressed in the very last hymn (hymn 87.3–4).¹² Referring as it does to a very central and basic belief, it serves as an unmistakably Orphic capstone of an edifice to which other religions and philosophical systems made generous contributions.

The question of Orphic rituals is a tantalizing one. Poems such as the Rhapsodies, Argonautika, and Lithika were written in late antiquity. Falsely attributed to Orpheus, they are a fantasy literature whose connection with Orphism ranges from non-existent to tenuous. For Pindar, glorious Orpheus is the father of songs (Pythian Odes 4.176–177). Immortality is conferred by lofty song. No Orphic ritual can emerge from the musings of this most aristocratic Greek poet. The fascination with the Bacchic gold tablets is justifiably enormous. Yet these fabulous fragments do not amount to a text that can help us reconstruct even one Orphic ritual. Immortality of the soul is the key Orphic belief in them. This central Orphic belief, I think, is the dominant theme of the Homeric Hymn to Demeter, composed sometime in the seventh century BC, whose origins specialists in Greek religion trace to an agricultural cult, specifically a fertility ritual. Caution must be exercised here. Syncretism and fusion must not be forgotten. Demeter dips Demophoön into fire to grant him immortality. Demeter's abducted daughter, Persephone, and her journey to Hades and back into the upper world and into life is a great allegory for death and resurrection and hence a great allegory for immortality. There is frequent mention of ritual in connection with Orphism. Ancient references to Orphism and the Orphics are not very helpful in this regard. The beautiful Orphic cosmogony in the Birds of Aristophanes (685–704) teaches us ideas about the origin of the world. There is nothing in it as to what one should or should not do. There are many references to Orpheus and his followers in Plato, especially in the Republic. They are mostly philosophical speculations about aspects of human eschatology. Orphism inspired Pythagoras to create a rich type of theology that was founded on practice. Various details of the way his followers lived have more to do with a holistic way of life and less with the performance of certain rituals.

The cult of Dionysos was the most widespread in the Hellenized world. Religious associations that honored both Orpheus and Dionysos seem to have existed everywhere, and some rituals were called both Orphic and Dionysian. It seems quite clear from the collection itself that the Hymns were used by such a religious association (thiasos) of people who called themselves mustai, mustipoloi, or orgiophantai (mystic initiates) and who through prayer (eukhē), libation (loibē), sacrifice (thusia), and, presumably, secret ceremonies (orgia, teletai) invoked a series of divinities and asked for their presence or for the gift of some blessing, such as wealth, peace, health, and not infrequently for a blameless end to a good life. These associations had a definite hierarchy. One of the most prominent officiates was the boukolos, the oxherd. This title occurs only twice in the Orphic Hymns: at hymn 1.10 and hymn 31.7. It is reasonable to assume that the underlying idea was that of the mediator who would help the initiates into a Dionysian transformation. And it is equally reasonable to assume that a newly founded thiasos commissioned one or more able poets to provide them with religious poetry that should be as authentic and comprehensive as possible.

Most of the Hymns are addressed to divinities and concepts of the Hellenistic pantheon and its train of lesser divine or semi-divine figures. Such personified abstractions as Dike, Justice, and Nomos are so old and so common to various schools of Greek philosophical and religious thought as not to be especially Orphic. The only hymn to a god of Near Eastern origin is the one to Adonis. Three hymns are dedicated to Anatolian goddesses (Mise, Hipta, Melinoe), and the Anatolian moon god Men is mentioned in the opening address to Mousaios. The Orphic sympathies of the collection are nowhere more evident than in the number and fervor of individual pieces addressed to Dionysos. There are seven such hymns (possibly nine, if Mise and Korybas are viewed as alternate manifestations of Dionysos), while Zeus has only three that are specifically addressed to him. Dionysos is also frequently invoked or alluded to in many other hymns, and his characteristic epithets seem to have been so infectious and to have assumed such universal significance as to seriously have encroached on the territory of other deities (see further hymn 30). This is as it should be, since Dionysos is the chief Orphic god.

The Hymns were devotional. Perfumes are frequently mentioned at the beginning of an individual hymn. Sometimes incense is mentioned specifically. Storax was imported from Phoenicia, while incense and myrrh came from the Arabian Peninsula. There seems to have been a certain protocol, and a preference for this or that kind of aromatic substance. Incense for Sun, frankincense for Nike, Apollon, Artemis, Dionysos Liknites, and several other divinities. Myrrh was offered to Protogonos, Poseidon, Nereus, and Leto; storax to Prothyraia, Kronos, Zeus, Proteus, Dionysos, Demeter, Chthonic Hermes, etc. Crocus was offered to Ether, opium to Sleep, and simply perfumes for Moon, Physis, Rhea, Athene, etc. As has been observed it is not easy to see the connection between specific aromatic substances and ritualistic practices. The variety might be attributed to the preference of persons who contributed the specific perfume or other material. Perhaps also the season of the year played a role. The distribution of perfumes and aromatic substances as they appear in our Hymns is such as to make it impossible for us to offer a rational explanation of any systematic organization.

It makes sense to think that the time of chanting these beautiful hymns was evening. For the initiates the day's labor was done and their worries could be set aside for the replenishment of their souls and for a respite from the mundane realities of the world. The Hymns are redolent with elements of mysticism. Indeed, the most pervasive characteristic of the Hymns, the ubiquitous epithet, might be, in part, an indication of a link between these hymns and the various remains of magic literature from the Hellenistic and Roman periods. Both direct a propitiatory address to a deity, accompanied by as comprehensive a list of its powers and properties as possible. The difference is that where the initiate seeks to persuade and cajole, the sorcerer seeks to bind and compel. There is no indication of accompanying music in the Hymns; however, it would be a mistake to latch onto this omission and think there was no music. First of all, the hymns themselves chanted properly constituted music. Perhaps that was enough for the initiates. Percussion instruments are mentioned, but their appearance might be due to their traditional associations. It is not easy to settle this question. Indic, Iranian, and Muslim cult music should not be excluded from consideration. After all, all these traditions use song as a bridge by which to unite heaven and earth. It should also be recalled that Orpheus was famous as a poet and a singer in addition to being renowned for his role as legendary founder of mystic rites.

We cannot recover the sounds and we do not know exactly what the mood was when the Hymns were sung. It might not be too much to suggest that people gathered in places that were sacred to them and that they did so as the softer colors of the evening were settling in on them. Candles provided gentle light. Wisps of incense smoke rose into the air. The magic of song, devotional, undulant, filled all of the sacred space and provoked the human heart to seek union with the divine.

We know the past only through the present. My [A.N.A.] reconstruction of an Orphic evening somewhere in Asia Minor is based on my experiences in the very mystical services of the Orthodox Church. There is no effort here to show an absolutely direct connection between the music of the Orthodox Church at present and the music of the Orphic Hymns. However, burning incense, keeping time with the swing of the censer, allowing sacred abandon to take over, and training the human voice to sink and then rise to God cannot have changed much throughout the ages, especially within a culture dominated by the same language and by the poetics of the same tradition.

On the whole, the style of the Hymns is homogenous and consistent. At the beginning of each hymn, the invocation, sometimes several divinities are summoned. Usually the name of the divinity or divinities is followed by an imperative, e.g., “Come! Hear!” Variations are to be found in the end of the prayer that asks for blessing, peace, prosperity, and wealth. There appears to be an order to the arrangement of most of the hymns. There are many male/female pairings throughout.¹³ The opening ones focus on the gods of the early generations and the theme of birth. Physis, Pan, and Herakles form a triad that sums up the creation of the physical world. Kronos and Rhea lead to Zeus. This begins a series of hymns where the traditional four elements of fire, air, water, and earth provide a coherent structure (hymns 15–27). Everything leads to the first hymn to Dionysos (hymn 30), his “birth” in a sense, which is strengthened by the appearance of divinities connected with the Orphic myth of his birth, death, and rebirth (hymns 31–38). A block of four hymns treats Eleusinian themes (hymns 40–43), and then comes the central cluster of hymns treating Dionysian cult (hymns 44–54). Aphrodite seems to preside over another series (hymns 55–68). A number of minor divinities, mostly in pairs and all of cultic importance, continue to another grouping of hymns associated with the elements (hymns 79–84). The three brothers Sleep, Dream, and Death end the collection. For details, see the introductions to the various individual hymns. The ring composition between birth at the beginning and death at the end is significant, and, if the Hymns were performed throughout the night, the dawning of a new day would have symbolically reflected the initiates’ hopes for a new life, one that promised the reward of eternal sunshine in the afterlife.

The Hymns are catalogues of religious epithets; such catalogues are intended to evoke the many powers of various divinities that are significant to a particular type of religious ideology and practice. The question is: what sources of ancient literature could have inspired and instructed the writers of the Hymns? We have already indicated magical incantations. Hesiod's catalogues of the daughters of Nereus and of the daughters of Okeanos are religious documents (Theogony 240–264 and 346–363). Homer's catalogue of the Nereids (Iliad 18.39–49) is a poetic construct, whose origin is religious. Hesiod's catalogues come from an old religious tradition. A deity must be invoked by words that refer to its attributes. In all likelihood the names of the daughters of Nereus and of the daughters of Okeanos are in fact epithets of the sea, at times older than even Hesiod, epithets that point to a Mother of the Waters. The sea has countless potencies, countless faces. The sea is both a great blessing and a treacherous element that is fraught with peril. The fact that great numbers of feminine divinities, essentially Daughters of the Sea, so frequently rise out of the sea is indicative of a deeply entrenched and old religious feeling that the sea is feminine and maternal, a huge counterpart to the masculine sky. Zeus is the Indo-European sky god. When people pray to him they also pray to the sky. In a tradition that predates the arrival of the Greeks in Greece, the sea and its in-dwelling divinities must have received more attention. The new religion that emerged introduced a male god whose dominion became preeminent. The lists of the daughters of Nereus and of Okeanos are prayer lists that come from an older religious order. Every one of these names has a meaning. The following example is taken from Hesiod's Theogony:

Proto, Eukrante, Amphitrite, and Sao, Eudora, Thetis, Galene, and Glauke, Kymothoe, Speio, Thoe, and lovely Halia,
Pasithea, Erato, and Eunike of the rosy arms. (243–46)

In an entirely literal translation:

First One, Mingling Gently, Water-Girt, and Savior,
Of the Good Gifts, Nurturing, Calm, and Grayish-Blue,
Of the Rushing Waves, Of the Numberless Caves, Swift, and lovely Sea, Seen By All, Lovely, and Fair Victory of the rosy arms.

The first few lines from the hymn to Nereus offers a good example for comparison (hymn 23.1–4):

The sea's foundations are your realm,
the abode of blue-black darkness,
you exult in the beauty
of your fifty daughters

as they dance amid the waves.

O Nereus, god of great renown,
O foundation of the sea, O end of the earth.

Even a casual look at these texts shows that they are religious texts that have one main thing in common: they are strings of nouns or epithets addressed to a divinity. A first approach to them leaves the reader puzzled as to their aesthetic, that is to say their poetic value, as well as to their effectiveness. However, here is a suggestion to readers of the Hesiodic catalogues as well as of the Orphic Hymns. They are asked to raise their voices as they read to a pleasant and imposing pitch as well as a clear and rhythmically punctuated vocalization of the lines. The tone of voice should strive to approximate dignified chant. Examples are to be found in many cultures. If all this is done, the religious character of the catalogues comes alive. They are no longer boring, and their invocational nature becomes entirely clear.

Every Greek is aware that the Virgin Mary is addressed by various names that have become sacred names. When I [A.N.A.] was working on the Hesiodic and Homeric lists, I decided to find out just how many names were used to address the Virgin Mary in the Hellenic world. I walked into a fine bookshop in Athens, and to my astonishment I discovered four beautiful volumes devoted to an explanation of the nearly five hundred names by which the Virgin Mary is addressed. This rich tradition may indeed ultimately go back even to pre-Hellenic times. The idea suggested here is that the veneration of the Virgin Mary has inherited aspects of the veneration of the sea and its divinities in prehistoric time. Here is just a sample of names which refer to the Virgin Mary: She of the Shoreline, She of the Sea Calm, the Far Heard One, She of the Seas, She of the Lakes, She of the Harbors, She of the Caves, She of the Rivers, She of Good Sailing. It should not be too difficult for anyone to hear in this sample echoes from Hesiod's catalogues of the Nereids. The astonishing number of epithets to the Virgin Mary in the Hellenic lands should not be regarded as some sort of random religious occurrence. Whether the attributes of a divinity are described by epithets, nouns, or periphrastic expressions makes no substantial difference. Relevant here from the Judaic tradition is Exodus 34:6–7 in which God Himself speaks of his own attributes. Muslims believe in one God whose divine qualities are known to them by ninety-nine (some say more) different names.¹⁴ Numbers 12–19 in Siddiqi read as follows: The Rightful / The Fashioner of Forms / The Ever-Forgiving / The All-Compelling Subduer / The Bestower / The Ever-Providing / The Opener / The Victory-Giver / The All-Knowing. However, these sacred names appear throughout the Koran and in this respect they do not resemble the Hesiodic catalogues or the Orphic Hymns. It is not so much the semantic content as the tone and cumulative effect of this religious utterance that opens possibilities of comparison with the Hymns. The emotionally powerful, indeed ecstatic and repetitive, invocation of Allah by the Whirling Dervishes of the Mevlevi Order dominates the performance of their rituals. The ninety-nine names of Allah are recited in their daily prayers and meditations. Such practices cannot be so very different from the concept and practice of unceasing prayer, such as the Jesus Prayer, so central to the monastic life of Mount Athos. The religious life of the Whirling Dervishes owes its origins to Rumi, a Persian poet who was also an Islamic jurist and theologian. His spiritual teachings took root in Konya, Turkey, not too far from ancient Pergamum, the city that may have produced the Orphic Hymns. If we call all this a chain of similar religious phenomena, even a coincidental one, we may come closer to understanding the power of clustering epithets for the creation of an emotional and physical crescendo that might raise our human spirit and help us approach the divine.

There are lines in the Orphic Hymns that remind one of the Vedic hymns. For example, from one to Soma: “King Soma, be gracious to us for welfare; / we are thy devotees: know that. / There arise might and wrath O Indu: / abandon us not according to the desire of our foe.”¹⁵ Is this not in both spirit and formulation similar to the way practically all the hymns of our collection end? Consider also: “So, O Agni, be easy of access to us / as a father to his son; abide with us / for our well-being.”¹⁶ Winthrop Sargeant in his translation of the Bhagavad gita has an impressive list of epithets used in this great poetic monument. Here is only a handful from his list: The Bristling-haired One, the Imperishable One, the Immeasurable One, Incomparable Glory, Conqueror of Wealth, the Blameless One.¹⁷ Among the Finnic peoples—the Saami—almost throughout the entire sub-Arctic zone the bear is a very sacred animal, rich in lore and ritual. The primordial bear, more often Father Bear, but then also Mother Bear in various creation stories, is of celestial origin. I [A.N.A.] feel very fortunate that in 1999 I became friends with Juha Pentikäinen, a great Finnish scholar who introduced me not only to a new perspective of the Kalevala but also to rare information on the centrality and importance of the bear in the religion and social life of the Finnic peoples. Several years later in 2006, I attended a conference titled “In the Footsteps of the Bear” in Pori, Finland. The proceedings of the conference were published in Pori in 2006 under the title In the Footsteps of the Bear.¹⁸ It was in Pori that I learned from Juha and some of his eminent international colleagues that nearly five hundred names are used in the vast sub-Arctic zone to address “the golden king of the forest.” Here are some examples: Forest Gold (or simply Darling), Forest Beauty, Graceful Mistress of the Forest.

The Orphic Hymns name specific pagan divinities, yet they appeal to universal spiritual powers. Some of them, like the hymns to Dream, Death, and Sleep, are in essence prayers that could be offered to God regardless of specific faith. All this makes excellent sense. The years between 300 and 500 AD were years of transition. It is very naïve to think that the Christian faith simply walked into towns, villages, and hamlets to be triumphantly received. It is much likelier that the new faith made accommodations with places and associations that cultivated the spiritual values. The new faith lacked the language of expressing the new spiritual values. The old faith, especially as expressed in documents like the Hymns, possessed a liturgical language ready to be used. Echoes of the compositional mode of the Hymns, especially of the effect of clustering epithets, can occasionally be heard in the great devotional and, at the same time invocational, Hymns of the Orthodox Church, such as the Akathistos Hymnos: “Spotless, pollutionless, incorruptible, untouched, pure Virgin, Despoina, Bride of God.”

The Orphic Hymns, as well as similar hymns, have neither plot nor action. They are not at all like the major Homeric hymns in that they do not appeal to any emotion. None of our hymns shows even a trace of humor, rhetorical conceit, or for that matter a desire to delight or shock the initiates. Clearly, elevation of mood and the powerful affirmation of a meaningful and bonding presence are elements that run through the recitation of mighty words and sacred sounds flowing into the eager ears and souls of the faithful. Even the puns serve this purpose. Names chanted or better yet sung or even simply recited in a particular sacred tone have power. Each epithet reverberates into the mind of the celebrant and spins out its own plot and its own action. As one epithet follows another, chains of meaning and sound acquire a power that may exceed that of a highly structured narrative. One name is one thing. Two names are more than two things. The Orphic Hymns are beautiful poetry of another kind, a transcendental kind, which must be understood in the context of its own conventions.

O many-named divinity,
O sight sweet to women in labor,
you offer them aid in travail.
You save women, and you alone 3 love children,
O kindly goddess
of swift birth, ever helpful to young women, O Prothyraia.
You hold the keys,
you are accessible to all, O mistress, 6 gracious and fond of nurture,
you have power in every house,
and you delight in festivities.
You loosen girdles, and though invisible you are seen in every deed, you share pain, 9
you rejoice in every birth, O Eileithyia, you free from pain those in terrible distress.
Upon you alone pregnant women call,
O comforter of souls,
and in you alone there is 12 relief from pains of labor.
Artemis, Eileithyia, reverend Prothyraia, hear, O blessed one,

help me and grant offspring;
save me, savior of all, 15 for it is in your nature to do so.

3. To Night

incense—firebrands

I shall sing of Night, mother of gods and men;
we call Night Kypris,

Hear, O blessed goddess, 3 jet-black and starlit, for you delight in the quiet and slumber-filled serenity.

Cheerful and delightful, lover of the nightlong revel, mother of dreams, you free us from cares, 6
you offer us welcome respite from toil.

Giver of sleep, beloved of all,
you gleam in the darkness as you drive your steeds.
Ever incomplete, terrestrial,
and then again celestial, you circle around in pursuit 9 of sprightly phantoms, you force light into the nether world,
and then again you flee into Hades, for dreadful Necessity governs all things.

But now, O blessed one—beatific, 12 desired by all—I call on you to grant a kind ear to my voice of supplication, and to come, benevolent,

to disperse fears that glisten in the night.

4. To Sky

he bellows like a bull.

Erikepaios, seed unforgettable, attended by many rites, ineffable, hidden, brilliant scion, forever in whirring motion, you scattered the dark mist, 6
the mist that lay before your eyes.

throughout this world,
you brought pure light.

For this I call you Phanes, yes, I call you Lord Priapos, 9

you spin in circular ways, O brilliant and fiery begetters of all,
you do reveal fate, 6
everyone's fate,
you determine the divine path for mortals.
Wandering in midair, you gaze upon the seven luminous orbits.
In heaven and on earth, ever indestructible 9 on your blazing trail, you shine upon the darkness of the cloak night wears.
Coruscating and gleaming, kingly and nocturnal, visit the learned contests 12
of this sacred rite, finish a noble race
for works of renown.

8. To the Sun

incense—pounded frankincense

Hear me, O blessed one, eternal eye that sees all,
Titan radiant as gold,
Hyperion, celestial light, self-born, untiring, 3 sweet sight to living creatures.
On the right you beget dawn, on the left you beget night,
you temper the seasons
as you ride your dancing horses, you rush, you rush very swiftly, 6
O fiery and bright-faced charioteer, you press on your course in endless whirl.
Harsh to the impious,
you teach good to the pious as you hold the golden lyre, 9
the harmony of cosmic motion,
as you command noble deeds,
as you nurture the seasons.
Piping lord of the world,
fiery circle of motion, life-bringing, coruscating, 12 life-giving, fruit-bearing, Paian, eternal and pure father of time,
O immortal Zeus,

you are the clear, you are the brilliant,
you are the all-encompassing cosmic eye, both when you set and when you shine 15 your lovely and radiant light.

A paragon of justice,

O water-loving lord of the cosmos, you guard pledges and ever the highest, you do help all.

life's sweetness to the initiates.

9. To Selene

incense—aromatic herbs

Hear me, O divine queen,
O light-bringing and splendid Selene, crossing the air as you race with night.

Nocturnal, torch-bearing, 3 maiden of beautiful stars, O Moon, waxing and waning, feminine and masculine,
luminous, lover of horses, mother of time, bearer of fruit, amber-colored, moody, 6 shining in the night, all-seeing and vigilant, surrounded by beautiful stars,
you delight in the quiet and in the richness of the night, you grant fulfillment and favor 9
as, like a jewel, you shine in the night.
Long-cloaked marshal of the stars, wise maiden whose motion is circular,
come, O blessed and gentle lady, lady of the stars, through your own light shine and save, O maiden, 12 your new initiates.

O pure marshal of the gods,
O end that has no end.
All partake of you, 9
you alone partake of no one.
Self-fathered, hence fatherless, virtue itself, joyous, great,
you are accessible, O nurse of flowers, you lovingly mingle and twine, you lead and rule, 12
you bring life and nourishment to all.
Self-sufficient,
many-named persuasion of the Graces,

Dike herself, queen of heaven, queen of the earth and of the sea, bitter to the vulgar, 15
sweet to those who obey you, wise in all, giver of all,
nurturing queen of all,
abundant nourishment is yours
as you dissolve whatever ripens, father and mother of all, 18
nurturer and nurse, giver of swift birth, O blessed one, giver of wealth of seeds and of the fever of seasons.
A rich and mighty divinity, you give shape and form to all things. 21
Eternal, setting all in motion, skilled and discreet,
you are ever turning the swift stream into an unceasing eddy, flowing in all things, circular and ever changing form, 24 fair-throned and precious, you alone accomplish your designs, mighty mistress of booming thunder, you rule over those who hold the scepter, O loud-roaring divinity, fearless, all-taming, 27 destined fate, fire-breathing, you are life everlasting,
you are immortal providence.

You are all things to all,

you alone do,

you bring peace and health,

you bring growth to all.

11. To Pan

incense—et varia

I call upon Pan, the pastoral god,
I call upon the universe,
upon the sky, the sea, and the land,
queen of all,
I also call upon immortal fire; 3
all these are Pan's realm.
Come, O blessed and frolicsome one,
O restless companion of the Seasons!
Goat-limbed, reveling, lover of frenzy, star-haunting, weaver of playful song, 6
song of cosmic harmony, you induce fantasies of dread into the minds of mortals, you delight in gushing springs, surrounded by goatherds and oxherds, you dance with the nymphs, 9
you sharp-eyed hunter, lover of Echo.
Present in all growth, begetter of all,
many-named divinity, light-bringing lord of the cosmos, fructifying Paian, cave-loving and wrathful, 12 veritable Zeus with horns, the earth's endless plain is supported by you, and the deep-flowing water of the weariless sea yields to you.

Okeanos who girds the earth 15 with his eddying stream gives way to you, and so does the air we breathe,
the air that kindles all life, and above us the sublime eye of weightless fire;
at your behest 18
all these are kept wide apart.

Your providence alters the natures of all,

on the boundless earth you offer nourishment to mankind.
Come, frenzy-loving, spirit-possessed, 21 come to these sacred libations, come and bring my life to a good end.
Send your madness, O Pan,
to the ends of the earth.

12. To Herakles

ineffable, lord of all,
many pray to you,
all-conquering and mighty archer and seer, omnivorous begetter of all, 6 peak of all, helper to all,
for the sake of men
you subdued and tamed savage races.
Peace was your desire;
she brings dazzling honors and nurtures youths.
Self-grown, weariless, 9
bravest child of the earth, O illustrious Paion, your primordial scales gleam.
Round your head
dawn and dark night cling, and your twelve deeds of valor 12 stretch from east to west.
Immortal, world-wise,
boundless and irrepressible,

come, O blessed one,
bringing all charms against disease, with club in hand drive evil bane away, with your poisonous darts
do ward off cruel death.

13. To Kronos

Everlasting father of blessed gods and men, on the boundless cosmos,

O Kronos, begetter of time,
Kronos of the shifting stories, child of Earth, 6 child of starry Sky.
In you there is birth and decline,
O revered and prudent lord of Rhea,
you are the progenitor,
you dwell in every part of the world.
I am a suppliant, hear my voice, 9
O wily and brave one,
and to a good life
bring a blameless end.

14. To Rhea

Mighty Rhea,
daughter of many-faced Protogonos,

Strong-spirited Rhea, queen of queens, lover of the battle din, liar, savior, redeemer, first by birth, mother of gods and of mortals, 9
from you come the earth, and the wide sky above,
and the sea and the winds.
Ethereal and restless, come,
O blessed goddess,
O gentle-minded savior, 12 come, bring peace and wealth and abundance of possessions, and do send death and the filth of pollution

to the ends of the earth.

15. To Zeus

incense—storax

Much-honored Zeus, great god, indestructible Zeus,
we lay before you in prayer redeeming testimony.

O king, you have brought to light 3 divine works—

earth, goddess and mother,
the hills swept by the shrill winds,
the sea and the host of the stars, marshaled by the sky.

Kronian Zeus, strong-spirited god, 6
the thunderbolt is your scepter, father of all,

beginning and end of all,

earth-shaker, increaser
and purifier, all-shaker, god of thunder and lightning, 9
Zeus the sower.

Hear me, god of many faces,
grant me unblemished health,
please grant me divine peace and riches,
please grant me glory without blame.

16. To Hera

incense—aromatic herbs

You lodge yourself in dark hollows, and your form is airy,
O Hera, blessed queen of all,
consort of Zeus.

The soft breezes you send to mortals 3
nourish the soul,

O mother of rains, mother of the winds,
you give birth to all.

Life does not exist without you, growth does not exist without you.

You are in everything, 6 even in the air we venerate, you are queen,
and you are mistress.

You toss and turn when the rushing wind tosses and turns.

O blessed goddess,
many-named queen of all,
may you come with kindness on your joyous face.

17. To Poseidon

incense—myrrh

Hearken, dark-maned Poseidon, holder of the earth, horse god, you hold the bronze trident in your hand, you dwell in the foundations 3 of the full-bosomed sea.

Shaker of the earth,
deep-roaring ruler of the waters,
the waves are your blossoms, O gracious one,
as you urge horses and chariots on, rushing on the sea, 6
splashing through the rippling brine.

The unfathomable sea fell to your lot, the third portion.
Waves and their wild dwellers please you,
O spirit of the deep.
May you save the foundations of the earth 9 and ships moving at full tilt, bringing peace, health,
and blameless prosperity.

18. To Plouton

You dwell below the earth,
O strong-spirited one,
a meadow in Tartaros, thick-shaded and dark.
Sceptered Chthonic Zeus, 3
please accept this sacrifice, O Plouton, holder of the keys to the whole earth.
To mankind you give
the wealth of the year's fruits, yours is the third portion, 6 earth, queen of all,
seat of the gods,
mighty lap of mortals.
Your throne rests
on a dark realm,
the realm of distant, of untiring, 9 of windless, and of impassive Hades;
it does rest on gloomy Acheron,
the river who girds the roots of the earth.
All-receiver, master of death, master of mortals, host of many, Euboulos, you once took as your bride 12
pure Demeter's daughter:
you tore her away from the meadow, and through the sea
you carried her to an Attic cave upon your steeds—

it was the district of Eleusis, 15 where the gates to Hades are.

You alone were born to judge deeds obscure and conspicuous.

Holiest and illustrious ruler of all, frenzied god,

you delight in the respect 18

and in the reverence of your worshippers.

I summon you, come with favor, come with joy to the initiates.

19. To Zeus the Thunderbolt

incense—storax

Father Zeus, sublime is the course of the blazing cosmos you drive on, ethereal and lofty the flash of your lightning as you shake the seat of the gods 3 with a god's thunderbolts.

The fire of your lightning emblazons the rain clouds, you bring storms and hurricanes,
you bring mighty gales, you hurl roaring thunder, 6
a shower of arrows.

Horrific might and strength sets all aflame, dreadful missile makes hearts pound and hair bristle.
Holy and invincible, 9

it comes with a sudden crash, an endless spiral of noise, omnivorous in its drive, unbreakable and threatening, ineluctable, too, the gale's sharp and smoke-filled shafts 12 swoop down with a flash dreaded by land and sea.

Wild beasts cringe
when they hear the noise, faces reflect the brilliance 15 of thunder roaring in the celestial hollows.

You tear the robe that cloaks heaven,
you hurl the fiery thunderbolt.
O blessed one ... 18

the anger of the sea waves, the anger of the mountain peaks—
we all know your power.

Enjoy this libation and give all things pleasing to the heart:
a life of prosperity, 21
queenly health,
divine peace that nurtures youths, crowned with honors,
a life ever blooming with cheerful thoughts.

20. To Astrapaïos Zeus

I call upon great and pure, upon ethereal and blazing Zeus, whose racing fire shines through the air.

Your light flashes through the clouds 3 with an ear-splitting clap.
O horrid, O wrathful and pure,
O invincible god,
lord of lightning, I call upon you,
O begetter of all, O great king, to be kind and to bring 6
a sweet end to my life.

21. To the Clouds

incense—myrrh

Airy Clouds, you nourish fruits and rove the sky,
you bring rain as you are driven everywhere by the wind.

Filled with blazing thunder, 3 filled with water, you resound with awesome crashes in the air-filled vault of heaven as you are repelled by the attack of raging winds.

To you I offer my prayers: 6 your dewy cloaks, blown by fair breezes, send fruit-nourishing rains to mother Earth.

22. To the Sea

incense—pounded frankincense

I call upon gray-eyed Tethys, bride of Okeanos, dark-veiled queen whose waves dance as they are blown onto the land 3 by the sweet breezes.

You break your tall waves upon the rocky beaches, you are calmed by races that are gentle and smooth, you delight in ships, 6 your waters feed wild beasts.

Mother of Kypris, mother of dark clouds, mother of every spring round which nymphs swarm, hear me, O holy one, 9
please help,
send a fair tail wind to ships,
O blessed one.

23. To Nereus

incense—myrrh

The sea's foundations are your realm,
the abode of blue-black darkness,
you exult in the beauty
of your fifty daughters
as they dance amid the waves. 3
O Nereus, god of great renown,
O foundation of the sea, O end of the earth,
O beginning of all,
Demeter's sacred throne trembles when you hold prisoner the gusty winds driven 6 to your gloomy depths.
O blessed one,
ward off earthquakes and send to the initiates peace and prosperity and gentle-handed health.

24. To the Nereids

incense—aromatic herbs

O lovely-faced and pure nymphs, daughters of Nereus, lord of the deep,
at the bottom of the sea
you frolic and dance, fifty maidens revel in the waves, 3 maidens riding on the backs of Tritons, delighting in animal shapes, bodies nurtured by the sea,
and in the other dwellers of Triton's billowy kingdom.
Your home is the water, 6 you leap and whirl round the waves like glistening dolphins roving the roaring seas.
I call upon you to bring much prosperity to the initiates, for you were first 9
to show the holy rite of sacred Bacchos and of pure Persephone, you and mother Kalliope and Apollon the lord.

25. To Proteus

incense—storax

I call upon Proteus, key-holding master of the sea, first-born, who showed the beginnings of all nature, changing matter 3
into a great variety of forms.
Honored by all, he is wise,
and he knows what is now,
what was before,
and what will be in the future.
He has all at his disposal, 6 transformed far beyond all other immortals who dwell on snowy Olympos and fly through the air and over land and sea, for Physis was the first to place 9
everything in Proteus.
Father, attended by holy providence, visit the mystic initiates, and bring a good end to a life of industry and prosperity.

Of you were born gods and men, you hold sway
over the rivers and over all the sea.
Hestia is one of your names, 9 they call you giver of prosperity, because you bestow on men
all manner of blessings.
Come to this rite,
queen whom the drum delights, all-taming savior of Phrygia, 12 consort of Kronos, honored child of Sky, frenzy-loving nurturer of life, joyously and graciously visit our deeds of piety.

28. To Hermes

incense—frankincense

Hear me, Hermes, messenger of Zeus, son of Maia, almighty in heart, lord of the deceased, judge of contests, gentle and clever, O Argeiphontes, 3 you are the guide
of the flying sandals,
a man-loving prophet to mortals.
A vigorous god, you delight in exercise and in deceit.
Interpreter of all you are 6 and a profiteer who frees us of cares, who holds in his hands
the blameless tool of peace.
Lord of Korykos, blessed, helpful, and skilled in words, you assist in work and you are 9
a friend of mortals in need.
You wield the dreaded, the respected weapon of speech.
Hear my prayer and grant
a good end to a life of industry, gracious talk, 12
and mindfulness.

29. Hymn to Persephone

Persephone, blessed daughter of great Zeus, sole offspring of Demeter, come and accept this gracious sacrifice.
Much-honored spouse of Plouton, 3 discreet and life-giving, you command the gates of Hades
in the bowels of the earth, lovely-tressed Praxidike, pure bloom of Deo, mother of the Erinyes, 6 queen of the nether world, secretly sired by Zeus
in clandestine union.
Mother of loud-roaring,
many-shaped Eubouleus,
radiant and luminous, 9
playmate of the Seasons, revered and almighty, maiden rich in fruits,
brilliant and horned,
only-beloved of mortals, in spring you take your joy 12
in the meadow of breezes, you show your holy figure in branches teeming with grass-green fruits, in autumn you were made a kidnapper's bride.

You alone are life and death 15
to toiling mortals, O Persephone, you nourish all,
always, and kill them, too.
Hearken, O blessed goddess, send forth the fruits of the earth as you blossom in peace, 18

bring a blessed life and a splendid old age to him who is sailing
to your realm, O queen, and to mighty Plouton's kingdom.

30. To Dionysos

I call upon loud-roaring, reveling Dionysos,

thrice-born Bacchic lord, savage, ineffable, secretive, 3 two-horned and two-shaped, ivy-covered, bull-faced, warlike, howling, pure.
You take raw flesh in triennial feasts, wrapped in foliage, decked with grape clusters, resourceful Eubouleus, 6 immortal god sired by Zeus when he mated with Persephone in unspeakable union.
Hearken to my voice, O blessed one,
you and your fair-girdled nurses, breathe on me in a spirit 9 of perfect kindness.

31. Hymn to the Kouretes

Leaping Kouretes,
stepping to the sound of arms, howling mountain men whose feet pound the ground, discordant is the lyre you strike 3
as you pace, light of foot,
O renowned marshals,
O arm-carrying guards, priests in the train of a mother struck with mountain frenzy.
Kindly visit the people 6 who praise you with words, with joyous heart
be gracious to the oxherd.

32. To Athene

incense—aromatic herbs

Reverend Pallas, great Zeus bore you by himself, noble and blessed goddess, brave in the din of war.
Renowned and cave-haunting, 3 your domain is on wind-swept hilltops, shaded mountains,

dells that charm your heart.
Arms please you, and you strike men's souls 6 with frenzy,
O vigorous maiden,
O horrid-tempered one,
slayer of Gorgo, O blessed mother of the arts,
you shun the bed of love,
you bring madness to the wicked, 9
you bring prudence to the virtuous, O impetuous one.
Male and female,
shrewd begetter of war,
she-dragon of the many shapes, frenzy-loving, illustrious, destroyer of the Phlegraian Giants, 12 driver of horses,
victorious Tritogeneia,
O goddess, you free us from suffering,

day and night,

ever into the small hours.

to whom many offer their prayers.

33. To Nike

incense—powdered frankincense

I call upon mighty Nike,
beloved of mortals;
she alone frees man from the eagerness for contest, from dissent, 3
when men face each other in battle.

In war you are the judge of deeds deserving prizes;
sweet is the boast
you grant after the onslaught.

Nike, mistress of all, 6
on your good name depends noble glory, glory that comes from the strife and teems with festivities.

bring me noble glory.

yours are the golden lyre, the seeds, and the plows.
Grynean, Sminthian, slayer of Python, Delphic diviner, wild, light-bringing, lovable god you are, O glorious youth.
You shoot your arrows from afar, 6
you lead the Muses into dance,
O holy one, you are Bacchos, Didymeus, Loxias, too, lord of Delos, you are the eye that sees all,
you bring light to mortals, your hair is golden, 9 your oracular utterance is clear.
Hear me with kindly heart
as I pray for people.
You gaze upon all the ethereal vastness, upon the rich earth you look 12 through the twilight.
In the quiet darkness of a night lit with stars

you see earth's roots below, you hold the bounds of the whole world; 15
 the beginning and the end to come are yours.
 You make everything bloom with your versatile lyre, you harmonize the poles,
 now reaching the highest pitch,
 now the lowest, 18
 now again with a Doric mode, harmoniously balancing the poles, you keep the living races distinct.
 You have infused harmony
 into the lot of all men, giving them an equal measure 21
 of winter and summer:
 the lowest notes you strike in the winter,
 the highest notes you make distinct in the summer, your mode is Doric
 for spring's lovely and blooming season.
 This is why mortals call you 24 lord and Pan,
 the two-horned god who sends the whistling winds;
 it is for this you have the master seal of the entire cosmos.
 O blessed one, hear the suppliant voice 27 of the initiates and save them.

35. To Leto

incense—myrrh

Dark-veiled Leto, revered goddess, mother of twins,
great-souled daughter of Koios,
queen to whom many pray, to your lot fell the birth pains 3 for Zeus' fair children, you bore Phoibos and arrow-pouring Artemis, her on Ortygia, him on rocky Delos.
Hear, lady goddess, 6
come with favor in your heart to bring a sweet end to this all-holy rite.

36. To Artemis

incense—powdered frankincense

Hear me, O queen,
Zeus' daughter of many names, Titanic and Bacchic, revered, renowned archer,
torch-bearing goddess bringing light to all, 3 Diktynna, helper at childbirth, you help women in labor,
though you know not what labor is.
O frenzy-loving huntress,
you loosen girdles and drive distress away;
swift arrow-pouring goddess of the outdoors, 6
you roam in the night.
Fame-bringing and affable, redeeming and masculine in appearance, Orthia, goddess of swift birth, you are a nurturer of mortal youths, immortal and yet of this earth, 9 you slay wild beasts, O blessed one, your realm is in the mountain forest,
you hunt deer.
O revered and mighty queen of all,
fair-blossomed, eternal, sylvan, dog-loving, 12
many-shaped lady of Kydonia, come, dear goddess,
as savior to all the initiates, accessible to all, bringing forth the beautiful fruit of the earth, lovely peace,

and fair-tressed health.

May you dispatch diseases and pain to the peaks of the mountains.

37. To the Titans

incense—frankincense

Titans, glorious children of Sky and Earth, ancestors of our fathers,
you dwell down below in Tartarean homes, 3
in the bowels of the earth.
From you are descended all toiling mortals,
the brood of the sea and of the land,
then the brood of the birds, of all generations 6
of the world born of you.
I call upon you to banish harsh anger if some earthly forefather of mine stormed your homes.

38. To the Kouretes

incense—frankincense

Bronze-beating Kouretes,
the weapons of Ares are yours.
Dwellers of heaven, of earth and sea, thrice-blessed ones, life-giving breezes, 3 glorious saviors of the world, you dwell in the sacred land of Samothrace, you ward off dangers for mortals roaming the seas, you were first to set up 6 sacred rites for mortals.
O immortal Kouretes,
the weapons of Ares are yours.
You rule Okeanos,
you rule the sea and the forests, the earth resounds with the pounding 9
of your nimble feet,
and with the glories in your gleaming armor.
All wild beasts cringe
at your onrush,
the din and the shouts rise heavenward, the dust from your feet, 12
as you march briskly, reaches the clouds;
every flower is in bloom.

Immortal gods, you nurture, you also destroy when you fret angrily 15
 over mankind,
 you ruin livelihoods and possessions,
 you ruin men themselves.
 ... the great deep-eddy sea groans, lofty trees are uprooted, 18
 they fall upon the earth, the noisy tremor of the leaves echoes in the sky.
Kouretes, Korybantes, mighty lords, masters of Samothrace, 21
 true Dioskouroi, ever-blowing breezes,
 soul-nurturing and airy, you're called celestial twins on Olympos.
 Gentle saviors, you bring 24 fair breezes and clear weather, nurturers of seasons and of fruits, breathe upon us, O lords.

39. To Korybas

incense—frankincense

I call upon the greatest king of eternal earth, blessed Korybas, the warlike, the one of the forbidding countenance, the nocturnal Koures 3
who saves us from dreadful fear.
Korybas, you save us from fantasies as you wander in deserted places.
Many are the shapes, O lord,
of your twofold divinity;
your blood is tainted 6 with the murder of twin brothers.
You follow Deo's thinking,
you changed your holy form into the shape of a savage, dark dragon.
O blessed one, hear our voices, 9 banish harsh anger,
free from fantasies souls stunned by compulsions.

40. To Eleusinian Demeter

incense—storax

Deo, divine mother of all,
goddess of many names,
revered Demeter, nurturer of youths, giver of prosperity and wealth, you nourish the ears of corn, 3
O giver of all,
you delight in peace
and in toilsome labor.
Present at sowing, heaping, and threshing,
O spirit of the unripe fruit, you dwell 6
in the sacred valley of Eleusis.
Charming and lovely,
you give sustenance to all mortals;
you were the first to yoke
the ploughing ox, the first to send up from below a rich, 9
a lovely harvest for mortals.
You are growth and blooming,
O illustrious companion of Bromios, torch-bearing and pure,
you delight in the summer's yield.
From beneath the earth you appear, 12 gentle to all,
O holy and youth-nurturing lover of children and of fair offspring.

You yoke your chariot to bridled dragons, round your throne 15
you whirl and howl in ecstasy.

You are an only daughter, but you have many children and many powers over mortals;
the variety of flowers reflect your myriad faces and your sacred blossoms.

Come, O blessed and pure one, 18 come with the fruits of summer, bring peace,
bring the welcome rule of law,
bring riches, too, and prosperity, and bring health that governs all.

41. To Mother Antaia

incense—aromatic herbs

Queen Antaia, goddess and many-named mother of immortal gods
and of mortal men, weary from searching, 3 weary from wandering far and wide, you once ended your fast
in the valley of Eleusis, you came to Hades
for noble Persephone.
Your guide was 6
the innocent child of Dysaules, who brought the news of pure Chthonic Zeus' holy union;
you bore divine Euboulos
by yielding to human need.
O goddess, O queen to whom many pray, 9
I beseech you to come graciously to your pious initiate.

42. To Mise

incense—storax

I call upon law-giving Dionysos, who carried the fennel stalk, unforgettable and many-named seed of Eubouleus,
I call upon the sacred and holy, 3
upon the ineffable queen Mise, whose twofold nature is male and female.
Redeeming Iacchos, lord, I summon you, whether you delight in Eleusis
in your fragrant temple, or with Mother you partake 6 of mystic rites in Phrygia, or you rejoice in Kypros with fair-wreathed Kythereia, or yet you exult in fields wheat-bearing and hallowed along Egypt's river 9 with your divine mother,
the revered and black-robed Isis,
as your train of nurses tends to your needs.
Lady, kindheartedly come to the noble contests of our initiation.

43. To the Seasons

incense—aromatic herbs

Seasons, daughters of Themis, daughters of Lord Zeus, Eunomia and Dike
and thrice-blessed Eirene, pure spirits of spring, 3
of blossoming meadows, you are found in every color, in all scents wafted by the breezes.
Ever-blooming, revolving, and sweet-faced,
O Seasons,
you cloak yourselves with the dew 6 of luxuriant flowers.
At play you are companions of holy Persephone, when the Fates and the Graces in circling dances come forth to the light, pleasing Zeus 9
and their mother, giver of fruits.
Come to the new initiates and their holy and reverent rites, bring perfect seasons for the growth of goodly fruit.

44. To Semele

incense—storax

I call upon the daughter of Kadmos,
queen of all,
fair Semele of the lovely tresses,
of the full bosom, mother of thyrsos-bearing, 3 joyous Dionysos.

She was driven to great pain
by the blazing thunderbolt, which, through the counsels of Kronian Zeus,
the immortal god, burned her.

Noble Persephone 6 granted her honors
among mortal men, honors given every third year.

For all mortal men reenact your travail for your son Bacchos:
the sacred ritual of the table, 9
the ritual of the holy mysteries.

45. Hymn to Dionysos Bassareus and Triennial

Come blessed Dionysos,

bull-faced god conceived in fire,

Bassareus and Bacchos,

many-named master of all.

You delight in bloody swords, 3

you delight in the holy Maenads,

as you howl throughout Olympos, all-roaring and frenzied Bacchos.

Armed with the thyrsos, wrathful in the extreme,

you are honored

by all gods and all men 6

who dwell upon the earth.

Come, blessed and leaping god, bring abundant joy to all.

46. To Liknites

incense—powdered frankincense

I summon to these prayers
Dionysos Liknites,
born at Nysa, blossoming, beloved and kindly Bacchos, nursling of the Nymphs 3
and of fair-wreathed Aphrodite.
The forests once felt your feet quiver in the dance as frenzy drove you and the graceful Nymphs on and on.
The counsels of Zeus brought you 6 to noble Persephone, who reared you to be loved by the deathless gods.
Kindheartedly come, O blessed one, accept the gift of this sacrifice.

47. To Perikionios

incense—aromatic herbs

I call upon Bacchos Perikionios, giver of wine;
he enveloped
all of Kadmos' house, with his might he harnessed, 3
he calmed the heaving earth, when the blazing thunderbolt, when the raging gale stirred all the land,
as everyone's bonds sprang loose.
Blessed reveler, 6
come with joyful heart.

48. To Sabazios

incense—aromatic herbs

Hear me, father Sabazios, son of Kronos, illustrious god,
you sewed into your thigh Bacchic Dionysos,
the roaring Eiraphiotes, 3 that he might come whole to noble Tmolos
by the side of fair-cheeked Hipta.
O blessed ruler of Phrygia, supreme king of all,
come kindheartedly to the aid 6 of the initiates.

49. To Hipta

incense—storax

I call upon Hipta, nurse of Bacchos, maiden possessed,
in mystic rites she takes part,
she exults in the worship of pure Sabos and in the dances 3 of roaring Iacchos.
O queen and chthonic mother,
hear my prayer,
whether you are on Ida,
Phrygia's sacred mountain, or you take your pleasure on Tmolos, 6 fair seat of the Lydians, come to these rites with joy on your holy face.

50. To Lysios Lenaios

Hear, O blessed son of Zeus and of two mothers, Bacchos of the vintage, unforgettable seed,
many-named and redeeming daimōn, holy offspring of the gods, 3 reveling Bacchos, born of secrecy, plump giver of many joys,
of fruits which grow well.
Mighty and many-shaped god,
you burst forth from the earth to reach the wine press, to become a healer for men's pain, 6
O sacred blossom!
A sorrow-hating joy to mortals,
O lovely-haired ...,
a redeemer and a reveler you are,
your thyrsos drives to frenzy, you are kind-hearted to all 9 gods and mortals who see your light.
I call upon you now,
come, O sweet bringer of fruit.

51. To the Nymphs

incense—aromatic herbs

O Nymphs, daughters of great-hearted Okeanos, you dwell inside
the earth's damp caves;
you are as secret as your paths, O joyous, 3
O chthonic nurses of Bacchos.
You nurture fruits, you haunt meadows,
O sprightly and pure travelers of the winding roads, who delight in caves and grottos.
Swift, light-footed, and clothed in dew, 6
you frequent springs,
visible and invisible,
in ravines and among flowers you shout and frisk with Pan upon mountainsides, gliding down on rocks, 9
you hum with clear voice.
O mountain-haunting maidens of the fields, of gushing springs and of woodlands,
sweet-smelling virgins, clothed in white, fresh as the breeze, herds of goats, pastures, splendid fruit, 12
you protect; wild animals love you.
Though you are tender, cold delights you;
you feed many, you help them grow,

Hamadryad maidens, playful, water-loving.
Spring is your joy, O Nysian and frenzied, 15
O healing ones,
in the company of Bacchos and Deo,
you bring grace to mortals.
Come to this blessed sacrifice with joyful heart,
pour streams of pure rain 18
during the grain-giving seasons.

52. To the God of Triennial Feasts

incense—aromatic herbs

I call upon you, blessed, many-named, frenzied Bacchos,
bull-horned, Nysian, Lysios,
Lenaïos, conceived in fire.
Nourished in the thigh, Liknites, 3
you lead torch-lit processions, you lead them in the night, O filleted,
O thyrsos-shaking Eubouleus.
Your nature three-fold, your rites ineffable,
O secret offspring of Zeus, primeval, Erikepaïos, 6
father and son of the gods,
you take raw flesh, and sceptered you lead us into the madness of revel and dance, into the frenzy of triennial feasts that bestow calm on us.
You burst forth from the earth in a blaze ..., 9
O son of two mothers,
horned and clad in fawn skin, you roam the mountains,
O lord worshipped in annual feasts.
Paian of the golden spear, nursling, decked with grapes, Bassaros, exulting in ivy, 12 followed by many maidens ..., joyous and all-abounding, come,
O blessed one, to the initiates.

53. To the God of Annual Feasts

incense—all other things, save frankincense—a libation of milk, too

I call upon Bacchos, the god we worship annually, chthonic Dionysos, together with the fair-tressed Nymphs
he is roused.

In the sacred halls of Persephone 3 he slumbers and puts to sleep

pure

Bacchic time, every third year.

When he himself stirs up the triennial revel again,

he sings a hymn 6

together with his fair-girdled nurses.

As the seasons revolve,
he puts to sleep and wakes up the years.

O blessed and fruit-giving Bacchos,

O horned spirit of the unripe fruit, come to this most sacred rite 9 with a glow of joy on your face, come teeming with fruit that is holy and perfect.

54. To Silenos Satyros and the Bacchae

incense—powdered frankincense

Hear me, foster father of Bacchos, father and nurturer, best of the Silenoi,
honored by all the gods, honored by mortal men 3 in the same triennial feasts.
Pure and prized marshal of the pastoral band, wakeful reveler and companion of the fair-girt nurses, leader of the ivy-crowned 6 Naiads and of the Bacchantes, take all the Satyrs,
half-men, half-beast,
come howling
to the Bacchic lord.
The Bacchantes escort 9
the holy Lenaian procession in sacred litanies revealing torch-lit rites, shouting, thyrsos-loving,
finding calm in the revels.

55. To Aphrodite

Heavenly, smiling Aphrodite, praised in many hymns,
sea-born revered goddess of generation, you like the night-long revel,
you couple lovers at night, 3
O scheming mother of Necessity.
Everything comes from you:
you have yoked the world,
you control all three realms,
you give birth to all,
to everything in heaven, 6
to everything upon the fruitful earth, to everything in the depths of the sea,
O venerable companion of Bacchos.
You delight in festivities,
O bride-like mother of the Erotes,
O Persuasion, whose joy is in the bed of love, 9 secretive giver of grace,
visible and invisible,
lovely-tressed daughter of a noble father, bridal feast companion of the gods,
sceptered, she-wolf, beloved and man-loving, 12
giver of birth and life.
Your maddening love-charms yoke mortals, they yoke the many races of beasts to unbridled passion.

Come, O goddess born in Kypros:	15
you may be on Olympos,
O queen, exulting
in the beauty of your face,
you may be in Syria,
country of fine frankincense,
you may be driving	18
your golden chariot in the plain, you may lord it over Egypt's fertile river bed.
Come, whether you ride your swan-drawn chariot over the sea's billows, joining the creatures of the deep	21
as they dance in circles, or on land in the company of the dark-faced nymphs
as light-footed they frisk over the sandy beaches.
Come lady, even if you are	24
in Kypros that cherishes you, where fair maidens and chaste brides throughout the year sing of you,
O blessed one,
as they sing of immortal, pure Adonis.
Come, O beautiful,	27
O comely goddess,
I summon you with holy words,
I summon you with a pious soul.

56. To Adonis

incense—aromatic herbs

Hear my prayer, O best,
O many-named god.
Fine-haired, solitary,
ever bursting with lovely song, Eubouleus, many-shaped, 3 noble nurturer of all,
male and female in one ...
unwithering bloom, O Adonis, you vanish and then shine again in the fair season's turn.
Two-horned spirit of growth, 6 much loved and wept for, fair one, joyful hunter,
god of the luxuriant mane, desire is in you, O sweet blossom, O son of Aphrodite and Eros, born on the bed 9
of lovely-tressed Persephone.
You dwell deep in murky Tartaros,
then again toward Olympos
you carry your blossoming body.
Come, O blessed one, bring 12 earth's fruits to the initiates.

57. To Chthonic Hermes

incense—storax

You dwell on the road all must take,
the road of no return, by the Kokytos, you guide the souls of mortals to the nether gloom.
Hermes, offspring of Dionysos 3 who revels in the dance, and of Aphrodite, the Paphian maiden
of the fluttering eyelids, you haunt the sacred house of Persephone as guide throughout the earth of ill-fated souls, the souls you bring to their destined harbor 6
when their time has come;
you charm them with your sacred wand,
you give them sleep
from which you rouse them again.
It is to you indeed that Persephone gave the high office 9 throughout broad Tartaros to lead the way for the everlasting souls of men.
O blessed one, grant a good end for the labors of the initiates.

58. To Eros

incense—aromatic herbs

I call upon you, great, pure, lovely and sweet Eros, winged archer who runs swiftly on a path of fire, who plays together with gods 3 and mortal men.
Inventive, two-natured,
you are master of all:
of the sky's ether, of the sea and the land,
of the all-begetting winds, which for mortals the goddess 6
of grass and grain nurtures, of all that lies in Tartaros, of all that lies in the roaring sea;
you alone govern
the course of all these.
O blessed one, come to the initiates 9 with pure thought, banish from them
vile impulses.

59. To the Fates

incense—aromatic herbs

Boundless Fates,
dear children of dark Night,
hear my prayer,
O many-named dwellers on the lake of heaven, 3 where the frozen water is broken by night's warmth
in the shady hollow of a sleek cave;
from there you fly to the vast earth, home of mortals, from there, clothed in purple, you march 6 toward men, whose noble aims
match their vain hopes,
in the realm of the dead, where glory drives her chariot on all over the earth 9
beyond the ends of Justice, of anxious hope, of primeval law,
of the measureless principle of order.
In life Fate alone watches;
the other immortals who dwell on the peaks 12 of snowy Olympos do not,
except for Zeus' perfect eye.
Fate and Zeus' mind

know all things for all time.

I pray to you to come, 15

gently and kindly,

Atropos, Lakheis, Klotho,

offspring of noble stock.

Airy, invisible, inexorable, ever indestructible,

you give all and take all, 18

being to men the same as necessity.

Fates, hear my prayers,

receive my libations,

come gently to the initiates, free them from pain.

60. To the Graces

incense—storax

Hear me, O illustrious, O renowned Graces, daughters of Zeus
and full-bosomed Eunomia, Aglaia, Thalia, 3 blessed Euphrosyne, lovely, wise, and pure mothers of joy,
many-shaped, ever-blooming,
beloved of mortals.
We pray that each in her turn 6 with a flower's beauty on her face, enchanting, come, ever gentle, to the initiates to bring them prosperity.

61. Hymn to Nemesis

Nemesis, I call upon you,
O goddess, O great queen, your all-seeing eye looks upon the lives of man's many races.
Eternal and revered, 3
you alone rejoice in the just,
you change and vary,
you shift your word.
All who bear the yoke
of mortality fear you,
you care about the thoughts of all; 6 the arrogant soul,
the reckless one,
finds no escape.
You see all, you hear all,
you arbitrate all.
O sublime deity, 9
in whom dwells justice for men, come, blessed and pure one,
ever helpful to the initiates,
grant nobility of mind,
put an end to repulsive thoughts, thoughts unholy, 12
fickle and haughty.

62. To Dike

incense—frankincense

I sing of the all-seeing eye of comely and radiant Dike, who is seated upon the sacred throne of lord Zeus.

From heaven you watch the lives 3 of the many human races, you crush the unjust with just retribution, matching things lawless through the truth of equality.

For whenever base opinions 6 prevail in difficult verdicts, because men wish more than is fair,
you intervene and rouse
justice against her foes.

An enemy of the unjust, 9 you are a gentle goddess to the just.
O goddess, come evenhanded to thoughts that are noble, until that fated day
descends on my life.

63. To Justice

incense—frankincense

O paragon of justice to mortals, blessed and beloved one,
you take equal pleasure in all men who are just.
Honored by all and blissful, 3
O bold, O lofty Justice,
you are pure of thought,
you reward propriety,
your own conscience is unbreakable for you break all who do not submit to your yoke, 6 but ...
in their greed upset
the balance of your mighty scales.
Dauntless, charming,
a lover of revel loved by all, you rejoice in peace, you strive 9 for a life that is stable.
You loath unfairness,
but fairness delights you;
in you knowledge of virtue reaches its noble goal.
Hear, O goddess, 12
rightly shatter wicked men, so that mortals who eat of the fruits of this earth and also all living creatures nursed in the bosom of Earth, the divine mother, 15 nursed in the bosom of sea-dwelling Zeus, may follow a path

both balanced and noble.

64. Hymn to Nomos

Upon the holy lord of men and gods I call, heavenly Nomos, who arranges the stars and sets a fair limit between the earth and the waters of the sea; 3 it is his laws that ever preserve nature's balance, obedient and steady.
Journeying on the heavens,
he brings the laws from above, with a roar he drives out 6 malicious envy.
Nomos summons
a good end to mortal life, he alone steers the course of everything that breathes, ever the steadfast companion 9
of righteous thought.
Primeval and wise, in peace he shares the same house with all who abide by the law, bringing harsh vengeance
upon the lawless.
O blessed bringer of prosperity, 12 beloved of all and honored, with kindness of heart send forth memory of you, O mighty one.

65. To Ares

incense—frankincense

Unbreakable, strong-spirited, mighty, powerful daimōn, delighting in arms, indomitable, man-slaying, wall-battering, lord Ares, yours is the din of arms. 3 Ever bespattered with blood, you find joy in killing in the fray of battle, O horrid one, your desire is for the rude clash of swords and spears.
Stay the rage, stay the strife, 6 relax pain's grip on my soul, yield to the wish of Kypris, yield to the revels of Lyaios, exchange the might of arms
for the works of Deo, yearning for youth-nurturing peace, 9
bliss-bringing peace.

66. To Hephaistos

incense—powdered frankincense

Hephaistos, powerful and strong-spirited, unwearying fire,
shining in the gleam of flames,
a god bringing light to mortals, mighty-handed, 3
eternal artisan, worker, part of the cosmos,
blameless element,
most sublime, all-eating,
all-taming, all-haunting—ether, sun, stars, 6
moon, pure light:
all these parts of Hephaistos are revealed to mortals.
All homes, all cities,
all nations are yours.
O mighty giver of many blessings, 9
you dwell in human bodies.
Hear me, lord, as I summon you to this holy libation, that you may always come gentle to joyful deeds, end the savage rage 12
of untiring fire
as nature itself
burns in our own bodies.

67. To Asklepios

incense—frankincense

Asklepios, lord Paian, healer of all,
you charm away the pains
of men who suffer.
Come, mighty and soothing, 3 bring health,
put an end to sickness,
then to the harsh fate of death.
O blessed spirit of joyful growth,
O helper, you ward off evil, honored and mighty son 6 of Phoibos Apollon.
Enemy of disease,
consort of Hygieia the blameless, come as savior, O blessed one,
bring life to a good end.

68. To Hygeia

incense—frankincense

Charming queen of all,
lovely and blooming,
blessed Hygeia, mother of all,
bringer of bliss, hear me.

Through you vanish 3
the illnesses that afflict man, through you every house blossoms to the fullness of joy.

The arts thrive when the world desires you, O queen, loathed by Hades, 6
the destroyer of souls.

Apart from you all is without profit for men:
wealth, the sweet giver of abundance for those who feast, fails, and man never reaches 9

the many pains of old age.
Goddess, come, ever-helpful to the initiates, keep away the evil distress of unbearable diseases.

69. To the Erinyes

incense—storax—powdered frankincense

Hear, Tisiphone, Allekto, noble Megaira, revered goddesses
whose Bacchic cries resound.
Nocturnal and clandestine, 3 you live deep down
in the dank cave
by the sacred water of the Styx.
Men's unholy designs do incur your anger;
rabid and arrogant, you howl 6
over Necessity's dictates, clothed in animal skins,
you cause the deep pains of retribution.
O dreaded maidens of the thousand faces,
your realm is in Hades, phantoms airy, invisible, 9 swift as thought you are.
The speedy flames of the sun and the moon's glow cannot arouse life's delights without your aid, neither can the excellence of wisdom, 12
as well as the virtue and the joy in bold enterprise and in the sleekness of fair youth.

Upon the races of all men that remain countless,
you gaze as the eye of Dike, 15 ever in charge of justice.
O snake-haired and many-shaped goddesses of fate, change my thoughts of life into gentle and soft ones.

70. To the Eumenides

incense—aromatic herbs

Hear me and be gracious,
O renowned Eumenides,
O pure daughters of the great Chthonic Zeus and of lovely Persephone, 3 fair-tressed maiden.

Over the lives of impious mortals
you keep a careful eye,
in charge of Necessity,
you punish the unjust.

Black-skinned queens, 6
your awesome eyes flash forth flesh-eating darts of light.

Everlasting, repugnant,
frightful, sovereign, paralyzing the limbs with madness, 9 hideous, nocturnal, fateful, snake-haired, terrible maidens of the night, it is you I summon
to bring me holiness of mind.

71. To Melinoe

incense—aromatic herbs

I call upon Melinoe, saffron-cloaked nymph of the earth, whom revered Persephone bore
by the mouth of the Kokytos river upon the sacred bed 3 of Kronian Zeus.

In the guise of Plouton Zeus tricked Persephone and through wily plots bedded her;
a two-bodied specter sprang forth from Persephone's fury.
This specter drives mortals to madness 6 with her airy apparitions as she appears in weird shapes and strange forms,
now plain to the eye, now shadowy, now shining in the darkness— all this in unnerving attacks 9 in the gloom of night.

O goddess, O queen of those below, I beseech you to banish the soul's frenzy
to the ends of the earth,
show to the initiates 12
a kindly and holy face.

72. To Tyche

incense—frankincense

I summon you here through prayer, Tyche, noble ruler,
gentle goddess of the roads,
for wealth and possessions,
I summon you as Artemis the guide, 3 renowned and sprung from the loins of Eubouleus, your wish is irresistible.
Funereal and delusive,
you are the theme of men's songs.
In you lies the great variety 6 of men's livelihood:
to some you grant a wealth of blessings and possessions, to others you bring evil poverty
if you harbor anger against them.
O goddess, I beseech you, 9 come in kindness to my life, grant me happiness,
grant me abundant wealth.

73. To Daimon

incense—frankincense

I call upon Daimon,
the grand and the dreaded leader, gentle Zeus, who gives birth to all,
who gives livelihood to mortals.
Great Zeus, wide roving, 3 avenger, king of all, giver of wealth when you enter the house in the abundance of your powers, you refresh the life of mortals worn out with toil, you possess the keys to joy 6
and sorrow as well.
So, O pure and blessed one,
drive painful cares away,
cares that dispatch ruin to all that live throughout the whole earth, and bring a glorious end to my life, 9 a sweet and noble one.

74. To Leukothea

incense—aromatic herbs

I call upon Leukothea, daughter of Kadmos, revered goddess, mighty nurturer
of fair-wreathed Dionysos.
Hearken, O goddess, 3
O mistress of the deep-bosomed sea,
you delight in waves,
you are the greatest savior to mortals, on you depends the unsteady heave of seafaring ships, you alone save men 6
from wretched death at sea, men to whom you swiftly come as welcome savior.
O divine lady,
come to the aid of well-benched ships, 9
do kindly save them, bring upon the sea
a fair tail wind to the initiates.

75. To Palaimon

incense—powdered frankincense

Comrade of joyous Dionysos

in the revel of the dance,

you dwell in the sea's

pure, restless depths.

I call upon you, O Palaimon, 3

to come to these sacred rites with kindness in your heart, with joy on your youthful face,

come to save your initiates on land and on sea.

When storms come upon ships 6

that ever rove the seas,

you alone appear incarnate to save men,

to stay the harsh anger

over the briny swell.

76. To the Muses

incense—frankincense

Daughters of Mnemosyne, daughters of thundering Zeus, Pierian Muses, renowned and illustrious,
many-shaped and beloved 3
of the mortals you visit, you give birth to unblemished virtue in every discipline, you nourish the soul,
you set thought aright
as you become leaders, 6
as you become mistresses of the mind's power.
Sacred and mystic rites
you taught to mortals, Kleio, Euterpe, Thaleia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, 9
Polymnia, Ourania,
mother Kalliope,
mighty goddess Hagne.
Do come to the initiates, O goddesses,
in your manifold holiness,
do bring glory and emulation 12 that is lovely and sung by many.

77. To Mnemosyne

incense—frankincense

I call upon queen Mnemosyne, Zeus' consort,
who gave birth to the holy,
the sacred, the clear-voiced Muses.
Evil oblivion that harms the mind 3 is alien to her who gives coherence
to the mind and soul of mortals.
She increases men's power, their ability to think,
sweet and vigilant, 6
she reminds us of all the thoughts we store forever in our breasts, never straying and ever rousing the mind to action.
O blessed goddess, 9
for the initiates stir the memory of the sacred rite, ward off oblivion from them.

78. To Dawn

incense—powdered frankincense

Hear, O goddess, you bring the light of day to mortals, resplendent Dawn, you blush throughout the world, messenger of the great, 3
the illustrious Titan.

Murky, dark, journeying night
you send below the earth
when you arrive;
mortal men you lead to work 6
as you tend to their lives.

The race of mortal men delights in you,
no one escapes your sight
as you look down from on high, when from your eyelids 9

you shake off sweet sleep, when there is joy
for every mortal,
for every reptile,
for animals,
for birds, 12

for the broods the sea contains.
All blessings that come from work are your gift.

Goddess, blessed and pure, give more sacred light to the initiates.

79. To Themis

incense—frankincense

I call upon pure Themis, daughter of noble Sky and Earth, Themis the young,
the lovely-faced maiden, the first to show mortals 3
the holy oracle

as prophetess of the gods in her Delphic hideaway on Pythian ground where Python was king.

You taught lord Phoibos 6
the art of giving laws.

Amid reverence and honor
you shine in the night,
for you were first
to teach men holy worship, howling to Bacchos 9

in nights of revelry;
from you come the honors
of the gods, the honors of the holy mysteries.

O blessed maiden, come in a joyous, in a kindly spirit to your very sacred, 12 to your mystical rites.

80. To Boreas

incense—frankincense

Freezing Boreas, your wintry breezes make the world's lofty air quiver,
come from snowy Thrace!

Dissolve the rebellious alliance 3 of clouds and moist air, turn the water
to rushing drops of rain, bring fair weather everywhere, brighten Ether's face as the sun's rays 6 shine upon the earth.

81. To Zephyros

incense—frankincense

Western breezes born of the open sea, ethereal wonders,
as you blow gently
your whisper brings rest from toil.
Vernal, meadow-haunting, 3 you are loved by harbors because to ships you bring a gentle passage, soft light wind.
Come in a generous spirit,
blow in unblemished ways,
O airy, O invisible, 6
O light-winged ones.

82. To Notos

incense—frankincense

Quickly leaping
through the moist air
as both of your swift wings vibrate, O father of rain, come, riding the southern clouds. 3 Zeus did grant you
this lofty prerogative:
to send the rain-giving clouds from sky to earth.
For this we pray to you, O blessed one, take delight in our sacrifice, 6
do send fruit-nourishing rains to mother Earth.

83. To Okeanos

incense—aromatic herbs

I summon Okeanos, ageless, eternal father,
begetter of immortal gods,
begetter of mortal men.

Your waves, O Okeanos, 3
gird the boundaries of the earth.

From you come all the seas,
from you come all the rivers, from you come the pure, the flowing waters of earth's springs.

Hear me, O blessed god, 6
O highest, O divine purifier, where you end the earth ends,
the pole begins where ships glide on,
come, grant favor,
grant grace to the initiates.

84. To Hestia

incense—aromatic herbs

Queen Hestia,
daughter of mighty Kronos, mistress of ever-burning fire,
you dwell in the center of the house.
May you raise the holy initiates 3
in these sacred rites, may you grant them unwithering youth, wealth as well, prudence and purity.
Home of the blessed gods,
men's mighty buttress, eternal, many-shaped, 6 beloved, grass-yellow, smile, O blessed one,
kindly accept these offerings, waft upon us prosperity,
breathe upon us gentle-handed health.

85. To Sleep

incense with opium poppy

Sleep, you are lord of all, lord of blessed gods and of mortal men,
of every living thing
the broad earth nurtures, for you alone are master of all, 3
you do visit all, binding their bodies
with fetters unforged.
You free us of cares, you offer
sweet respite from toil, you grant holy solace 6
to our every sorrow, you save souls by easing them into the thought of Death, since to Death and Oblivion
you are a true brother.
But, O blessed one, I beseech you 9
to come sweet-tempered, to be a kindly savior of the initiates, that they may serve the gods.

86. To Dream

incense—aromatic herbs

I call upon you, blessed,
long-winged, baneful Dream, messenger of things to come,
greatest prophet to mortals.
In the quiet of sweet sleep 3
you come silent,
you speak to the soul,
you rouse men's minds,
in their sleep you whisper
the will of the gods;
silent you come to show 6
the future to silent souls that walk the noble path of devotion to the gods.
Good always wins the race in people's minds, good leads their lives 9
to pleasures anticipated, to a respite from suffering, that god himself may reveal the firmament of the divine lords
... through vows and sacrifices.
The end to which the pious come 12 is always so sweeter, but to the impious never does a dreamy phantom,

a prophet of evil deeds, reveal future need so that they may find the cure 15 from pain to come.
But, O blessed one, I beg you, show me the behests of the gods,
in all things bring me close to the path that is straight, do not through weird apparitions 18 show me evil signs.

87. To Death

incense—powdered frankincense

Hear me, you who steer the path of all mortals and give sacred time to all from whom you are distant.
Your sleep tears the soul 3 free from the body's hold, whenever you undo
nature's powerful bonds, bringing the long slumber,
the endless one, to the living.
Common to all, 6
you are unjust to some,
when you bring swift end to youthful life at its peak.
In you alone is executed
the verdict common to all, for to entreaties and to prayers 9
you alone are deaf.
O blessed one,
with pious vows, with sacrifices,
I beg you, I pray to you,
grant me long life,
that old age might be 12
a noble prize among men.

Orpheus to Mousaios

The opening poem of the collection portrays the fiction of Orpheus instructing Mousaios in a rite. A loose parallel may be adduced in the case of Hesiod, who tells us of his transformation from shepherd to poet in the beginning of the Theogony (1–114); note in particular how the Muses there are initially described singing a hymn to a list of divinities (11–21), similar to what we find in this poem. Inclusivity is a characteristic of Greek polytheism, and it can be dangerous to omit the wrong divinity. This is a recurring theme in myth (e.g., the Kalydonian Boar because Artemis was neglected, the infidelity of Helen and her sister Klytemnestra because Aphrodite was neglected, the apple in the Judgment of Paris because Strife was snubbed).

For Orpheus, see the introduction to the translation. Mousaios was also a semi-legendary figure of questionable antiquity who was thought to be both a poet (his name means “of the Muse”) and a founder of religious rites. He was considered to be the father of Eumolpos, the eponymous ancestor of the Eumolpids, one of the two hereditary families entrusted to administering the Eleusinian Mysteries (see OH 40i). Mousaios seems to have been originally independent of Orpheus but later was made his son and/or disciple. The address “friend” here suggests at least the latter. For more on Mousaios, see West 1983, pp. 39–44.

There is a question whether this poem belongs with our collection or was added at some later date after the Hymns had been made part of a greater compilation of ancient hymns. It will become immediately apparent that the order of divinities in this poem does not, for the most part, match the order of the hymns to individual deities. Furthermore, some personalities, such as Hebe, are mentioned only in this poem, while others who have a hymn devoted to them in the collection, such as Hestia, do not appear here. West argues that this opening address to Mousaios was not part of the original collection but instead might have been the Thuēpolikon (Sacrifice or Mystic Rites) mentioned among the works of Orpheus in the Souda, a tenth-century ^{AD} Byzantine lexicon/encyclopedia (West 1968, pp. 288–289). However, the arguments against originality are certainly not insurmountable. For example, given how interconnected various hymns are (through language and motif), the opening may have been felt comprehensive enough despite the discrepancy between the divinities invoked in it and those that receive hymns in the rest of the collection. Another possibility is that the poem was an independent entity that our composer somewhat inartfully grafted onto his efforts. The opening and closing lines could easily have been altered from, and/or added to, the original. Indeed, the original might even have been the inspiration for creating a series of hymns dedicated to individual entities, and the collection could then be viewed as an (imperfect) expansion of it, adapted to the exigencies of the particular ritual in which it was performed.

It should also be pointed out that the fiction presented here of the master Orpheus passing on wisdom to his disciple Mousaios would have had great significance for the initiates. Beyond the fancy that attributing the rite to the august figure Orpheus lends the whole affair an aura of prestige and legitimacy, in the performance of this poem it is not only Mousaios who is the beneficiary of Orpheus' special knowledge but also the initiates themselves. The poem could represent the foundational act of the ritual and have been felt to provide the raison d'être for the cult's existence. There might be an element of play-acting here, of taking on another role, something that is prevalent in Dionysian worship (see OH 30i). One wonders if it was not the group but a figure of authority (the "oxherd"?) who opened the ceremony by chanting these verses in the guise of Orpheus. We find the theme of foundation of rites appearing intermittently throughout the collection; see OH 76.7n. It is perhaps significant that many such instances involve groups, which might also be serving to break down the divide of mythic past and present reality.

For the divinities mentioned in this poem who have their own hymn(s), the reader is referred to the appropriate introduction and notes for more information.

3–5: The use of elements as an ordering technique found elsewhere in the collection (see OH 15i and OH 79i) seems to be used here as well, with Zeus representing air, Earth herself, the celestial bodies fire, and Poseidon water. The same grouping, albeit in a different order, appears in lines 32–33. See also note to line 38. For Zeus as the first god mentioned, see note to line 41.

11: Aphrodite, the coy goddess, is coyly alluded here. Her position after Hephaistos might be due to the fact that she is sometimes his wife in mythology (see OH 66i).

12: Hades is meant. He is often addressed by such circumlocutions since it was considered ill-omened to mention him by name (see also OH 18.3n and OH 69i).

13 Hebe: Her name means "youth." She is the daughter of Zeus and Hera. In traditional myth she was the cup-bearer of the gods, until Zeus abducted Ganymede and installed him in her place. Later she became the wife of the deified Herakles; see OH 12i.

14 Justice and Piety: OH 63 is addressed to the personified Justice. For her relationship to Piety, see the introduction to that hymn.

18 Year: Proclus cites some lines from a poem he attributes to Orpheus where in the version of Aphrodite's birth from the castration of Kronos, it is Year that gives birth to her after she had been surrounded by foam; Proclus elsewhere states that "the theurgists" worshipped Year, as well as Time, Day, Night, and Month (Orphic fragment 189). Aelian reports that in Gadeira (modern day Cádiz), the inhabitants had an altar for Year and Month (Orphic fragment 19). See also OH 12.3n.

19 Dione: In Homer, she is the mother of Aphrodite and consoles her after she is wounded by Diomedes (Iliad 5.370–417). She assists in the birth of Apollon (Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.93), which may explain her place after Leto here. For Hesiod, she is an Okeanid (Theogony 353) and one of the divinities praised by the Muses in song as they head out to Olympos from Helikon (Theogony 17). Apollodoros, in contrast to Hesiod, makes her a Titan (1.1.2) and the mother of Aphrodite (1.3.1; see also OH 55i). The Rhapsodies also made Dione a Titan (Orphic fragment 179; see also OH 4i).

20–22: A number of similar divinities are clustered together here. While the Kouretes and Korybantes are separate entities, they often are confounded with one another, as at OH 38.20–21, where they are also identified as the gods of the Samothracian mystery cult and Zeus' sons Kastor and Polydeukes, the Dioskouroi (see OH 27i and OH 38.20–21n). Here the Kabeiroi, called saviors and the sons of Zeus, apparently are being identified with the Dioskouroi. However, they usually are separate as well, the gods of a mystery cult at Lemnos and Thebes that was connected with blacksmiths (see Burkert 1985, pp. 281–282, OH 39i and OH 66i). Interestingly enough, the Kabeiroi seem to have been worshipped on Samothrace, too (Herodotos 2.51.2; but see Burkert 1985, p. 283), which might have influenced the composer of this hymn. The Dioskouroi, Kouretes, and Kabeiroi are all possible identities of the mysterious "Boy Lords" worshipped in a mystery cult at Amphissa (Pausanias 10.38.7). The Idaian gods are a reference to the Idaian Dactyls, for whom see OH 12i. They, too, had a connection with Samothrace (see Graf/Johnston 2007, p. 170), which further suggests that the Kabeiroi here are being associated with that island.

24 Day: Hesiod makes Day the child of Night and Erebus (Theogony 124). See also note to line 18 and OH 3i.

25 Faith: We find Faith personified first in Theognis, who says that only Hope remains among men, but Faith, Prudence, and the Graces have fled to Olympos (1135–1138). This is a pastiche of Hesiod’s tale of Pandora and the jar and the departure of Shame and Nemesis from the earth (Works and Days 90–99 and 197–201). Faith occasionally is worshipped in cult, most notably for our collection at Pergamon, where she shared an altar with Concord (see Nilsson 1961, p. 357).

25 Thesmodoteira: The name means “she that gives laws.” Demeter was known as Thesmophoria (“she that bears laws”), and it is possible that this Thesmodoteira is either another identity of Demeter or a goddess who has been detached from Demeter and given a life of her own.

28–29: According to Hesiod, Atlas is a Titan who supports the sky on his shoulders, both out of “harsh necessity” and because this burden had been imposed upon him by Zeus (Theogony 517–520). This idea was taken up in Orphic mythology and justified by Atlas’ participation in the murder of Dionysos (Orphic fragment 319). Homer, however, has him in the sea supporting both the earth and the sky (Odyssey 1.52–54), perhaps reminiscent of the Hittite Ullikummi. Aion (Eon, Eternity) is closely related to Time; Euripides makes Aion the son of Time, perhaps married to Fate (Herakleidae 900). He was a late-comer to cult; for an exhaustive review of the sources, see Nock 1934, pp. 83–98 (with discussion of this line on pp. 88–89), and Nilsson 1961, pp. 498–505. Time is an important figure in some Orphic cosmogonies. He is counted among the first entities in creation, and the one responsible for the birth of Protogonos (see OH 6i+6.1n).

30 Pronoia: See the introduction to the translation.

32–33: The serial listing of the sky, earth, and sea—with some variations—is a recurring theme in the collection; see OH 10.14–16n.

35 Adrasteia: See OH 61i.

38 Thunder: Interestingly enough, we have a hymn for Zeus the Thunderbolt and one for Zeus of the Lightning, but not one for the third of the group, Zeus of the Thunder; conversely, only Thunder is mentioned here, not Lightning or Thunderbolt; see further OH 20i.

38 four-pillared cosmos: The four pillars should probably be understood as the four elements; see note to lines 3–5.

39: For Attis, see OH 27i. Men is a moon god of Asia Minor; see OH 9.4n.

40 Ourania: We find this as an epithet to Aphrodite, and, since Adonis is immediately mentioned next (thus following the order of their hymns in our collection), it would seem likely that Ourania here refers to Aphrodite (see OH 55i+1n), despite the fact that this goddess has already been invoked at line 11 (albeit not by name). Ourania is also traditionally one of the names of the Muses, and she is mentioned at OH 76.9.

41 Beginning and End: These appear to be nothing more than abstractions of philosophical terms. A papyrus fragment containing a commentary on a poem of Alkman that is no longer extant reveals a cosmogony that started from undifferentiated matter that was given form through Poros (Way) and Tekmor (End, Limit), which the commentator interprets as signifying the beginning and end of things (PMGF 5 fr. 2 col. iii; translation and discussion in Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, pp. 47–49). In all three extant versions of an Orphic hymn to Zeus, the god is described as being the first and last (see OH 15.3–5n), and in OH 15.7 he is called “the beginning and end of all” (and see note; however, the Greek word for “end” there is different than the one found here). It is perhaps no surprise, then, that Zeus begins the list of deities in this poem. He may even be understood as Beginning and End here, which would neatly close the long list of divinities in this poem by ring composition. Note, too, that the word “rite” (Greek “thuēpoliē”) appears in the first and last line.

1. To Hekate

Hekate is a murky goddess on the fringes of Greek religion, and it is very possible that she was originally a native goddess of the Karians, a people in Asia Minor. Her earliest mention is in Hesiod’s Theogony, a relatively long digression of such effusive praise that it is often referred to as a “hymn to Hekate” (411–452). Hesiod asserts that Zeus did not strip her of the honors she held before the defeat of the Titans, among whom she numbers. The poet then goes on to list the wide-ranging powers of the goddess and whom she can help or hinder as she pleases: kings, men speaking in assemblies, soldiers in battle, athletes at competitions, horsemen, sailors (along with Poseidon), and fishermen. Along with Hermes, she can bring fertility or sterility to flocks, and her role in nurturing youths closes out this astounding list of domains. Hesiod also stresses the fact that she is an only child. This picture of Hekate is unique in extant literature. Later on she was frequently identified with Artemis and Moon; see OH 9i and OH 36i. Hesiod perhaps is already moving in this direction, as he calls her a “nurturer of youths,” an epithet usually applied to Artemis (cf. OH 36.8). Moreover, in Hesiod’s genealogies, Hekate is first cousin to Artemis and Apollon, since their mothers, Asteria and Leto respectively, are sisters (Theogony 404–409). The connection with Moon is already suggested in another early poem, the Homeric Hymn to Demeter. After Persephone had been snatched by Hades, Hekate approaches Demeter and informs her that she heard the screams of the abducted girl but did not see the perpetrator (2.51–61). This information is supplied by Sun (2.62–90). Hekate is described as “carrying a light in her hands” (2.52), and, as the female counterpart to Sun in their role as witnesses, seems to be imagined as the moon goddess in these lines; see OH 2i and OH 9.3+n. Note, too, that the name of her mother in Hesiod’s genealogy, Asteria, means “starry.”

Thus in early Greek literature Hekate had definite celestial connections. But her association in Hesiod with fertility hints at chthonic relations, as does her connection in the story of the abduction of Persephone. When mother and daughter are reunited in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter, Hekate joins in their celebration and becomes Persephone’s “attendant and follower” (2.438–440). She is therefore connected with the world of the dead, and it is this attribute that comes to dominate her aspect in later times. In the magical papyri, she is also explicitly equated with Persephone, along with other entities such as the Fates (PGM 4.2714–2783 and 2785–2870). No longer is she a (potentially) beneficial deity that might deign to grant a person blessings; instead she has become a sinister and dangerous, sometimes demonic, creature of the night (compare lines 5–6 of this hymn). Madness (cf. OH 71i), suffering, and death are her gifts, and she is often described in bestial terms. Curse tablets, too, invoke this dread goddess for their efficacy.

However, Hekate also received more formal worship in antiquity, both civic and private. She was a goddess of crossroads (see line 1), and such places could receive offerings and contain an image of the goddess. Sacrifices to her were notorious for their use of dog meat as offerings (cf. line 5). Hekate was involved in mystery cults, and of particular interest to this hymn is that Pausanias reports of mystery rites performed in honor of Hekate on Aigina, rites that Orpheus himself was said to have introduced (2.30.2). For more information on the worship of Hekate, see Larson 2007, pp. 165–167.

1 of the roads and of the crossroads: The Greek word used here for “of the roads,” “enodia,” was also the name of a local goddess at Thessaly, a land that in antiquity was notorious for its connection with witches and witchcraft. For a particularly gruesome literary representation of such, see Lucan Civil War 6.413–830, especially 434–506. The crossroads are understood here to be the confluence of three roads. This number is of particular significance for Hekate, who is often described and depicted as triple-faced and/or triple-bodied.

2 in heaven, on earth, then in the sea: Hekate has a share in these same three realms in Hesiod’s praise of the goddess. Her widespread powers are further invoked in line

7. The collocation of heaven, earth, and sea appears throughout the collection; see OH 10.14–16+n.

2 saffron-cloaked: The same epithet is used of Melinoe, who might be another manifestation of Moon; see OH 71i+1n.

3 reveling: Hekate is described in terms of a wild Bacchant, a female worshipper of Dionysos; see OH 52i. The appellation “mountain-roaming” in line 8 has similar associations. Note also the Dionysian imagery implicit in the “herder of bulls” in line 7. Other goddesses described as maenads, or at least in maenadic terms, are the Nereids (OH 24.3+9–11n), Artemis (OH 36.2n), Demeter (OH 40.15+n), the Nymphs (OH 51.15–16+n), and the Erinyes (OH 69.2+n). Palaimon is also imagined as part of a Dionysian thiasos (see OH 75.1+n).

4 daughter of Perses: The hymn follows Hesiod’s genealogy, but we find others in the sources. The poet Bacchylides, drawing on Hekate’s chthonic pedigree, makes her the daughter of Night (fragment 1b). Kallimakhos is said to have called her a daughter of Demeter and Zeus, as do some Orphic sources (Orphic fragment 400), and a sister of Persephone, whom she seeks in the underworld after her abduction by Hades (Orphic fragment 466). Zeus is also her father according to Mousaios, but Asteria, as in Hesiod, is the mother, before she marries Perses (fragment 87).

8 nurturer of youths: As mentioned in the introduction to this hymn, this was a common epithet for Artemis. The identification is also suggested in line 4, “delighting in deer,” as this animal often is connected with Artemis in her role as “Mistress of Animals”; see OH 36i.

10 oxherd: This refers to some official of the cult. The figure is found in other Dionysian mystery cults as well; for example, see Alexander 1933 for a summary of a second century ^{AD} Greek inscription found near Tusculum that lists a number of initiates and their titles and Morand 2001, 249–282, for a detailed study.

2. To Prothyraia

“Prothyraia” literally means “at the door” or “at the door-way.” There is no goddess proper with this name. The word is a cult title shared by Eileithyia, Artemis, and even Hekate. Our hymn identifies her primarily as Eileithyia, the goddess of childbirth, who assists women in labor and who is invoked for a smooth delivery. Giving birth was fraught with danger in antiquity both for the woman and the child; compare Medeia’s famous assertion that she would rather stand in battle three times than to give birth once (Euripides Medeia 250–251). Artemis was also connected with childbirth (see OH

36.8), and this hymn explicitly equates all three goddesses at line 13. The chorus in Aeschylus' Suppliant Women prays to Artemis-Hekate as the goddess who protects women in childbirth (674–677). Moon, who is often identified with Artemis and Hekate, is called Eileithyia by Nonnus (Dionysiaca 38.150).

In myth and literature, Eileithyia is limited to her role in helping childbirth, most famously in the Homeric Hymn to Apollon (3.97–116). Hera, angry at Leto for having been impregnated by Zeus and about to give birth to Apollon, prevents Eileithyia from hearing about Leto, who is suffering greatly on the island of Delos, since she cannot give birth until Eileithyia comes. The other goddesses send Iris with a bribe to coax Eileithyia from Olympos. As soon as the goddess sets foot on the island, Leto goes into labor. In Ovid's account of the birth of Herakles (Metamorphoses 9.273–323), Eileithyia (spelled Ilithyia and also called by her Roman name, Lucina) sits by an altar outside the door of the house of the pregnant woman. She bunches her knees against her chest, holds them together in an embrace with her fingers locked, and chants magic spells. This is a case of sympathetic magic, where the goddess' position represents the blocking of the infant's passage out of the womb. Galanthis, a serving girl, is able to trick the goddess into releasing her knees, thus breaking the spell and allowing Herakles to be born. Ovid's story is quite intriguing, since the goddess is sitting outside the doorway and employing magic. It is quite possible that the poet has in mind the epithet "prothyraia," and the use of magic suggests associations with Hekate as well as Moon.

Hera herself has connections with the timing of giving birth, too. In Homer's brief account of the birth of Herakles (Iliad 19.114–119), Hera is the one who delays the birth of the hero by holding back the "Eileithyias" (the plural is also found at Iliad 11.269–270), while causing another birth, that of Eurystheus, to occur prematurely. Traditionally, Eileithyia is the daughter of Hera and Zeus, and the sibling of Hebe and Ares (Hesiod Theogony 921–923); note that the opening address to Mousaios mentions Eileithyia between Hebe and Herakles (an eventual wife/husband pair) at line 13. Pausanias also reports that the Kretans considered the goddess a daughter of Hera (1.18.5). Krete, in fact, boasts of a very early worship of Eileithyia. Homer mentions a cave of Eileithyia at Amnisos, near Knossos (Odyssey 19.188), and this has been corroborated with a listing in a Linear B tablet from Knossos, which calls for an offering of honey for Eileithyia at Amnisos, as well as the archaeological record, which spans from Neolithic to Roman times.

But Pausanias in the same passage mentions another account of Eileithyia, reporting the view that the goddess came to Delos from those famous mythological people from the far north, the Hyperboreans, in order to assist Leto in giving birth, presumably to Apollon and Artemis. The cult of Eileithyia was established on the island and thence spread to the rest of Greece. Pausanias also notes that the Delians sacrificed to Eileithyia and sang a hymn composed by Olen, a legendary poet and prophet—a figure very similar to Orpheus. Pausanias mentions the hymn of Olen in two other passages that suggest that this goddess might have been associated with an older cosmic power. At 9.27.2, Pausanias tells us that in Olen’s hymn Eileithyia is the mother of Eros. Elsewhere, Pausanias remarks that Olen called her “the good spinner” and surmises that Olen identified her with fate (8.21.3). We find a similar connection elsewhere. Both Pindar (Olympian Odes 6.41–42 and Nemean Odes 7.1–4) and Plato (Symposium 206d2) represent Eileithyia working in tandem with the Fates at birth. A story of Herakles’ birth similar to Ovid’s by the Greek poet Nikandros, summarized at Antoninus Liberalis 29, has the Fates assisting Eileithyia in preventing the birth; the serving girl who tricks the goddess is transformed by the Fates and receives some honor from Hekate and Herakles. Thus Eileithyia seems to have been imagined at times in the form of a personal Tyche or the individual Good Daimon (see OH 72i and OH 73i).

The position of the hymn in our collection is pregnant with symbolism. There is an emphasis on “birth” in the opening hymns, which are balanced by the last hymn dedicated to Death (see also OH 87i). Thus the collection is framed by both life and death, set in motion by the first hymn which addresses Hekate as “queen and mistress of the whole world” (OH 1.7). Prothyriaia/Eileithyia, as already mentioned, is sometimes identified with Hekate, so the transition is an easy one. Both Hekate and Eileithyia are portrayed in their iconography as bearing torches. This might have significance for the actual rite for which our hymns were composed, which probably began after nightfall (see the introduction to the translation and OH 3i). The initiates could very well have been carrying torches as the hymns were performed. Graf suggests that this hymn was sung as the initiates proceeded indoors to wherever the ritual was enacted (Graf/Johnston 2007, p. 155).

3. To Night

Night (Greek Nux) is personified in Hesiod. She is born from Khaos along with her brother Erebus, with whom she mates and bears Ether and Day (Theogony 123–125; see also OH 5i). Night produces by means of parthenogenesis a brood of personified abstractions, notably for our collection Death, Sleep, and the race of Dreams (Theogony 211–225; cf. lines 5–7 of this hymn and OH 85i). Hesiod also mentions Night in connection with the geography of the underworld. She owns a house, where her children Sleep and Death also live. Day lives there, too, but is never there at the same time at Night; they only greet each other as one leaves and the other returns from the world above (Theogony 744–761; cf. lines 10–11 and see also OH 78.4–5+n). Night perhaps should be seen as belonging to a pre-Olympian generation of divinities in Homer. In the Iliad, as Hera tries to cajole Sleep into inducing Zeus to slumber, Sleep maintains his readiness to bring his gift to all gods, even Okeanos, the father of the gods (14.246, and see OH 83i), but recalls the catastrophe barely averted the last time he put Zeus to sleep against his will. At that time, he escaped the anger of Zeus by the intervention of Night (implied to be Sleep's mother?), who is described as having power over immortals and mortals and whom Zeus is hesitant to displease (14.256–261). It is not clear what place Night has in Homer's cosmology, but the respect and fear Zeus shows and feels toward her suggests that Homer considered her to be an old and powerful figure.

This is the role she has in various Orphic theogonies, where she is considered to be among the earliest divinities. In light of the Homeric passage, it is first interesting to note that Night gives Zeus oracular advice, e.g., on how to reconstitute the world (Orphic fragment 241; cf. also 113 and 237). In the Rhapsodies there are up to three individual Nights (see West 1983, p. 70, and Betegh 2003, pp. 141–142). The first one existed before Protogonos (Orphic fragment 112–113). Another Night is the daughter of Protogonos (Orphic fragment 148), who later abdicates his throne to her in the symbolic passing of his scepter (Orphic fragment 168–171; see also OH 6i and OH 10.26+n; cf. Iliad 2.100–108 for similar symbolism). She (or a third Night?) also appears as Protogonos' lover and gives birth to Sky and Earth (Orphic fragment 149; see also OH 4i). In other theogonies similar to those ascribed to Orpheus, Night is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, beings. Mousaios puts her among Tartaros and Aer (fragment 81), while Epimenides places her alongside Aer as the two primeval beings (fragment 46). Aristotle notes that even “the ancient poets” do not claim that the primeval beings (mentioned are Night, Sky, Khaos, and Okeanos) “are king or rule,” but rather Zeus (Metaphysics 1091b4–6). He does not name names, but it is possible that for Okeanos he had Homer in mind, and for Khaos Hesiod. Night and Sky do not correspond to any known theogony, but, the fact that our collection has a hymn to Night as “mother of gods and men” followed by a hymn to Sky who is called “father of all,” suggests that perhaps there was such an Orphic theogony, now lost to us, circulating in antiquity and well known by Aristotle's time; see OH 4i and also OH O.24, where Night is called “oldest of all.”

In terms of cultic worship, there are very few instances. Pausanias mentions an oracle of Night on the acropolis of Megara, along with a temple to Dionysos, a temple to Zeus, and a sanctuary to Aphrodite (1.40.6). Note that Night has oracular powers in the Orphic poems, as mentioned already. In Pergamon, where there was a mystery cult to Demeter, religious officials dedicated a number of altars to various gods and goddesses; one official, a hymnetria (a female singer of hymns), is attested to have dedicated an altar to Night, Rites, and Happenstance (see Nilsson 1961, p. 355). The connection between night and rites probably is indicative of the setting of the ritual. Likewise, the early placement of our hymn as well as the appeal at the end for Night to make an appearance before the initiates suggest that the rites for which the collection was written probably began after sunset and proceeded throughout the night (see also OH 54.5+n, OH 78i, OH 86i, and the introduction to the translation).

1 mother of gods and men: This is answered by “father of all” in the first line of the following hymn to Sky. See also OH 10.1n.

2 Kypris: Another name of Aphrodite, used also at OH 22.7 and OH 65.7. It is appropriate here of Night, who is given generative powers; cf. OH 55.2 where Aphrodite is called “revered goddess of generation” and someone who “like[s] the night-long revel.” Among the progeny of Night reported by Hesiod (Theogony 224), we find Deception (Greek Apatē) and Sexual Passion (Greek Philotēs), both representing characteristics normally associated with Aphrodite; see also OH 55i and OH 59i. Just as Night, so too is Aphrodite called the “mother of gods and men” in the magical papyri (PGM 4.2916), and she “give[s] birth to all” at OH 55.5 (cf. also lines 3 and 12 of that hymn).

4 delight in the quiet: So too Moon at OH 9.8. Moon is also called “mother of gods and men” in the magical papyri (PGM 4.2832–2833) and, in fact, even addressed as Night (PGM 4.2857), among a host of other names.

6: These functions are normally handled by Sleep; see OH 85.8n.

8–11: These lines have many echoes in the following hymn: both divinities are described as terrestrial (as part of their nature), both move in a circle, both are constrained by Necessity; see OH 4.3n. Night can be considered both terrestrial and celestial because, as alluded to in lines 10–11 and just as Hesiod describes (see the introduction to this hymn), she alternates her time in the worlds above and below with Day, and vice versa; see also OH 4.5n and OH 7.9n. Orpheus’ address to Mousaios mentions Night and Day together (OH O.24). That she is always incomplete suggests the continuity of Night and Day’s alternation: Night is always changing (cf. also OH 4.7n and OH 10.21–24n).

4. To Sky

Sky (Greek Ouranos) is one of the chief primeval figures in Greek mythology. As a sky god, he is eventually supplanted by his grandson Zeus. In Hesiod’s Theogony, Sky is son and husband of Earth (126–153), and Kronos is their son who, in fact, conspired with Earth to castrate his father (154–210). The marriage between Sky and Earth fits the common mythological motif of the marriage between Father Sky and Mother Earth (see also OH 15i). Their children are the (cosmic) Kyklopes, the Hundred-Handers, and the Titans. Orphic theogony seems to have integrated, or at least borrowed liberally, from the Hesiodic account that had become almost canonical. In the Rhapsodies, Night and Protogonos produce Sky and Earth, who thereupon marry and produce children, including the Fates, Kyklopes, and Hundred-Handers; the Titans, of whom there are fourteen instead of the Hesiodic twelve (added are Phorkys and Dione; for the latter, see OH O.19+n), are born from Earth without the knowledge of Sky. Night raises this brood, and all of the Titans except Okeanos take part in the castration of Sky. As with Hesiod, the Giants and Aphrodite are born from this act (Orphic fragment 149 and 174–189; for Aphrodite Ourania, see OH O.40n and OH 55i+1n). In another version, Sky and Earth are born from the two halves of the egg out of which Protogonos is hatched; see OH 6.2n. Sky appears on the Bacchic gold tablets as well. In no less than twelve the initiate claims to be born of Earth and “starry Sky” (nos. 1, 2, 8, 10–14, 16, 18, 25, 29) and in three of these to be of the “heavenly race” as well (nos. 2, 8, 29; for interpretation, see Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 111–116). This probably is intended to link the initiate, as a human being, with the Titans, whose destruction by Zeus engendered the human race (see OH 37i). A further connection between Sky qua “heaven” and human beings might be in the notion that the soul, as the sky, is composed of fire; for this idea, cf. OH 5.3 and see OH 66.9n.

Our hymn does not give much information about Sky’s mythology, although there would be little need since the initiates would know the story, whatever versions they had at their disposal. Instead, Sky is treated here more as the vague personification of a celestial phenomenon. This is not surprising, as Sky in myth is a rather colorless figure whose function seems more to give the later gods an ancient pedigree than to serve as a concrete expression of religious sentiment. Indeed, this might explain why the hymn to Sky appears in this position in the collection and before the one to Ether and Protogonos, both of whom come into existence before Sky. The hymn to Night opens with reference to her role as “mother of gods and men” (OH 3.1), while Sky is called “father of all” right at the start. There are other connections between these two hymns that further reinforce their pairing (see notes passim). It is also suggestive that he is not linked with Earth, as one would expect. Might, then, Sky be invoked as representative of the masculine power of generation, being the oldest such being, paired with Night as the feminine power of generation, also in turn being the oldest of her kind? It would fit the pattern of hymns arranged in male/female pairings, a structural technique found throughout the collection (see OH 14.8–9n). Furthermore, Sky is said to succeed Night in a brief notice found in a commentary on Aristotle’s Metaphysics by Alexander of Aphrodisias, where the order of generation is given as Khaos, Okeanos, Night, Sky, and Zeus, king of the immortal gods (Orphic fragment 370). It is possible that our composer was aware of this or a similar cosmogony and was perhaps influenced by such to give Night a male analogue (see also OH 3i). Sky, then, could be the son and/or junior partner of Night. Be that as it may, the fact remains that this hymn to Sky breaks the sequence Night-Ether-Protogonos that one might have expected based on our extant sources (see further OH 5i).

1 father of all: This continues the theme of birth found in the early hymns; cf. the first line of the previous hymn to Night, “mother of gods and men,” and “the begetter of blessed gods and mortal men” used of Protogonos at OH 6.3.

2 beginning of all, end of all: Zeus is also so addressed in the Hymns; see OH 15.7+n.

3 lord of the universe, moving about the earth like a sphere: This suggests a geocentric view of the universe, as, for example, Ptolemy maintained (see OH 34.16–23n), as opposed to the heliocentric hypothesis of Aristarkhos of Samos (third century ^{BC}), which might have been known to our composer. “Moving about the earth” is also found at Kleanthes Hymn to Zeus 7, in the same exact position of the hexameter line, used of the universe (kosmos) that dutifully obeys Zeus’ rule. Diogenes Laertius reports that Pythagoras was the first to call the sky “universe” (8.48). Night in the previous hymn also moves in circular fashion (see OH 3.9+8–11n). See further OH 7.8+n, OH 27.9n, and OH 40.15+n.

4 home of the blessed gods: Sky is “the firm seat of all the blessed gods” already in Hesiod (Theogony 128); compare also OH 5.1+n. Hestia, too, is called the same thing (OH 84.5).

4 your motion is a roaring whirl: Sun is similarly described; see OH 8.7+n. The word translated as “roaring” is “rhombos,” which more properly designates either the bull-roarer or kettle-drums, both of which were used in ecstatic and mystery cults, particularly ones tied to Dionysos and the various Eastern mother goddesses; see OH 27.11n and OH 31.2, where the Kouretes are literally called “rhombosters” (“rhombētai”). It is quite possible that in the performative context of our hymns such an instrument would have been used and perhaps even supplemented the singing of lines such as this one that indicate either the instrument itself or the sound it makes. The rhombos is also one of the toys that the Titans used to lure the child Dionysos to his death (Orphic fragment 306 and 578).

5 celestial and terrestrial guard: Sky participates in both parts of the cosmos (see note to line 3); so, too, does Night (see OH 3.8+8–11n). Sky, insofar as he is identified with the sky, naturally becomes viewed as a being who sees all that passes under him, just like Sun and Zeus (see line 8 and OH 8.1n). Orpheus is said to have called Sky both the “watcher and guardian of all things” (Orphic fragment 151), and his name was at times thought to derive from the Greek word “ouros,” meaning “watcher”; Plato Cratylus 396b–c gives an alternate etymology from a phrase in

6 Physis’ invincible drive: The invincible drive is Necessity; see OH 55.3n. For the personified Physis, see OH 10i.

7 shimmering, variform: There is a play on words in the Greek (“panaiole,” “aiolomorphe”). The reference here is probably to the changing nature of the sky due to meteorological phenomena; cf. OH 3.8–11n.

8 all-seeing: A number of celestial divinities possess this attribute; see OH 8.1n.

5. To Ether

The upper atmosphere tended in antiquity to be divided into two levels: the lower, misty air that we breathe and the higher, and hence purer, stratum of ether. This conception is already found in Homer; at Iliad 14.286–288, Sleep climbs up the largest fir tree on Mount Ida, which is said to “reach the ether through the air.” Ether is usually considered to be composed of fire or to be fire itself. Hesiod tells us (Theogony 124–125) that Ether and Day were born from Erebus and Night (it is interesting to note that two dark entities produce two bright ones, as light follows day in Genesis). Ether is one of the primordial beings in Orphic cosmogony (Orphic fragment 78 and 111). Along with Khaos and Erebus, he was born from the serpentine Time. The cosmic egg out of which Protogonos hatched is said to be either made out of, or placed in, Ether by Time (see OH 6i+1n), and thus Ether is considered his father (Orphic fragment 124–125). This probably explains why the hymn to Protogonos immediately follows, intervening between this hymn and those to the other celestial entities: the Stars, Sun, and Moon. However, as with Sky, Ether is presented less as an anthropomorphic deity and more as a cosmic principle in the form of the highest and purest expression of fire. Both deities are connected, with Sky presented as an embodiment of physical space and Ether as physical substance constitutive of that space. This may have facilitated Sky’s placement in the collection; see OH 4i.

1 Zeus’ lofty dwelling: Zeus is often imagined as inhabiting the ether (e.g., Iliad 4.166, Hesiod Works and Days 18, and Orphic fragment 852). It is an appropriate location for a sky god, and, as ether is connected with fire, for a god who wields the fiery lightning bolt; see OH 19i. Note that Hestia is called “home of the blessed gods” (OH 84.5), and she, too, is strongly connected with fire. Sky, who is closely associated with the ether, is also the “home of the blessed gods” (see OH 4.4+n).

2: The stars, sun, and moon all are located in the upper air, and so Ether may rightly be said to “claim a share.” But since Ether is a bright, primordial being that appears before the others in cosmological speculation, he might be thought to “claim a share” in the sense that he was the first to perform the functions of the younger beings; children abrogating their parents’ prerogatives is a recurring theme in mythological thought. Note that the Stoics held that the sun, stars, and even the moon were formed from the ether (see, e.g., Long and Sedley 1987, fragment 47D and Plutarch De facie quae in orbe lunae apparet 928c–d, where this view is rejected). Even more pertinent here is that all celestial phenomena—ether, sun, stars, moon—are said to be “parts of Hephaistos” at OH 66.6–7, who is conceived as a quasi-personified form of the element fire. The order “stars—sun—moon” in this line mirrors the order of their respective hymns and is probably intentional.

3 life’s spark for every creature: For the soul as composed out of the element fire, see OH 66.9+n.

4 best cosmic element: Empedokles’ theory of the four elements (or, as he called them, “roots”) that constitute the physical world was accepted—with some variations and elaborations—throughout antiquity. They are earth, water, air, and fire; these manifest themselves in larger physical bodies, i.e., the earth proper, sea, lower air, and ether, whose fiery and luminous qualities are mentioned in the surrounding lines of this hymn; see also OH 11.2–3+n and 13–17. For the use of the four elements as a structural motif in the collection, see OH 15i. That Ether (i.e., fire) is the “best” of the four may be a reflection of Pythagorean and/or Stoic doctrine, which regarded fire as the element at the head of the creation of the universe and into which all physical bodies eventually disintegrate. Hephaistos qua fire is called the “blameless element/most sublime” (OH 66.4–5+n).

6 temperate and clear: Ether is here being treated as a weather phenomenon, not as a cosmic force, almost loosely being identified with the sky. We find a similar conception at the end of the hymn to Boreas, the north wind, where there is also a request for fair weather and mention is made of Ether and the sun’s rays (OH 80.5–6+n). Sun is called “the clear” (OH 8.14) with the same connotation of favorable weather, and the Kouretes are asked to bring “clear weather” in their second hymn (OH 38.24–25).

6. To Protogonos

Protogonos (First-born, Primeval) is the name/epithet of one of the most important figures in Orphic cosmological speculation. This being has many appellations: Phanes (Bright One), Metis (Counsel, Resourcefulness, Wisdom), Eubouleus (He of Good Counsel), Antauges (The One Reflecting Light), Eros, among others. He shares with Dionysos the names Eubouleus, Erikepaios, and Bromios and is indeed identified at times with Dionysos himself (see OH 52.6+n) as well as Zeus. For convenience and consistency, we shall refer to this god as Protogonos. In the cosmogonies found in the Rhapsodies and in Hieronymos' account, Protogonos is born from an egg that Time has a role in creating (see note to line 1) and is a teratomorphic creature. He is portrayed with golden wings, and he seems to have been described in the Rhapsodies as having four (pairs of) eyes, four heads (ram, bull, lion, serpent; cf. Euripides Bacchae 1017–1019 and OH 50.5n), and four (pairs of) horns, while in Hieronymos' cosmogony he has bulls' heads growing from his sides and a serpent's head that nonetheless resembles all kinds of beastly shapes (Orphic fragment 80 and 129–136). Protogonos is the first “king” of the universe (Orphic fragment 165–167; cf. 86), who later passes this title on to his daughter/lover Night (see OH 3i). We find Protogonos described as creating the various attributes of the (material) universe and the gods themselves (Orphic fragment 144–164; see also line 3 and note); it is no accident that the following hymns in our collection are addressed to the Stars, Sun, Moon, and Physis. Moreover, Ether plays a role in the birth of this god (see OH 5i), and the placement of the hymn to Ether before this one is probably a reflection of this genealogy. Protogonos is the first name in one of the Bacchic gold tablets (no. 4). This tablet is very strange: it is in the form of a prayer addressed to a number of divinities (including Phanes, who is listed some distance apart from Protogonos) with nonsensical groups of letters sprinkled throughout. A relief from Modena (second century AD) depicts a figure that appears to have some connection with Protogonos (see West 1983, pp. 253–255).

1 two-natured: This probably refers to Protogonos' androgyny. The same word is used of Dionysos (OH 30.2), Mise (OH 42.4), and Eros (OH 58.4); Mise is also explicitly called both male and female. See also OH 9.4n.

1 ether-tossed: In the Rhapsodies, Time places the egg from which Protogonos is born in Ether (Orphic fragment 114); in Hieronymos' version, Time fashions the egg out of its children Ether, Khaos, and Erebus (Orphic fragment 78–79).

2: In the theogony attributed to Hieronymos, the bottom half of the egg becomes Earth, the upper part Sky, and betwixt them is the “two-bodied” Phanes; see Orphic fragment 80 and compare the two egg halves on the relief from Modena. The separation of the sky and the earth is a very old motif found in Sumerian, Babylonian, Egyptian, and Hittite cosmologies. The chorus of birds in Aristophanes' Birds give an account of the creation of the world which includes an egg out of which golden-winged Eros is hatched (685–704). Eros, traditionally represented as winged (as in OH 58.2), is another name for Protogonos, as mentioned in the introduction to this hymn. Similarly, an invocation to Eros in the magical papyri lists a number of attributes that suggest an affinity with this Orphic divinity: golden-winged, first-born, invisible, and yet light-producing (PGM 4.1748–1810). It is not clear, however, if Aristophanes is drawing from an Orphic source. Protogonos’ birth from the egg is not attested until later, so this could have been influenced by Aristophanes or perhaps it comes from a common third source (which need not originally have been Orphic). We should also keep in mind that Aristophanes is more interested in eliciting a chuckle rather than dutifully reporting actual cult practice and that what he presents is being filtered through the fun-house mirror of comedy. It is reflecting something, but what that “something” might be is difficult to determine without sufficient comparanda.

3 begetter of blessed gods and mortal men: An attribute he shares with Zeus, who in the Rhapsodies is said to have swallowed Protogonos under the direction of Night and from this act reenacted the creation originally performed by Protogonos (see OH 15.3–5n). Okeanos is also similarly addressed in the collection (OH 83.2), and Pan, who is sometimes identified with Protogonos, is the “begetter of all” (OH 11.10). Also in the Rhapsodies, Protogonos is said to carry “the famous seed of the gods” (Orphic fragment 140), and this is probably what “of the many seeds” (line 10) is intended (in part) to indicate (note, too, that Physis is a “giver of wealth of seeds”; see OH 10.19). Protogonos is strictly speaking not the first being in the various Orphic theogonies, but he is “first-born” in the sense of being the first to come into existence by a kind of procreation (via the egg) and/or the first god to procreate in the narrow sense of sexual intercourse (albeit with him/her/itself). This ambiguity is underlined by the direct juxtaposition of “begetter” and “seed” in the Greek text as well as by the different connotations of “seed” in the Greek language that this hymn exploits. The “seed unforgettable” in line 4, as the singular implies, refers to Protogonos himself (see also OH 50.2+n), while the “many seeds” in line 10 represents his cosmic generative powers. A similar oxymoron is found in line 5, “ineffable, hidden, brilliant scion” (see also note to line 8). Dionysos/Erikepaios is addressed as “father and son of the gods” in OH 52.6.

3 bellows like a bull: As mentioned in the introduction to this hymn, the head(s) of a bull are part of the physical makeup of this composite being; cf. Orphic fragment 130: “discharging bulls’ bellows and those of a fierce lion.” This animal is particularly connected with Dionysos, who can take the form of a bull or otherwise shares the features of a bull; see OH 30.3–4n.

4 Erikepaios: This non-Greek name also appears in OH 52.6 as an alternate name to Dionysos; note, too, that the word translated there as “primeval” could also be understood as the proper name Protogonos (and see note to line 3 “begetter of blessed gods and mortal men” above). The late author Malalas says that the name means “giver of life” (Orphic fragment 97). An alternate version of the name, Irikepaïos, appears in a fragmentary papyrus from the middle of the third century ^{BC} (the Gurôb Papyrus), where it is invoked along with Eubouleus, Pallas, and perhaps Protogonos and Demeter and where it might be another name for Dionysos; see the translation in Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 188–189. The line “attended by many rites” has been taken by scholars as evidence for the widespread appearance of this god in actual Orphic practice. An altar from the second century ^{AD} at Hierokaisareia in Lydia was dedicated by a hierophant to “Dionysos Erikepaïos.”

5–7 in whirring motion... you whirled about throughout this world: The verb that appears in this hymn as “whirled” (“dinētheis”) is found in an interesting fragment preserved by Macrobius where the name Dionysos is fancifully derived from it (Orphic fragment 540). In this fragment, Time reveals to the gods a being known by the names Eros, Phanes, Dionysos, Eubouleus, and Antauges (also mentioned in line 9 of our hymn). For Eubouleus, see OH 41.8n. As for the “whirring motion” of line 5, a similar description of movement is found for Sun and others in the Hymns; see OH 8.7n.

8: Another oxymoron (see note to line 3). Despite being invisible to the naked eye (cf. line 5), Protogonos is the source of light and thus seems to take on a function similar to Sun. Macrobius explicitly says that Orpheus called Phanes “Sun” (Orphic fragment 540). Although he has wings, he is also imagined to drive a chariot, much like Sun (Orphic fragment 172–173), while Sun is occasionally described as winged in poetry (see West 1983, p. 215). The name Phanes in antiquity was connected with light, as here, or sometimes with the verb “phainō,” which in its active sense means to “show, reveal” (Protogonos brings light to the universe for the first time; thus the hidden, unrevealed being in turn “reveals” it) and its passive sense to “appear” (Protogonos is “first-born,” being the first living thing to appear; cf. Orphic fragment 126).

9 Priapos: A curious reference. Priapos is connected with Dionysos in cult. According to Athenaios, the people of Lampsakos even considered Priapos to be another name for Dionysos (1.30b–c); however, Pausanias reports that they considered him to be the son of Dionysos and Aphrodite (9.31.2). Inasmuch as Eros, a son of Aphrodite in myth, is sometimes identified with Protogonos, this might have facilitated an identification between Priapos and Protogonos, if Pausanias is correct. Then, too, Priapos is a god with definite fertility connections, particularly sexual, and is usually portrayed as ithyphallic (e.g., Boardman 1975, pl. 335.1). Such an association also overlaps with Protogonos as a creator; see the note to line 3. Furthermore, Priapos is a rustic entity, who protects flocks and gardens, and is sometimes found in Dionysos’ retinue. Thus in his functions, he bears a close affinity to Pan, another divinity that is sometimes equated with Protogonos, and this is another possible avenue by which Priapos could have been eventually connected with Protogonos; see also OH 11.10–12n.

10 many counsels: The Greek word “polumēti” puns on Metis, yet another name for Protogonos (see the introduction to this hymn).

7. To the Stars

The stars did not receive cult honors in Greek religion, although some mystery cults, notably Mithraism, did call on the stars as divine beings as our hymn does. Constellations were identified with various objects and personages already in Homer, and they were employed to mark weather phenomena for agricultural and nautical endeavors; see Hesiod’s Works and Days and, for a more self-consciously literary treatment, Aratos’ Phainomena. In later antiquity the importance of the stars extended to astrology, particularly in connection with the destiny of individuals; cf. the similar role of Tyche (OH 72i). Heroes such as Herakles could be considered to have been turned into stars upon their death. In classical times, there was popular belief that all people became a star after their death (see Aristophanes Peace 832–841). This belief lived on, but another conception, opposite to this one, developed in later antiquity. Each star corresponded to a living person—a case of natural sympathy akin to the connection between Hamadryads and their trees (see OH 51.14+n)—and a shooting star implied that someone on earth had died (see Pliny the Elder Natural History 2.6). This belief was doubtlessly connected with the idea of the stars as responsible for individual destiny. The one constant in these various views is the conviction that celestial phenomena are somehow connected with terrestrial affairs. Our hymn shares this view but also treats the stars as minor divinities aloof from the humans whose fate they map out in their nightly wanderings.

This hymn forms with the following two to Sun and Moon a triplet of ones dedicated to celestial phenomena. They probably owe their position in the collection to their early appearance in ancient cosmogonies; see further OH 6i.

2 holy daimones: Mythological figures are often connected with constellations, usually as a result of transformation; for example, see the story of Callisto and Arcas in Ovid Metamorphoses 2.401–507. Important gods were assigned to the planets, but lesser ones to the stars. For example, the seven stars of the Pleiades were identified with the seven daughters of Atlas, one of whom, Maia, was the mother of Hermes. The association of specific deities with specific celestial bodies easily slides into a vague notion that the stars are simply generic minor divinities, as is the case in our hymn.

3 children of black Night: A genealogy based on observation. Hesiod on the other hand says Dawn is the mother of the winds, the Morning Star, and—curiously—all the stars (see OH 78i). West suggests that Hesiod started with the Morning Star being a child of Dawn, which does conform to observation, and then brought all the other stars into this relation “by association” (West 1971, pp. 270–271). It is possible that Night is made their mother here because of the Stars’ chthonic nature (see line 9 and note), perhaps even to strengthen it. In Orphic cosmogony, the stars, as well as the other celestial bodies, are created by Protogonos (Orphic fragment 153, and see OH 6i) and then recreated by Zeus (see OH 15.3–5n). Note that the Fates are the daughters of Night, too (OH 59.1).

8: This line, as well as the circular movement mentioned in line 4, refers to the place of the stars in the cosmos according to geocentric astronomical teachings; see OH 4.3n. The seven luminous orbits are the movements of the five planets (Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn), the sun, and the moon. They were conceived to be attached to spherical rings and to rotate in perfect circles around the spherical earth. The stars in this system usually were not thought to move but were understood to be affixed to the outmost, inert sphere (for Plato, though, they moved, albeit in the opposite direction from the rest of the celestial bodies; see OH 8.9n). The Homeric Hymn to Ares also alludes to the seven orbits and, at least in part, addresses the planet as well as the god. This information suggests that it is a late hymn that had been added to the Homeric collection (see OH 65i).

9 in heaven and on earth: As with Night (OH 3.8+8–11n), their mother, and Sky (OH 4.5+n), so, too, are the Stars connected both to the celestial and earthly realms. Their chthonic nature might also be a result of their connection with the dead. Sometimes the soul is imagined as returning to the stars (see Cicero De respublica 6.18), and we have already noted the old folk belief that stars are born when people die (see the introduction to this hymn and further OH 15i and OH 59.3–4n).

12–13: These lines give us clues as to the content of the ritual in which our collection was employed, but not enough specific details for any certain inferences. The “learned contests” might indicate a competition that was held among initiates or that served as part of the rite for those about to be initiated. That they are “learned” suggests they were intellectual and treated points of cultic lore. Perhaps they were in the form of a catechism. The Stars, like other addressees in the collection, are invited to join the festivities; however, what is unusual in this case is that it is not just their presence but their direct participation that is desired. The word “race,” like the Greek word it translates, “dromos,” may signify a competition or the mere act of motion. The word “dromos” appears in the second part of a compound in line 9, where it has the latter connotation (“puridromoi,” meaning “blazing trail”). It is often used to describe celestial motion, and here it is “noble” because it is part of the cosmic order, which has an ethical dimension (see OH 8.16n). Thus the stars’ natural course coheres with the movements of the ritual, and so the participants of the ritual might have felt that they themselves also became participants in the cosmic order. Another possible interpretation is that the context suggests an agonistic interpretation of “race” but it is difficult to see against whom the Stars would be racing. In Alkman’s Parthenion (PMGF 1) the group of young girls, whose performance of the poem is an act of worship in a state cult, at one point say they are “fighting” the star cluster of the Pleiades; one interpretation of these hotly-debated lines is that the girls, perhaps with (mock?) consternation, are worried that they will not finish their nightly ritual before the Pleiades set and dawn appears. Our participants were almost certainly engaged in a nightly ritual, too (see OH 3i), but there is nothing in our hymn to suggest that they are competing with the Stars; indeed, the Stars are invited to join the proceedings. Perhaps the Stars are summoned to help the initiates complete their rite before the arrival of dawn (see OH 78i). In this case, the “works of renown” would denote the ritual itself. The same phrase appears again of Nike, who is asked to come to the initiates “for works of renown” (OH 33.9+i), and Mise is also asked at the end of her hymn to attend the contests of the ritual (OH 42.11+n); see also OH 28.2n, OH 30i, OH 76.12+n, and OH 87.12n.

8. To the Sun

The veneration of the sun in ancient times involves complexities. The only major cult center was on the island Rhodes, but scholars suspect that this cult was not of great antiquity. Pindar celebrates the island with three myths, including Sun’s love of the island; they produced seven sons, the ancestors of the island’s inhabitants, and their grandchildren became the eponymous founders of the three main cities on the island (Olympian Odes 7.20–80). These cities combined to found the federal city Rhodes in 408 BC, which instituted a festival, the Halieia, that included athletic and musical contests. In 282 BC the inhabitants contracted the Colossus of Rhodes to be built, an enormous bronze statue of the personified sun and one of the so-called seven wonders of the ancient world. Rhodes, though, seems to be the main exception that proves the rule; references in Herodotos (1.131), Aristophanes (Peace 406–413), and Plato (Cratylus 397c) suggest that cultic worship of the sun and moon was considered to be a characteristic of non-Greek cultures. Nevertheless, the sun did figure prominently as an oath deity, as we see already in Homer (e.g., Iliad 3.103–104, invoked along with Earth and Zeus). And there is evidence of more humble devotion. Children would clap their hands and call for the sun to come out when a cloud obscured it (Aristophanes fragment 404). One might greet the sun and moon with a prayer or some other ritual action (e.g., Plato Laws 887d–e). Such an act is reported to have appeared in a lost play by Aeschylus, Bassarai or Bassarides (The Thracian Bacchantes). According to the summaries of this play we find in later sources, Orpheus, after his experience in the underworld, neglected his previous worship of his father, Dionysos, and instead began to venerate the sun, whom he called Apollon; he would climb Mount Pangaion (“pangaion” means “all-earth”) to offer a prayer to the rising sun; Dionysos in anger incited the Thracian Bacchantes at the end of one of their nocturnal revels to tear Orpheus apart limb-by-limb (see Orphic fragment 536). The equivalence of Apollon-Sun seems to have been first made by philosophers in the fifth century ^{BC} (Parmenides and Empedokles); a fragment of Sophokles also suggests this (see note to line 13 “Zeus”). In the ideal city-state depicted in the Laws, Plato makes the highest magistrates priests of both Apollon and Sun. The identification of these two divinities also occurs in the Orphic corpus (Orphic fragment 102, 323, 413). A vase from Olbia, which may have Orphic connections, contains this inscription: “Life Life Apollon Apollon Sun Sun Cosmos Cosmos Light Light” (Orphic fragment 537; see also Graf/Johnston 2007, p. 188). It is unclear when this equivalence was first attributed to Orpheus, but Aeschylus’ play suggests at least the earlier part of the fifth century. This raises the interesting question of whether the philosophers might have adopted the identification from an Orphic cult or vice versa. Also connected with the name Orpheus is a hymn to Sun (Orphic fragment 538–545) in which this divinity is equated with Zeus, Hades, Dionysos, Eubouleus, Phanes, and Antauges (see OH 6i, and note to line 9 below). The extensive identification speaks of Hellenistic provenance or later. Sun as a distinct being does not play a large role in mythology. Probably the most important and famous story is that of his son Phaethon, who asked for, and was given, leave to drive Sun’s chariot; but the lad was unable to maintain control the team and was killed by Zeus’ thunderbolt as the chariot careened to the earth, threatening a catastrophic conflagration (Ovid Metamorphoses 1.746–2.400). More relevant to our collection is his interaction with Demeter in identifying Hades as the abductor of Persephone; see note to line 1.

As with Sky, Ether, and Moon, the mythology and the cultic aspects of Sun are absent from the hymn. It is Sun’s place in the cosmic order—including its ethical dimension—that is emphasized, and here the philosophical tradition has made its mark. Many of the ideas can be traced back to the Pre-Socratics; see the notes passim. But above all it is the traditional imagery that dominates by its repetition: the all-seeing eye and the golden, life-nourishing light driven by the swift four-horse chariot. Compare this hymn with the Homeric Hymn to the Sun, as well as Mesomedes’ and Proclus’ hymns to Sun. He is also invoked in the magical papyri (see in particular PGM 1.297–327, 341– 347; 3.187–262; 4.436–461, 930–1114, 1928–2005; 8.74–81). See also OH 34i.

1 eternal eye that sees all: Sun, in his capacity as a celestial god, is often portrayed as perceiving all events that take place on earth. We list a few of the more famous examples. It is Sun who finds out about the affair between Ares and Aphrodite, Hephaistos' wife, and who informs the lame god of this indignity (Odyssey 8.270–272 and 302). In the Homeric Hymn to Demeter, Sun, along with Hekate (probably in her capacity as moon-goddess), perceives Hades' abduction of Persephone (2.24–27 and 62–90; see OH 9.3n and OH 41i). Finally, the fettered Prometheus calls to witness a host of natural phenomena and concludes by invoking the “all-seeing orb of the sun” at Aeschylus Prometheus Bound 88–92. The idea of Sun as witness is surely related to his role in oaths; see the introduction to this hymn and note to line 17. Other divinities described as all-seeing in the collection are Sky (OH 4.8), Moon (OH 9.7), Apollon (OH 34.8 and 11), Zeus (OH 59.13), Nemesis (OH 61.2 and 8), Dike (OH 62.1), and the Erinyes (OH 69.15, connected with Dike). The latter three also connect perspicuous vision with justice (see note to line 16 below). The sun is referred to as “the sublime eye of weightless fire” at OH 11.17.

2 Hyperion: This is actually the name of Sun's traditional father, one of the original twelve Titans. For Hesiod's genealogy, see OH 9i.

3 self-born, untiring: The idea that the sun reforms each day goes back to the philosopher Xenophanes (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 175) and perhaps Herakleitos (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 225; see also Kirk, Raven, and Schofield's commentary on both fragments). It is also found in the magical papyri. The phoenix, a legendary bird that was supposed to recreate itself from the ashes of his father, was sometimes thought to radiate fire, and Herodotos (2.73) reports that it brings the corpse of his father to the temple of Sun in Heliopolis, Egypt. That the sun is born again anew every day is probably a reasonable, if fantastical, extension of the observation that fire alone of the elements is capable of self-generation (see Theophrastos On Fire 1). The sun is already called “untiring” in Homer (Iliad 18.239, 484). Compare the opening of Mimnermos fragment 12.1–3: “For Sun has obtained by lot a labor for all his days,/and there is never any respite/for his horses or himself.” The Greek words translated here as “self-born” and “untiring” are also used of Herakles in OH 12.9.

7 endless whirl: The same motion is ascribed to Sky (see OH 4.4+n) and Zeus the Thunderbolt (OH 19.10); compare the motion of Protogonos, who is sometimes identified with the sun (see OH 6.5–7+n), and likewise Physis (OH 10.21–24n).

9: The idea that heavenly bodies produce musical notes in their revolutions and that together they form a harmony goes back to the Pythagoreans, perhaps even Pythagoras himself. Their views are probably what Aristotle describes in De caelo 290b21–29. In book ten of the Republic, Plato describes a system where there rotate on the Spindle of Necessity eight whorls, on which the earth, sun, moon, planets, and stars move; also on each whorl sits a Siren who utters a pure note of a certain pitch, and they together produce a harmony; the three Fates sing along of the past, present, and future (616b–617d). See also OH 7.8n. A late source reports that some believed the seven notes on Orpheus’ lyre were tuned to the rotations of seven celestial bodies; for an account of how this developed and its probable Pythagorean origins, see West 1983, pp. 29–32, and OH 11i. Such an image could very well have influenced our hymn, even though Sun should be producing one of the notes, not playing the lyre that produces the whole harmony. The lyre is typically associated with Apollon; but since the sun is associated with this god (see the introduction to this hymn, and note to line 12 below), it would be natural to transfer this attribute to him, and, in fact, the hymn to Apollon gives a fuller description of the cosmic lyre (OH 34.16–23+n). The Stoic Kleantes is reported to have called the sun “plektron” (literally, “instrument for striking,” a musical technical term for “pick,” whence English “plectrum” via Latin), whose rays strike the universe and produce a “course in tune” (Clement of Alexandria Stromateis 5.8.48.1); Thom 2005 suggests this idea had been taken over from the late fifth- or early fourth-century poet Skythinos of Teos (p. 78 n. 188). Insofar as Sun is equated with Zeus in this hymn (see line 13 and note), Sun’s prominence in producing the full harmony, not merely being part of it, is also understandable.

10 as you nurture the seasons: The same idea recurs in connection with the Kouretes, albeit for a different reason; see OH 38.25.

11 piping lord of the world: Sun has already been described as holding the lyre, and now we find that he is a piper as well. The whistling sound this instrument makes is consistent with the type of sound implied by the rushing chariot (line 6) and the “screaming whip” (line 19). The playing of pipes is usually associated with Pan, and there are points of contact between this god and Sun in the collection. Pan’s music is described as an accompaniment to the cosmic harmony (OH 11.6), and he is also called “light-bringing lord of the cosmos” (OH 11.11). Furthermore, Pan is a “companion of the Seasons” (OH 11.4), a “begetter of all” (OH 11.10), a “veritable Zeus with horns” (OH 11.12), and he brings “nourishment to mankind” (OH 11.20; cf. line 12 of this hymn). Apollon may be added to this pair, for he is called Pan in the context of his divine music that regulates the seasons (OH 34.24), and Pan, in turn, is called Paian (OH 11.11), as Sun in the next line. Thus, these three divinities are brought into relation with one another as beings who maintain the cosmic order.

12 Paian: For this name/title of Apollon, see OH 34.1n; for Apollon's identification with the sun, see the introduction to this hymn. There are a number of overlapping attributes between this hymn and the one to Apollon (OH 34).

13 father of time: Moon is called "the mother of time"; see OH 9.5+n. Herakles is also called "father of time"; see OH 12.3+n.

13 Zeus: There are a number of attributes that Zeus and Sun share that would suggest such a correspondence: both are sky gods, both are associated with fire and light, both are believed to see all things, both are concerned with justice, and both were invoked in oaths (often together). A late source cites the following fragment from Sophokles (fragment 752): "O Sun, may you take pity on me/you whom the wise [sophoi] call the begetter of the gods/and father of all." The source introduces this quote with the following: "those who believe that the sun is Zeus say that Sophokles also calls the sun Zeus." Since we do not know the original context, we cannot be sure whether Sophokles actually intended to make this connection. The idea that Zeus is the father of all things is a commonplace in Greek literature; in Orphic cosmogony, this is taken literally (see OH 15.3–5n). The sun's role in producing life on earth could easily have suggested an identification with Zeus.

16 a paragon of justice: Sun's role in oaths naturally connects this divinity with justice. In a discussion of the etymology for "dikaion," a word meaning "justice," Sokrates says that he heard from many men that justice is the element that moves through (diaion) all things, which is the cause of generation, and that this is also why it is connected with the irregular root of Zeus ("dia"); upon further inquiry as to the nature of justice, one man claims it is the sun, since the sun governs all things, another man says it is the essence of heat that resides in fire, and yet another man holds, after Anaxagoras, that it is Mind (Plato Cratylus 412c–413d). Plato's authorities might very well be the ones who are called "the wise" in Sophokles fragment 752 (see note to line 13 "Zeus"), and Kahn 1979, p. 156, conjectures that Plato's source might be Herakleitos or his followers. The idea that the physical nature of the cosmos also consists of an ethical dimension—a type of universal that is the standard to which the human sphere ought to attain—is found in some of the early hymns (see also note to line 1, OH 7.12–13n and OH 10.14–16n) and is picked up again later on (see OH 64i).

16 water-loving lord of the cosmos: Sun might be said to love the water due to the fact that it signals the end of his laborious journey for the day. In mythology, Sun is sometimes portrayed as riding a cup at night on Okeanos in his return east to rise again the next day. It is interesting to note that some of the Pre-Socratics (Anaximenes, Xenophanes, Herakleitos: see Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, nos.

148–149, 175–179, 225, and their comments) and Stoics believed that the sun was created or maintained by evaporation from bodies of water on the earth (see, e.g., Plutarch De stoicorum repugnantis 1053a, De Iside et Osiride 367e).

17 guard pledges: This alludes to Sun’s role as an oath god; see the introduction to this hymn and note to line 1.

19 four-horse chariot: Sun is often conceived as a charioteer in Greco-Roman literature and art. Festus, a second-century ^{AD} writer, in a note discussing various horse sacrifices mentions one at Rhodes, where a four-horse chariot is driven into the sea; he tells us that this symbolized the course of the sun as it traveled around the world; see Burkert 1985, p. 175.

9. To Selene

Selene, whom we are calling Moon for consistency (see note to lines 1–2 below) had very little role in Greek cult, even less than that of Sun, who at least had a major cult center at Rhodes. Her importance in religion is due largely to her identification with Artemis and Hekate. In later times, she was adopted into pre-existing cults, along with other figures (e.g., Sun). Moon appears in magical texts, as well as a curse tablet from Megara, but even in these cases she is not quite divorced from the other goddesses who are identified with her. In our collection she is closely linked with the Stars and Sun, both of whose hymns precede this one, and the obscure figure Melinoe might well be a specific manifestation of Hekate as moon goddess (see OH 71i). Moon also does not have much of a presence in myth. She is perhaps best known for her love affair with Endymion; the story is first attested for Sappho (no text survives) and in modern times is most famously retold in Keat’s eponymous poem. In Hesiod’s Theogony, she is the daughter of the Titans Hyperion and Theia and the sister of Sun and Dawn (371–374). In later times, she is sometimes said to be the daughter of Sun, this genealogy perhaps reflecting a belief that the moon reflected the light of the sun (already postulated by Anaxagoras; see Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, nos. 500, 502), the inferior status of the secondary light being expressed in genealogical terms. It is interesting to note that a number of words describing the light of the moon in this hymn (and in the magical papyri) are ones that more typically describe the sun’s light. Orphic fragment 155 explicitly calls the moon “another earth” (see note to lines 1–2); for the moon’s chthonic associations, see OH 59.3–4n. We also find Mousaios addressed as the offspring of Moon (Mousaios fragments 11t–14t); the same relationship was claimed by the Kretan shaman Epimenides (fragment 33) and the oracle-monger Alexander of Abonoteikhos, who slapped a human face on a snake and called it Asklepios (second century ^{AD}; Lucian devotes an entire essay, Alexander, or the False Seer to vilify the man). Some accounts hold that the Nemean Lion came from the moon.

As is the case with Sun in the previous hymn, Moon appears all but devoid of her religious and mythical heritage. The focus is almost exclusively on the moon as an astronomical phenomenon; in particular, the play of light and darkness seems to have captured the imagination of the author. This hymn should be compared with the short Homeric Hymn to the Moon. For Moon's role in magic, of particular interest are a series of prayers and invocations to Moon/Hekate (PGM 4.2241–2358, 2441–2784). Theokritos' second idyll is a literary account of love magic in which Moon is invoked. Lucian parodies the idea of the moon as another world in his True History 1.9–27. See also OH 1i, OH 36i, and OH 71i.

1–2 Selene, / ... Moon: The hymn in quick succession invokes the moon under the two names by which she was known. “Selēnē” is derived from the Greek noun “selas,” “light, brightness, gleam” (compare Latin “luna,” “moon,” from “lux,” “light”; see also OH 71i), and might have developed as a euphemism for the moon proper (Greek “mēnē”). If this is correct, the demonic Hekate/Moon found in the magical papyri would have quite an ancient pedigree. Orphic fragment 155, describing the creation of the world by Protogonos (or its recreation by Zeus), also uses both names in close proximity: “And he conceived another earth, boundless, which Selene/the immortals call, but those upon the earth Mene;/it has many mountains, many cities, many houses.” The idea that gods and mortals call the same thing by different names appears elsewhere in epic poetry (e.g., the river Skamandros, Iliad 20.74) and this also happens among different mortals (e.g., in the case of Hektor's child, Iliad 6.402–403). The preference in our collection for “mēnē” instead of “selēnē” might be due to the Orphic fragment, where the former is the term that mortal men use.

3 torch-bearing: Both Artemis and Demeter are called “torch-bearing” in their hymns (OH 36.3+n and OH 40.11+n); the same epithet is used of Hekate/Artemis/Moon in the magical papyri (PGM 4.2559, 2718). The torch is one of the standard attributes of Hekate. She, along with Sun, perceived Hades' abduction of Persephone. This pairing implies Hekate's capacity as a moon goddess; indeed, the Greek word used of the light of her torch is selas (Homeric Hymn to Demeter 2.52 see the note to lines 1–2 above and OH 1i). Torches are also standard in processions (see OH 40.11n) and the iconography of maenads (see OH 52i).

4 feminine and masculine: A number of divinities are described as androgynous in the collection: Physis (OH 10.18), Athene (OH 32.10), Mise (OH 42.4), and Adonis (OH 56.4). The goddess Artemis is also called masculine at OH 36.7. Protogonos is “two-natured” (OH 6.1), and this probably refers to this being's androgynous nature; see also Orphic fragment 80, 121, and 134. One might also compare two versions of an Orphic hymn to Zeus, where the god, invoked as the embodiment of the cosmos, is depicted by a number of complementary characteristics, including masculine and feminine features, and in particular is asserted to be the sun and the moon (Orphic fragment 31.4, 6; 243.3, 16). Likewise, Dionysos and Eros are also “two-natured” (OH 30.2 and OH 58.4) which probably indicates dual gender. In the magical papyri, we find Moon invoked thus: “I summon you, triple-faced goddess, Moon, lovely light, Hermes and Hekate together, an androgynous shoot” (PGM 4.2608–2610). The dual gender of Moon is curious, particularly since she is described as “mother of time” in line 5, while Sun, who is not depicted as androgynous, is called the “father of time” (OH 8.13). The masculine side of the moon might be an oblique reference to the non-Greek moon-god Men (pronounced “main”), whose worship was widespread in Asia Minor and who is mentioned in Orpheus’ address to Mousaios at OH O.39, admittedly, however, far removed from the Moon’s presence in line 4.

5 mother of time: Sun is called “father of time” in his hymn (OH 8.13). The ancients in general employed a lunisolar calendar. The months were calculated by the phases of the moon; indeed the words “moon” and “month” are cognate; compare also Greek “mēnē” (“moon”) and “meis, mēnos” (“month, moon”) as well as Latin “mensis” (“month”). However, in terms of a recurring pattern, a strictly lunar calendar quickly falls out of step with the seasons, which are tied to the earth’s circuit around the sun, so that the same month that occurs in winter will occur in summer within a generation. The ancients were well aware of this difficulty and so employed various means to keep the solar year in tune with the lunar months. For detailed information on Greco-Roman calendars, see Samuel 1972; for a more concise account on time reckoning, whose scope extends beyond ancient Mediterranean cultures, see Holford-Strevens 2005. The Demiurge in Plato’s Timaeus creates the sun, moon, the planets, and the stars to fix and measure time (38b–39e). Orphic fragment 156, in the context of the (re)creation of the cosmos, says that the moon was given a month-long orbit analogous to the year-long one of the sun.

6 amber-colored: See OH 71i.

7 all-seeing: Similar to Sun, Moon is able to see all things from her vantage point in the celestial sphere; see OH 8.1n.

10 long-cloaked marshal of the stars: The moon, as the most conspicuous heavenly body in the night sky, can naturally be conceived as the leader of the lesser lights. At the start of the “Prayer to Moon” in the magical papyri, Moon is addressed as one “who in the triple shapes of the triple Graces, dances with the stars in festive revel” (PGM 4.2793–2795).

12: Light in Greek literature often connotes deliverance from some trouble. This line seems to indicate that the rites performed with this collection took place at night (see OH 3i).

10. To Physis

Physis (Nature) was conceived by the Greeks since early times as the loosely personified sum total of the creative powers or creative genius of the cosmos at work. The word is derived from the Greek verb “phuō” which means “I grow, I am (by nature)” (a word, incidentally, cognate with English “be”). The notion, in both of its senses, was important from the earliest schools of philosophy. Indeed, there are a number of ancient philosophical treatises entitled “Peri phuseōs” (“On Nature”; cf. Lucretius’ Latin poem De rerum natura, “On the Nature of Things”). Our hymn conceives of Physis in such vague terms as to render it very difficult to point to a definite connection with any particular philosophical school. There do seem to be a number of resonances with the Zeus in the Stoic philosopher Kleanthes’ Hymn to Zeus, where the god is addressed as the “originator of nature [phuseōs]” (line 2). He is also “many-named” and “master of all” (line 1 ~ OH 10.4 and 13), “ruler” (2 ~ OH 10.3), mingled with celestial bodies (12–13; cf. OH 10.6), has powers over the earth, heaven, and sea (15–16; cf. OH 10.14), and is a “giver of all” (32 ~ OH 10.16), among other verbal overlaps. A familiarity with this work is likely. Interestingly enough, the so-called Pythagorean Golden Verses, a collection of moral precepts of unknown date but certainly well known by late antiquity, cast Physis in the role of a priestess in a mystery cult revealing secrets to the initiates: “But take courage, for mortals have a divine origin,/to whom Physis displays and shows each sacred object” (63–64, translation by Thom 1995). The language here is suspiciously Orphic, as Thom discusses in his commentary on these lines (pp. 205–212). An earlier pair of verses (52–53), which looks at the universality of nature (here probably not personified), also admits of potential Stoic, Pythagorean, or even Orphic provenance (see Thom 1995, pp. 190–191). Mesomedes composed a hymn to Physis, identifying this divinity with Sun towards the end. He apostrophizes Physis with “O you who kindle the whole world with your brilliant rays” (15–16) and calls Physis “Aion” (a figure sometimes equated with Sun in the magical papyri; see OH O.28–29n), “Paian” (= Apollon), and “Titan” (referring to Sun or his father, Hyperion; cf. OH 8.2, and for this relationship, see Hesiod Theogony 134). As in the Golden Verses, the language of mystery cults also appears in this hymn, as the poet calls on Sun-Physis to grant blessings “to your Bacchant” (19–20). Further points of contact are mentioned in the notes passim. The personified Physis also appears in the magical papyri in a number of associations. She is mentioned immediately following Aion in a long list of invocations (PGM 1.310), and possibly equated with Sun himself (PGM 4.939, but there is textual corruption). It is perhaps not too much of a surprise to find her identified with Aphrodite, given that goddess' strong connection with generative powers (PGM 4.2917). This is perhaps comparable to the address as the "persuasion of the Graces" in line 13, as both the Graces and the personified Persuasion are traditionally connected with Aphrodite (see OH 55.9n and OH 60i). Also due to the association with fertility is the equation of Physis with Moon-Artemis-Hekate (PGM 4.2832). The Physis of the magical papyri shares some of the epithets used of this goddess in our hymn.

Our composer, then, has apparently appropriated an idea found in a number of congenial contexts and adapted it to one suitable for the purposes of the collection. Physis is here presented as the mysterious and ineffable power that infuses all of creation. The position of the hymn is significant in this respect. There are many verbal reminiscences with the earlier hymns, and the birth motif makes yet another appearance. Given that Hekate and Moon are often fused together as one entity, they can be seen as functioning in the collection as a type of ring composition that bookends the hymns to the cosmic powers, who are primarily presented in abstract terms. The hymn to Physis, along with that of Pan, might very well have been intended as a summary of this earliest stage of personified abstractions, which afterward gives way to more anthropomorphic figures, starting with the twelfth hymn to Herakles. Note, too, that the hymns to Physis and Pan are also verbally connected through the frequent use of the Greek word "pan" ("all") in this hymn, either as an independent word or as part of compound.

1 mother of all: This is also used of Physis twice in the magical papyri: once in her identification with Aphrodite (PGM 4.2916–2917), the other time with Moon-Hekate-Artemis (PGM 4.2832–2833). An obscure poem from later antiquity on the powers of plants calls physis (probably not to be personified) by the same epithet. We find this and similar descriptive phrases applied throughout the collection to various fertility figures: Night (OH 3.1), Rhea (OH 14.8–9), Demeter (OH 40.1), Mother Antaia (OH 41.1–2), and Hygeia (OH 68.2). In particular, Earth can also have the same epithet used here (see Aeschylus Prometheus Bound 90 and Orphic fragment 243.27), and she is addressed as "mother of men and of the blessed gods" in her hymn (see OH 26.1+n).

2 oldest of all: Mesomedes calls her the "oldest mother of the cosmos" in line 2 of his hymn.

6–7: A similar sequence is found in line 3 of Mesomedes' hymn: "[you who are] night, light, and silence." Given the reference to mystic initiates in the following line of his hymn, Mesomedes might be alluding to nocturnal ritual.

9: There are many instances of contradictory, or at least paradoxical, formulations throughout this hymn and, indeed, the collection as a whole. See lines 3, 6 (dark/bright), 8, 10, 17 (life/death), and 18. The idea of causing a quality without possessing that quality itself is already found in Aristotle’s notion of the “unmoved mover” (and note that Mesomedes calls Physis a “first principle” in line 1 of his hymn); see also line 21 of this hymn, where Physis is said to “[set] all in motion.”

14–16: Physis is not just a concretization of the powers of generation but also is responsible for the underlying ethical dimension of the world. She is Dike (meaning “right”) personified (compare OH 62 and OH 63), and “virtue” (Greek “arētē”) in line 10 might also be intended as a personification. See further OH 8.16n. Many divinities are connected with the realms of heaven, earth, and sea in this collection. Some, like Physis, are described as having dominion over them: Kybele (OH 27.4–8), Aphrodite (OH 55.4–7), and her son Eros (OH 58.5–7). Aphrodite is also said to be the source of these three spheres, as are Rhea (OH 14.9–10) and Zeus (OH 15.3–5), whose descent as the thunderbolt also affects the same areas (OH 19.12–19). Pan (OH 11.13–18) and Nomos (OH 64.2–4) keep everything in its place. Some divinities are described as dwelling in these locations: Hekate (OH 1.2), Pan (OH 11.2–3, where fire, probably a metonymy for ether, is also included), Proteus (OH 25.6–9, where he is the locus of creation by Physis), and the Kouretes (OH 38.2). In the opening address to Mousaios, Orpheus at one point invokes all the gods of the sky, air, water, earth, underworld, and ether (OH O.32–33). In a related vein, the animals that inhabit the land, air, and sea are listed at OH 37.5 and OH 78.11–12. This motif is related to that of the four elements (see in particular OH 11.2–3n). Heaven, earth, and sea figure prominently in various stories of creation. In particular, note the song of Orpheus at Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 1.493–502, and compare the song of Silenos at Vergil Eclogues 6.31ff., where, before his song begins, Silenos is compared favorably to Apollon and Orpheus. See also OH 34.11–15+n.

18 father and mother of all: The earlier hymns to Night and Sky (OH 3 and OH 4) form a generative pair. Sun and Moon, as father and mother of time (OH 8.13 and OH 9.5), are similarly related, while Moon herself is both masculine and feminine (see OH 9.4+n). Mesomedes addresses Physis in line 2 of his hymn as the “oldest mother” but his later identification of the goddess with Sun-Aion-Apollon (15–20) suggests that he also saw this first principle (see line 1 of his hymn) as androgynous.

19 swift birth: Prothyraia-Eileithyia in OH 2.4 and Artemis in OH 36.8 are also called goddesses “of swift birth.”

19 giver of wealth of seeds: The same Greek epithet is used of Protogonos (OH 6.10, where it is translated as “of many seeds”); see also OH 6.3n.

21–24: Possibly a reference to the river Okeanos, whom Homer calls the “begetter of all” (see OH 83i). Physis, like this river and other personified celestial phenomena (Sky in OH 4.4, the Stars in OH 7.4, Moon in OH 9.10; see further OH 8.7n), is also conceived as moving in a circle (also compare Kleanthes Hymn to Zeus 7). She is constantly changing her form in the sense that she produces an astonishing variety of living beings (cf. OH 3.8–11n).

26 those who hold the scepter: Mortal kings are the ones who usually hold the scepter. In the Rhapsodies, we find mention of a six-part scepter (Orphic fragment 166), which seems to refer to the sequence of six rulers of the cosmos (Protogonos, Night, Sky, Kronos, Zeus, and Dionysos), while Night is explicitly said to hold the scepter she obtained from Protogonos (Orphic fragment 168 and 170, and see OH 3i and OH 15.6+n).

27 all-taming, ... fire-breathing: The same epithets are used of Ether at OH 5.3. The association with fire is perhaps related to the identification of Physis with Sun in other sources (see the introduction to this hymn) and, along with the following line (“you are life everlasting”), perhaps also is to be connected with the idea that the soul is composed of fire (also OH 5.3; see further OH 66.9+n).

11. To Pan

Pan is a divinity with an interesting history. He originally appears to have been a woodland god in Arkadia, one who roamed the mountains, hunted small game, and frolicked in song and dance with nymphs. He is traditionally represented as a bearded man with horns on his head, whose upper body is human and whose lower parts are capriform. Later considered to be the quintessential symbol of paganism, his features were adopted in representations of the Christian devil. Pan was worshipped in Arkadia with the traditional accoutrements of Greek religion (see, e.g., Pausanias 8.37.10), but outside of this area he was typically venerated in sacred caves or grottos. Herodotos (6.105) narrates a tale from the Persian invasion of Attika: the Athenians sent an accomplished runner, Philippides, to the Spartans in order to solicit their help, and, while he was passing through a mountain in Arkadia, the god appeared to him and asked why the Athenians did no honor to him, although he had helped them in the past and would do so again in the future. After the battle of Marathon, the Athenians decided to make good their past neglect by dedicating a cave on the northwest slope of the Akropolis to Pan. One feature of their worship of Pan was a torch-race, and it is interesting that one of the sanctuaries of Pan in Arkadia had a racetrack, according to Pausanias (8.38.5).

Pan was often invoked along with Hermes and the nymphs. Indeed, like Hermes, he can multiply flocks and bring good fortune to those he chooses. An example of this may be seen in one of the caves of the ancient marble quarry on Paros; there at the entrance one finds a Hellenistic frieze depicting Pan and the nymphs. A further connection with Hermes is found in many of the versions of Pan's genealogy. He is usually represented as the son of Hermes, often through a nymph, as in the Homeric Hymn to Pan, where the mother is the daughter of Dryops. We also find Penelope, the wife of Odysseus, claimed to be the mother, with Hermes, Apollon, or even all the suitors as the father. The Arkadian connection is also seen in variations that make Zeus the father and Kallisto, a nymph and mother of Arkas, the eponymous hero of Arkadia, the mother. Other parentages are considered below.

Pan was connected with sudden bouts of fear or madness (whence English "panic"), already in the Classical period (e.g., Euripides Medeia 1172). The Homeric Hymn to Pan alludes to this attribute in the birth of Pan. When the mother and nurse see the baby born with a beard and goat features, they run away screaming, while the father, Hermes, happily scoops up the infant in his arms and brings him to Olympus; all the gods delight in the baby, Dionysos most of all (19.27–47; see also OH 14i and OH 46.7n). Pan's madness could overtake men and beasts in the lonely places of mountains, and sometimes the explanation is put forth that this was due to a sudden gust of wind from the instrument of Pan, the panpipes, constructed out of a number of reeds bound together and stopped with wax (see below and the notes to lines 7 and 9). In literature and iconography Pan is often portrayed carrying this instrument. It was also supposed that "panic" was a frenzy occasioned by being directly possessed by the god; see OH 52.7–8n and cf. OH 30i+4n.

It is perhaps this notion of madness and possession that brought Pan into the orbit of ecstatic and mystery cults. As already mentioned, he is particularly tied to Dionysos in the Homeric Hymn to Pan, and he is often found in the Dionysian thiasos. Both divinities also share a connection with pastoral settings and nymphs. Pindar brings Pan together with Mother: he puts him in her retinue (Pythian Odes 3.77–79) and calls him the "attendant" (fragment 95) and "dog" (fragment 96) of the goddess. Pan is associated with other divinities connected with madness. The nurse in Euripides' Hippolytos asks Phaedra if she is possessed by Pan, Hekate, the Korybantes, or Kybele, the mountain mother (141–144); see also OH 27.8n. Madness and frenzy play a role in our hymn and elsewhere in the collection with similar entities; see OH 27.13n and OH 71.11n. One obscure genealogy of Pan makes him the son of Ether and a nymph named Oinoe. Given the role of Ether in Orphic mythology, it is tempting to see an Orphic source for this notice. Mysterious, too, is the story of the death of Pan, told by Plutarch at De defectu oraculorum 419b–e. As a ship was heading up the coast of Epiros in northwest Greece at the time of the Emperor Tiberius, a voice from an island called out to the Egyptian helmsman Thamous, who ignored the voice twice but responded after a third time. The voice bade him to announce to the land by Lake Palodes that “Pan the Great has died.” Thamous does so, and even before he finishes his words, groaning and shouts of amazement were heard from somewhere on land.

Possibly also in the context of mystery cults there developed the notion of the “cosmic” Pan as found in our hymn. It was sometimes claimed that he did not have any parents but was “without a father” or “autochthonic” and “earth-born.” One obscure writer calls Pan “celestial.” Of particular interest is a recurring notion that the physical constitution of Pan symbolizes the entire universe. The horns on his head represent both the rays of the sun and the horns of the moon. His ruddy complexion is the ether. The leopard or fawn skin he wears (a typical article of clothing for a follower of Dionysos), being spotted, refers to the stars in the sky. His hairy lower shanks correspond to the trees and shrubbery that clothe the earth, and his hard goat hooves suggest the stability of solid ground (cf. also OH 10.14–16n and OH 15.3–5n). Two other notable attributes are mentioned by Servius in his commentary on Vergil’s Eclogues 2.31. He says that the shepherd’s crook that Pan holds, because it is curved back, points to the recurring year and that the panpipes he holds are made up of seven reeds, corresponding to the seven notes of the cosmic harmony. In this context Servius refers to Vergil Aeneid 6.645, where Orpheus (the “Thracian priest”) is depicted in the Elysian Fields, playing his seven-stringed lyre. Note, too, that Sun in his hymn is represented as playing the cosmic harmony by the lyre and by piping (OH 8.11+n). It is unclear where Servius is drawing this connection between the music of “cosmic” Pan and Orpheus, although it is likely he has the poem entitled Lyre in mind, which was attributed to Orpheus (Orphic fragment 417–420; see also West 1983, pp. 29–32). It is also suggestive that in the Orphic theogony reported by Hieronymos, Protogonos was called Zeus, who, as master of the entire cosmos, was also known as Pan (Orphic fragment 86; see also note to lines 10–12). In this context, note that Silenos, a figure with much affinity with Pan, sings a song of creation at Vergil Eclogues 6.31ff. (see OH 10.14–16n).

This identification of Pan and Zeus helps explain why Pan became a god whose domain extends over all creation. The Greek word for “all, whole, entire” is “pan,” and we find such etymologizing explanations mentioned elsewhere in the context of “cosmic” Pan (cf. OH 25i). This seems to be a later development, though, and other explanations of this god’s name were offered earlier. In the Homeric Hymn to Pan, it is explained he was called Pan because “all” the gods took delight in him (19.47). Writers who make “all” the suitors of Penelope the father of this god offer a more salacious hypothesis. The root “pa” seen in the Greek “*pasomai” (“I will acquire”) and Latin “pascor” (“I feed, graze on”) is a more likely ancestor to the name Pan. He is the god who nourishes the flocks and can increase their number.

This hymn, like Pan himself, is a hybrid mix, combining a charming rustic materialism with the sublime power that permeates all creation. Similar to Physis in the previous hymn, Pan is connected with growth and nourishment of life (note the appearance of the birthing motif again). Indeed, the epithet “begetter of all” (“pantophuēs”) in line 10 combines words that are cognate with both divinities. And also like the previous hymn, this one serves as a summary of the cosmic powers already honored (see also OH 10i). Thus Pan functions as a transition to the more anthropomorphic figure of Herakles of the next hymn.

One detail that perhaps is not directly relevant to this hymn but deserves mention is that Herodotos in his digression treating Egypt in book two of his Histories mentions that the Greek divinities Dionysos, Herakles, and Pan have a different chronology from their Egyptian counterparts (2.145). For the Greeks, the order of birth is Dionysos, Herakles, Pan (Herodotos making him the son of Penelope and Hermes, and thus born after the Trojan War), while the Egyptians place their Pan among the eight primeval gods (the Ogdoad), Herakles among the subsequent dynasty of the twelve gods, and Dionysos in a third dynasty. While admittedly there is little Egyptian influence on our collection, it is certainly possible that a distant source for the “Titan” Herakles in the subsequent hymn was influenced by the same account related by Herodotos (or even by Herodotos’ account itself).

2–3: The sky, sea, land, and fire (probably the ether is meant) correspond to the four elements: air, water, earth, and fire (see lines 13–18, OH 5.4n and OH 14.9–10n). A similar broad range of domains is found in many hymns in the collection; see OH 10.14–16n.

5 reveling: The word has distinct Bacchic connotations, and Pan has a special relation to Dionysos; see the introduction to this hymn and OH 52i.

7 fantasies of dread: A reference to Pan’s madness, which he is asked to banish at the end of the hymn. A number of divinities in the collection have similar powers; see OH 71.11n.

9 dance with the Nymphs, ... lover of Echo: Pan is often found carousing with nymphs, and there are a number of similarities between this hymn and the one to the Nymphs (OH 51). The two are mentioned in the same line of Orpheus’ address to Mousaios (OH O.15). Despite Pan’s proud assertion of bachelorhood in Lucian’s humorous portrayal of the god (Dialogue of the Gods 22), in mythical tradition he is involved in a number of failed relationships. The most famous one is with the nymph Syrinx, memorably told by Ovid (Metamorphoses 1.689–712). She rejects Pan's advances and, as she flees from him, is turned into a clump of reeds. When Pan reaches to grasp her, he finds instead the bunch of reeds in his hands. He sighs, and his breath goes through the reeds and produces sweet music. Thus did Pan invent the panpipes (Greek "surinx"), a common attribute of his evermore. Another nymph, named Pitys, rejected Pan and she was turned into a pine tree (Greek "pitus"). Our hymn directly refers to Echo, who is usually associated with Narcissus. However, she is sometimes an amorous interest of Pan, and, like Syrinx and Pitys, rejects his advances. In Longus' novel Daphnis and Chloe (3.23), Daphnis explains to his lover Chloe the origin of the "echo." The nymph Echo was taught by the Muses in every sort of singing and musical instruments. Pan, in anger over her skills and at the fact that she fled from him, sent his madness to the shepherds and goatherds, who promptly tore Echo apart. As a favor to the Muses, Earth echoes back sounds just as the nymph was able to do when alive. This story has interesting parallels to that of Orpheus, famed for his music and, in some accounts, torn to shreds by maenads maddened by Dionysos, either because Orpheus had stopped venerating the god or because the nymphs themselves were enraged that Orpheus had sworn off women after the death of Eurydike; see also OH 87.9n. For the ripping apart of an animal as part of maenadic ritual (sparagmos), see OH 52i. Pan is sometimes considered to be the source of echoes himself. It is not always easy to determine whether a writer has in mind "echo" or "Echo" in connection with Pan (see, for example, Homeric Hymn to Pan 19.21). For Pan and nymphs in cult, see OH 51i.

10–12 many-named divinity... veritable Zeus with horns: Pan is called "many-named" and then in quick succession we have a number of identifications. Zeus is directly mentioned, and Pan's role as "begetter of all" fits in well with Zeus' role as father of gods and men in the tradition. As noted in the introduction to this hymn, Zeus is called Pan in Orphic fragment 86. Another fragment calls Zeus "the god of all and the mixer of all" (Orphic fragment 414); the Greek words for "mixer" and "horned" are the same ("kerastēs"), except they are accented differently. There may be a word-play here, and the second line of this fragment adds "whistling with winds and air-mingled sounds" (the Greek for "whistling" is "surizōn," cognate with "surinx"). Given Pan's connection with a wind instrument, and the sounds in the mountain that cause his special kind of fear, it is possible that the author of this fragment intended an allusion to Pan. Another fragment from the same poem lists a number of gods and their domains, ending with the observation "all these things are one" (Orphic fragment 413.12). The reference to Paian is a bit vague. Normally,

Paian is another name for Apollon (OH 34.1+n), but it is also attributed to Sun (OH 8.12), Dionysos (OH 52.11), and Apollon's son Asklepios (OH 67.1). But as Sun is also called “fruit-bearing, Paian” (the Greek there is the same as in this hymn) and is also a piper (OH 8.11+n), the immediate identification here is most likely that between Sun and Pan. That leaves “light-bringing lord of the cosmos.” This could describe Sun, but a better candidate is perhaps Protogonos, who is a “begetter of blessed gods and mortal men” (OH 6.3) and also brings light to all (OH 6.8). It is very interesting in connection with Protogonos that our composer in the next line addresses him as Priapos, a rustic divinity similar to Pan (OH 6.9+n), and also that when Zeus is called Pan in Orphic fragment 86, he has earlier been identified with Protogonos, suggesting that all three were considered different names for the same deity. As mentioned in the introduction to this hymn, Pan's presence seems to be meant as a more concrete realization of the abstract entities addressed in the earlier hymns and a transitional figure to more anthropomorphic ones.

17: For the idea of the all-seeing eye of Sun, see OH 8.1+n.

19 your providence alters the natures of all: Interestingly enough, the lovers who reject Pan often undergo transformation (see note to line 9). Compare, too, OH 10.21.

12. To Herakles

Herakles is the most storied of all the legendary Greek heroes. His popularity and the sheer bulk of his adventures, probably the result of accretions over a long period of time, have effaced the true origins of this figure (for his possible Eastern connections, see Levy 1934). He is already mentioned a few times in the Iliad and Odyssey, and a poem attributed to Hesiod, the Shield, focuses on his battle against the bandit Kyknos. For a summary of Herakles' life, see Apollodoros 2.4.8–2.7.8. There is also a Homeric hymn in his honor. In the tradition, we find this larger-than-life hero represented in many different ways. He is the great slayer of the monsters in the wild, thus opening the world for the expansion of civilization. He can be seen as a paragon of virtue, as in the parable of the Sophist Prodikos, preserved by Xenophon, where the young Herakles chooses the Hesiodic rough road of Virtue over the easy path of Vice (Xenophon Memorabilia 2.21–34). For the Stoics, Herakles symbolized the endurance needed to face adversity with equanimity and the ability to persevere and ultimately prevail.

The connection of Herakles with Dionysian cult is not easy to explain, but there are a number of factors that, when taken together, help illuminate his position in our collection. Herakles dies when he puts on a poisoned robe given to him by his jealous wife Deianira, who had been tricked into thinking it was a love charm. After Herakles builds his own pyre and immolates himself, he is translated to Olympos, where he becomes a god and takes Hebe (meaning “youth”), a daughter of Zeus and Hera, as his wife. In Homer, Odysseus encounters the shade of Herakles in the land of the dead, although the divine part of Herakles is said to be a god on Olympos (Odyssey 11.601–614). Herodotos reports that the Greeks worshipped Herakles both as a hero and as a god (2.44), and Pindar calls Herakles a “hero-god” (Nemean Odes 3.23). The golden apples of the Hesperides, which Herakles fetches in his eleventh labor, are sometimes interpreted as symbols of immortality (as are the labors as a whole), and even Hebe herself, the goddess of youth, might be understood to signify eternal life. This special status of Herakles is connected with his leading a virtuous life, and this pattern of achieving divine status after death, particularly tied to one’s virtue or goodness, is one of the concerns found in the Bacchic gold leaves (Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 94–136); see also note to line 16. In fact, we find Herakles being initiated in mystery cults, such as the Eleusinian Mysteries (Xenophon Hellenika 6.3.6; see also Boardman 1989, pl. 392). Both he and Dionysos seem to have been worshipped together at Thasos, one of the oldest cult centers for Herakles (see Larson 2007, pp. 185–186). A cup painting shows the two of them together in a symposiastic setting, attended by satyrs (Boardman 1975, pl. 376; cf. also Boardman 1989, pl. 131). Herakles is often depicted as wearing the skin of the Nemean Lion, and Dionysos often wears the skin of an exotic animal (leopard, panther) in his iconography. Both have Theban connections, both are sons of Zeus by mortal women, and both are struck by their father’s lightning bolt (Dionysos, albeit indirectly, is struck while in Semele’s womb; Herakles, in some versions, has his pyre ignited by Zeus’ lightning). Herakles also has fertility associations (see Levy 1934, pp. 43–45).

Finally, there are a few indirect ways Herakles might have been brought into connection with Orpheus. Both are numbered among the Argonauts, and both return alive from a journey to the underworld. The legendary poet and musician Linos taught music to Herakles, who eventually killed his teacher in a paroxysm of rage; Linos is variously related to Orpheus in the tradition as brother, grandfather, teacher, or disciple. Lastly, there is a connection with the Idaian Dactyls from Krete. These were famous magicians and metalworkers who were also priests of mystery cults; in some cases, they are considered the teachers of Orpheus (see Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 170–172). Pausanias calls one of the Dactyls Herakles (9.19.5, 9.27.8), adducing elsewhere as an authority the legendary poet Onomakritos (8.31.3). Pausanias also says that the men of Elis reported to him that this Herakles was the first to hold an athletic contest at Olympia during the time when Kronos was the ruler of the cosmos (5.7.6–7), while other authors make Herakles the founder of the Olympian Games. Indeed, his twelve labors feature on the metopes of the temple of Zeus at Olympia (early- to mid-fifth century). In this context it should be noted that Herodotos was already aware of a multitude of Herakleis (2.43).

The curious fact that this hymn to Herakles immediately precedes the one to Kronos is probably to be understood along these lines. Despite the nominal association with the hero who was the son of Zeus, Herakles seems to have been conflated with an older generation of divinities in Orphic mythology. In one Orphic theogony Herakles was another name for Time (see note to line 3). Our hymn, which calls Herakles a Titan (line 1), seems also to associate him with Sun (see note to line 10). He is here an anthropomorphized cosmic force, the last in a series that starts from an abstraction (Physis) and continues through a hybrid creature (Pan). He thus bears a close resemblance to the Herakles supposed to have been invoked by Pythagoras (alongside Zeus and the Dioskouroi) as the “force of nature” in libations before a meal (Iamblichus Life of Pythagoras 155).

1 mighty, powerful Titan: Kronos is similarly addressed in the following hymn (OH 13.2). It is possible that “child of the earth” in line 9 (also used of Kronos at OH 13.6) is meant to reinforce Herakles’ connection with the Titans.

3 father of time: In the Orphic theogony attributed to Hieronymos, Herakles is sometimes another name for Time (Orphic fragment 76 and 79; note, too, the “primordial scales” in line 10, a characteristic of the Orphic Time). An obscure arithmological treatise that has come down to us among the writings of the Neoplatonist Iamblichus (mid-third / fourth century AD), The Theology of Arithmetic, lists the significance of the numbers one through ten. For the “tetrad” (number four), we find, “And again, they call the tetrad ‘Heracles’ with regard to the same notion of the year, as giving rise to duration, since eternity, time, critical time and passing time are four, as moreover are year, month, night and day, and morning, midday, evening and night” (translation by Waterfield 1988, p. 62). Sun is also called “father of time” (OH 8.13), and there are other parallels connecting both figures, e.g., both are addressed as Titan, both are “self-born” and “untiring” (OH 8.3), and both are invoked by alternate forms of a name usually associated with Apollon (Paian and Paion). In the Dionysiaca of Nonnus, a hymn to Sun begins “star-cloaked Herakles, lord of fire, marshal of the universe” (40.369). At lines 11–12 in our hymn, dawn and dusk are worn on Herakles’ head, and the twelve labors are said to “stretch from east to west,” the same path Sun takes on his daily journey. Sun is connected with Herakles in myth as well, as the former lent the latter his cup, in which he rides on the river Okeanos (which flows counterclockwise) during his return journey from west to east (see Stesikhoros PMGF S17; Boardman 1975, pl. 300). Herakles had gone west to retrieve the cattle of Geryon, and the suggestion of a cycle in Herakles’ wanderings (east-west-east) might have facilitated a connection with the sun's circuit in antiquity. The twelve labors of Herakles could also be seen as representing the twelve months of the year (see Morand 2001, p. 84). Thus in these two lines, the idea of four time periods, as mentioned in the Theology of Arithmetic ("year, month, night and day"), might be intended; see also OH O.18n.

5 all-conquering: The Greek word is "pankrates." This was the name of a god in Athens who was represented as a mature, bearded man accompanied by a younger, unbearded man. This younger man is sometimes called Pankrates Herakles in dedications, and he bears the traditional Heraklean attributes of lion skin and club (see Mikalson 1998, p. 144 n. 20).

5 archer and seer: Both of these are also attributes of Apollon; see note to line 10.

6: This line is noticeable for its collocation of words meaning "all" (including "omnivorous"), which is "pan" in ancient Greek, and thus evocative of the preceding hymn. For other cases where we find Pan and Herakles in proximity, see OH 11i and the note to line 10 below.

10 Paion: An alternate name of Apollon (see OH 34.1n), also spelled "Paian," it is used of a number of other personalities in the collection, almost all of whom share affinities with Herakles in this hymn. His association with Sun is discussed in the note to line 3 above. Pan is called Paian in the previous hymn, which bears other similarities with this one (see also note to line 6 above). Paian is also used of Asklepios at OH 67.1, and elsewhere we find Herakles associated with this god as well. Aristides (see OH 86i) relates a story told to him by a stranger, who claimed that in a dream he had sung a hymn to Herakles composed by Aristides that began "ie Paian Herakles Asklepios!" (Orations 40.12). It is therefore notable that Herakles is asked to bring "all charms against disease" in line 14. In fact at Athens, he was invoked to keep plagues away (Larson 2007, p. 185; see p. 220 n. 7 for references). One of Herakles' adventures was the killing of the eagle that had been devouring Prometheus' liver, and Hesiod metaphorically calls the eagle a "disease" (Theogony 523–534). Both Herakles and Asklepios are culture heroes, and this would naturally facilitate a closer relation between them; see also OH 67i.

15 club in hand: This is one of the most common iconographic attributes of Herakles. He also often wears the skin of the Nemean Lion like a cowl.

16: The last three labors of Herakles (cattle of Geryon, apples of the Hesperides, Kerberos) are instances that fit the wide-spread mythological pattern of the hero overcoming death. During his last labor, he sometimes is credited with freeing Theseus from the underworld, where he had been trapped for his role in assisting Peirithoös' attempt to abduct Persephone. Herakles actually wrestles Death (Greek Thanatos) in order to win back the soul of the departed Alkestis (see Euripides' play of the same name). Herakles as a liberator from death (the threat of death, the mundane existence of the soul in the underworld) fits in well with the concerns of the initiates in Dionysian mystery cults (and see the introduction to this hymn). The "poisonous darts" refers to the arrows that Herakles dipped in the poisonous blood of the slain Hydra.

13. To Kronos

Kronos is traditionally the youngest of the Titans, one of three broods born to Earth and Sky. He is the one who castrates his father and consequently frees the other Titans who had been blocked from exiting the womb of Earth. The other two fraternal groups, the Hundred-Handers and the Kyklopes, he deigns not to liberate. Earth and Sky get their revenge when they advise Kronos' wife Rhea on how to put an end to her husband's ingestion of their children. This involves the trick of substituting a stone for the newly born Zeus, who eventually overthrows his father. Kronos and most of the other Titans attempt to overpower the upstart Zeus and his brethren in the long, pitched battle known as the Titanomachy, but Zeus is able to prevail and imprisons the enemy Titans in Tartaros, a particularly murky area in the underworld. For details, see Hesiod Theogony 132–210, 453–506, and 617–731. In general, Orphic theogony appears to have appropriated many of these traditional elements, although in one account Zeus tricks Kronos by getting him drunk with honey (wine having not yet been invented, doubtlessly due to the fact that Dionysos had not yet been born) and castrating him in turn (see Orphic fragment 220, 222, and 225; see also PGM 4.3100). Kronos, along with the Titans, is also responsible for the brutal murder of Dionysos in Orphic lore, and it is the destruction of the Titans by Zeus that leads to the birth of the human race (see note to line 1 below).

While Kronos is cast in the role as adversary to the gods, there is an alternate, positive strand in his mythology. In Hesiod's myth of the five races of man, the first and best, the Golden race, enjoys a paradisiacal existence under Kronos' rule (Works and Days 109–126). A similar kind of lifestyle is enjoyed by certain select members of humanity after death in the Elysian Fields or on the Isle of the Blest. In Homer, it is relatives of Zeus that qualify for such an honorific dispensation (e.g., Menelaos, as a son-in-law of Zeus, at Odyssey 4.561–569). In Hesiod it is an unspecified number of men of the Heroic race that are awarded a carefree life (one similar to that of the Golden race) after death (Works and Days 166–173; compare the more agonistic Norse notion of Valhalla). Pindar designates the Isle of the Blest as a place for "those who have endured/three times in either realm/to keep their souls untainted/by any injustice” (Olympian Odes 2.68–70, translation by Nisetich 1980) and explicitly says that these souls will “travel/Zeus’ road to the tower of Kronos,” (ibid., 70–71) located on the islands where the dead bask in leisure (72–80). For the idea of “ethical selection” after death and the promise of blessings in the afterlife for Orphic initiates, see Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 100–105 and 115–116. At a festival called the Kronia, celebrated in Athens and elsewhere in Greece, the slaves would join their masters at the feast and, according to one source, were served by them (cf. the Roman Saturnalia). The effacement of social class probably has its roots in the idea of a “golden age,” when there was no need to toil on the land and hence no slavery (Burkert 1985, pp. 231–232). Kronos shared a temple with Rhea and Earth at Athens (Pausanias 1.18.7).

Our hymn seems little concerned with the mythological Kronos, either in his positive or negative aspects. He is addressed as an august ancient divinity, and in particular his association with Time, an integral deity in the Orphic theogonies, is stressed (see note on line 3). In the previous hymn Herakles is identified with Time and is called a Titan (lines 3 and 1, respectively, and see notes). This hymn neatly transitions to the all-important Olympian gods through the illustrious pair of Kronos and Rhea, the parents of Zeus (for similar pairings, see OH 14.8–9n).

1 father of blessed gods and men: As Time (see note to line 3), he is indeed the father of gods and men, since he sired the primeval elements, Khaos, Erebus, and Ether. This line, though, admits of other interpretations. The “blessed gods” could be a specific reference to the Olympian gods, of whom Kronos, either directly or indirectly, may rightly be called the “father.” He also may be considered as father of men in the sense that he is the most prominent of the Titans, out of whom man was born in Orphic myth (see OH 37i), or to the extent that he might be identified with Prometheus (see note to line 7), who very often is credited with the creation of man (e.g., Aristophanes Birds 686, Plato Protagoras 320d; cf. the creation of Pandora by Hephaistos, a god with some similarities to Prometheus, at Hesiod Works and Days 60–63 and 70–71; see also OH 66i). Note that in the spell “Oracle of Kronos” found in the magical papyri, Kronos is credited with creating “the entire inhabited world” (PGM 4.3099). See also “progenitor” in line 8. The birthing theme found in the previous hymns continues. In the following hymn, Kronos’ wife Rhea is called “mother of gods/and of mortals” (OH 14.8–9).

3 you consume all things and replenish them: The identification of Kronos with Time (Greek Khronos) is a later development, but one that was easily made. The idea of consuming and replenishing perhaps hints at the swallowing and subsequent regurgitation of his children and thus might have facilitated equating Kronos to

Time. Note, too, that his son Zeus swallows and then “recreates” the entire world in the theogony found in the Rhapsodies (Orphic fragment 241). Kronos is the source of our “Father Time,” whose sickle, incidentally, has its origins as the device used to castrate Sky. Further references to Kronos as Time in our hymn can be found in lines 5 and 7.

4: The “unbreakable chains” of Kronos are proverbial. Plato portrays them as being inferior to the “bonds of virtue” by which Hades keeps the virtuous dead in his kingdom (Cratylus 404a). In the magical papyri, they turn up in a binding spell (PGM 4.2326) as an attribute of Moon, along with a scepter that has writing on it authored by Kronos (PGM 4.2841), and in the spell called the Oracle of Kronos (PGM 4.3086–3124).

6 child of Earth, child of starry Sky: A similar formulation is found in Hesiod Theogony 106 for all the gods born of Earth and Sky. The Titans as a group are called the “glorious children of Sky and Earth” in their hymn (OH 37.1). Many of the Bacchic gold tablets instruct the initiate to claim that he or she is a child of Earth and starry Sky and of a heavenly race; see OH 4i and compare the claim made by the initiate to Persephone and the other underworld gods that he or she is from the same race (see Graf/Johnston 2007, nos. 5, 6, and 7, as well their discussion on pp. 111–114).

7 revered and prudent lord of Rhea: Rhea is both sister and wife to Kronos; see the following hymn. The word translated as “prudent” is “promētheu,” which some have translated as “Prometheus,” thus positing an equivalence between these two proverbially clever Titans. The craftiness and intelligence of Kronos is emphasized in this hymn: he is “resourceful” (line 2), “of the shifting stories” (line 5), and “wily” (line 9). A further reason why these two figures are blended might be their involvement in the creation of man (see note to line 1).

14. To Rhea

Rhea is a Titan, daughter of Earth and Sky, and the sister of Kronos, whom she married after he successfully rebelled against Sky. Her place in mythology was essentially limited to her importance as the mother of Zeus and in particular her role in the succession myth between her son and husband/brother (see OH 13i). However, she accrued more prominence when she was later identified with Kybele, the great Phrygian mountain mother of the gods, who was also known as Mother (Greek Mētēr), and Mother of the Gods. This is one of many equivalences that was made between a Greek goddess of fertility and the Phrygian goddess. The lyric poet Melanippides (ca. mid-fifth century ^{BC}) equated Demeter and Mother (PMG 764), while the lyric poet Telestes (late fifth century ^{BC}) also added Rhea to the equation (PMG 809). Such identifications apparently had already been made in early Orphic thought, for the author of the Derveni papyrus quotes the following from a poem he attributes to Orpheus, “Earth, Meter, Rhea, Hera, Demeter, Hestia, and Deio” (for this last name, see OH 40.1n), while also giving some etymologizing explanations for the various appellations (Orphic fragment 398, and see Betegh 2004, pp. 189–190). In our collection, there is some overlap between this hymn and the one addressed to the Mother of the Gods (OH 27); compare also the ones to Earth (OH 26) and Eleusinian Demeter (OH 40). We find some correspondences as well with the Homeric Hymn to the Mother of the Gods and, to a lesser extent, the Homeric Hymn to Earth, Mother of All. In Orphic mythology, Zeus, in the form of a snake, mates with his mother, Rhea, who had also changed herself into a snake to escape the advances of her son, which leads to the birth of Persephone (Orphic fragment 87). Here we find a blending of Demeter, Persephone’s traditional mother, and Rhea (see also OH 29i). The monstrous appearance of Persephone frightened Rhea so much that she refused to offer her breast to the child (Orphic fragment 88), a motif also found in the Homeric Hymn to Pan (see OH 11i). Rhea is the one who puts the pieces of her grandson Dionysos back together after he is murdered by the Titans (for references and further discussion, see Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 75–77).

The position of this hymn emphasizes Rhea’s prestige as the wife of Kronos and the mother of Zeus, her customary associations in Greek mythology. However, the content of the hymn itself vacillates between stressing this side of the goddess and her identification with Kybele; see notes passim.

1 daughter of many-faced Protogonos: This is true, insofar as Rhea is considered the same as Earth, for in one version of the Orphic myth of creation, Protogonos and Night give birth to Earth and Sky (Orphic fragment 149). Strictly speaking, though, she is their granddaughter.

2 bull-slayers: This is a kenning for lions, animals typically associated with Kybele. See further OH 27.2+n.

3 you dance to the sound of drums and cymbals, O frenzy-loving maiden: Percussive instruments are characteristic of the ecstatic elements of Kybele’s cult; see OH 27.11n. Euripides explicitly associates this with Rhea in the Bacchae. The chorus of Bacchantes first sings of the dance of the Kouretes to the drums and auloi as they protected the infant Zeus, which is presented as the invention of the custom. Next, the chorus tells us, the drum was passed down to Rhea, from whom the maddened satyrs stole it. Finally, it reached the hands of the Kouretes for use in Dionysian ritual (120–134). The Phrygian drum of Rhea is mentioned earlier in the play by the chorus (58–59). For the role of madness in this cult, see line 6 below and OH 27.13n, which supplies further references to the theme of insanity that runs throughout the Hymns. Rhea’s connection to the ecstatic Kouretes and the Kretan cave cult of Zeus probably facilitated her identification with the Phrygian goddess, who was associated with a similar band of ecstatic youths, the Korybantes (see OH 27i and OH 31i). Wild dancing is also typical of maenadic worship; see OH 52i.

6 horrid shrieks of mortals: The conjunction of this phrase with “in the mountains” probably means these shrieks are those of the worshippers of Dionysos, possessed by the god and in a state of ecstasy. They can be “horrid,” because of the terrible things that these raving adherents sometimes effect; an example is their tearing apart of Pentheus, which Euripides grippingly portrays in the Bacchae. Likewise, this phrase might refer to madness in general (see note to line 3). To be sure, ecstasy and madness are concepts that the Greeks did not consider completely distinct from one another, and we, too, need not be detained by a pedantic precision; see further OH 30i.

8 liar, savior, redeemer: Quandt has postulated that “liar” refers to Rhea’s deception of her husband at the birth of Zeus, and he draws attention to Pausanias, who describes Kronos as being deceived by his sister-wife (9.41.6). She thus can also be considered “savior” and “redeemer” of the child, just as she sometimes is of Dionysos in Orphic mythology (see the introduction to this hymn). There may also be an oblique reference to this tale in Apollodoros who says that after Dionysos had been driven insane by Hera, he came to Mount Kybela in Phrygia where he was purified by Rhea and taught initiatory rites (3.5.1; see also Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 146–147, and OH 27.13n). However, soteriological and redemptive powers turn up throughout the collection among other divinities, often near the close of the hymn when the addressee is enjoined to appear.

8–9 mother of gods / and of mortals: This is paralleled by Kronos being called “father of blessed gods and men” (OH 13.1+n). Kybele is also expressly attributed as such (OH 27.7); see also OH 26.1+n. There are other mother goddesses in the collection (see OH 10.1n), as well as a number of explicit male/female pairings: Night/Sky (OH 3/4), Zeus/Hera (OH 15/16), Nereus/Nereids (OH 23/24), Persephone/Dionysos (OH 29/30), Sabazios/Hipta (OH 48/49), Aphrodite/Adonis (OH 55/56), Asklepios/Hygeia (OH 67/68), Tyche/Daimon (OH 72/73), and Leukothea/Palaimon (OH 74/75); see also OH 61i, OH 69i, and OH 76i.

9–10 earth, / ... sky ... sea ... winds: These lines elevate Rhea to the status of the primeval womb of creation; compare the Homeric Hymn to Earth, Mother of All: “Her beauty nurtures all creatures that walk upon the land,/and all that move in the deep or fly in the air” (30.3–4). Insofar as the sky is connected with ether, and hence fire, these four physical items are symbolic of the four elements that constitute the physical world (see OH 11.2–3n). A similar range of natural features (albeit without the symbolism of the four elements) appears in Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 1.1098–1099, when the seer Mopsos advises Jason to propitiate Mother of the Gods, “for on her the winds and sea and earth’s foundations/all depend, and the snowy bastion of Olympos” (translation by Green 1997). See also OH 27, addressed to the same Mother of the Gods, the “queen of the sky” (line 4), to whom the earth belongs (line 6) and who “hold[s] sway over the rivers and over all the sea” (line 8). In the Epidaurian hymn to Mother of the Gods, she asks for half of heaven, earth, and sea, apparently in recompense for the abduction of her daughter (19–24; see also OH 27i). For other mentions of the earth, sea, and sky in the collection, see OH 10.14–16n. The mention of the winds last neatly transitions to the attributes “ethereal” and “restless” in the next line.

15. To Zeus

Zeus is the chief deity of the Greek pantheon, and his role in myth and cult is as wide-ranging as his power. A large portion of Hesiod’s Theogony treats his ascendancy to ruler of the universe. He is hidden away on Krete as a babe, frees his siblings who had been swallowed by his father, Kronos, at birth, and then leads a successful rebellion against him and most of his father’s brethren, the Titans (see OH 13i). Hesiod then gives a brief portrayal of his victory over a second threat, the monstrous Typhon (820–880; see Apollodoros 1.6.3 for a fuller account). After dividing the universe among himself and his brothers (see OH 17.7n), Zeus takes on a series of wives, who give birth to a number of important divinities and heroes (886–926). Of his countless affairs in mythology, the two most significant ones to Orphism are his union with his mother Rhea, which produces Persephone (this is specific to Orphism; see OH 14i and OH 29i), and his relations with Semele, which produces Dionysos (see OH 44i).

In cult, Zeus was worshipped in diverse ways, from a personal, household deity that brought good fortune (cf. line 11 below and OH 19.20; see also OH 73i) to a Panhellenic god who symbolized a common Greek culture (e.g., at Olympia and the Olympic Games). As a weather god, he is often called on to bring life-nourishing rain to the crops; he thus has fertility associations. In Iliad 14.346–351, when Zeus embraces Hera before they make love on Mount Ida, the earth itself blossoms into a breath-taking array of flowers and they draw a golden cloud around them that sheds dew; this scene seems to be reminiscent of a very old myth of the union of Father Sky and Mother Earth as the source of life itself (see also OH 4i). An inscription found at Palaikastro, Krete, preserves a hymn that invokes him as the “greatest kouros [youth]” and prays that he “leap into” the flocks, fields, and homes as a spur to growth (see also OH 31i). The fertility aspect of Zeus may even endow this celestial god with a chthonic character (cf. OH 7.9n), and he sometimes is depicted in the form of a snake. Note, too, that when Zeus impregnates Rhea/Demeter, both are in the form of a snake. Another important aspect of Zeus in Greek religion is his role in maintaining social institutions. He is one of the gods who protects the sanctity of oaths (like Sun; see OH 8i). Both guest and host are under his guardianship, as well as suppliants and beggars. In general, justice and order, the underlying principles of human community, are his responsibility. This is symbolized in myth, where Dike is his daughter and Themis his first wife (see OH 43i, OH 62i, and OH 79i). For more on his role in Greek religion and cult, see Burkert 1985, pp. 125–131, and Larson 2007, pp. 15–28.

It is interesting that in this hymn there is scarcely any attention paid to his mythological exploits or his role in human affairs. He is above all presented as a cosmic god, the creator of the universe and universal order, all-powerful and majestic. The same is true of the other two hymns addressed to him as “Thunderbolt” and Astrapaios, respectively (OH 19 and OH 20). His placement in this collection serves as a culmination of the cosmogonic arc that defines the previous fourteen hymns, all of which are addressed to primeval beings. There is a gradual movement from abstractions to concrete anthropomorphism (see OH 11i, OH 12i, and OH 13i); it is almost as if the known universe is taking shape before the initiates’ eyes. Once the divine pair of Zeus and Hera is reached, the cosmogony proper has come to a close, and the theogony can begin (see also note to lines 3–5). This is further reinforced by the following consideration. The direction of the arrangement of entities up until now has been chronological, but only four of the original six Olympian gods are grouped together here. The hymns to Demeter and Hestia should properly find their place among these. But the dynamic, chronological movement has ended; instead the collection takes a more static, horizontal approach, branching out as it were over the family tree of Zeus (eventually focusing, of course, on Dionysos and Dionysian cult). Furthermore, the constituent elements of the world—fire, air, water, and earth—are singularly emphasized in the hymns to Zeus, Hera, Poseidon, and Plouton, respectively. This sequence is repeated by the following hymns, which adhere to the same order: fire (OH 19–20), air (OH 21), water (OH 22–25), and earth (OH 26–27). Demeter, who also is associated with the element earth, is in a sense already present in OH 26–27 by dint of her identification with primeval goddesses (Rhea, Kybele). Furthermore, her prominence in the Eleusinian Mysteries makes her hymn more appropriate of the central group that treats figures of Dionysian cult (OH 40–54). The domestic associations of Hestia, who could be equated with the element fire, would not easily fit the cosmological context (see further OH 84i). This “elemental” placement of hymns also recurs toward the end of the collection (OH 79–84), albeit in a different order (see OH 79i), and similar groupings are found in the opening address to Mousaios (see OH O.3–5+n, and OH O.32–33). The order of hymns 15–18 and 19–27 is the same as in the Stoic creation of the elements out of the primeval fire, attributed to Khrysippos, following Zeno (Long and Sedley 1987, fragment 47A; cf. 46C).

There is a very short Homeric hymn addressed to Zeus where he is paired with Themis. Kallimakhos and the Stoic philosopher Kleanthes each wrote a hymn to Zeus, and Aratos opens his Phainomena with an invocation to Zeus as the one who set the stars in the sky as signs for mankind (1–18).

3–5: In the first instance, these lines are typical in the way the power of a god is presented by describing his efficacy throughout the range of creation. Kleanthes uses the same technique in his hymn to Zeus (15–16), and we also find it elsewhere in our collection (see OH 10.14–16n and in particular OH 19.9–19). Nevertheless, there is special point to its appearance here, for it is probably meant literally. In the Orphic cosmogony found in the Rhapsodies, Zeus is said to have swallowed Protogonos and with him the entire cosmos and then to have reconstituted them again in a second act of creation; it seems that some version of this account was already present by the Classical period, for the exegete in the Derveni papyrus (fourth century ^{BC}) alludes to a similar, if not the same, story (see Orphic fragment 12, 14, 31, 237–243, West 1982, pp. 84–93, 218–220, 237–241, and Betegh 2004, pp. 111–122, 125–126, 169–181). Of particular note is the existence of a hymn to Zeus, found in the Pseudo-Aristotle De mundo (401a25 = Orphic fragment 31) and the Rhapsodies (Orphic fragment 243), which probably ultimately derive from whatever poem the Derveni author is analyzing (see Orphic fragment 14). The one in the Rhapsodies, far more extensive than the other two, actually matches physical features with Zeus’ body parts; compare the allegorical interpretation of “cosmic Pan” (see OH 11i) and in Norse mythology the creation of the world out of the carcass of Ymir by Óðin, Vili, and Vé. The act of swallowing is also reminiscent of Kronos’ attempts to thwart any potential threat from his children by swallowing them, and it should be recalled that Zeus swallows Metis when he learns that she is fated to bear a son mightier than he is (Hesiod Theogony 886–900). The motif is taken up in the Orphic story but turned on its head. Zeus is not worried about losing his supremacy; rather he is seeking to establish it (see also note to line 7).

6 scepter: Traditionally the symbol of a sovereign’s power. The symbolism is also employed in the Orphic succession stories (see OH 10.26n).

7 beginning and end of all: We find similar sentiments in all three Orphic hymns to Zeus (see note to lines 3–5); compare also Aratos Phainomena 14. By swallowing

Protogonos and recreating the world, Zeus in effect becomes the oldest being. Betegh argues that the strange second creation is meant, among other things, to resolve a contradiction that was felt between Zeus' supreme power and the fact that he is not among the oldest, but rather youngest generation of gods; by having Zeus recreate the world, one and the same entity acquires both priority in age and power (Betegh 2004, pp. 172–174). Our collection might also be attempting to come to grips with the problem in another way. This hymn to Zeus appears in its proper chronological sequence, but Zeus is the first god mentioned in Orpheus' address to Mousaios (OH O.3, right before Earth). For the personified Beginning and End, see OH O.41+n. The same phrase here is used of Sky in his hymn (see OH 4.2+n).

8–9: The reference to thunder and lightning, as well as the thunderbolt mentioned in line 6, anticipate OH 19 and OH 20. The role of Zeus as weather god and Zeus as fertility god is suggested in these lines (“increaser,” “sower”). While purity is of great concern in many contexts, it is interesting to note that Zeus was sometimes worshipped under the title Katharsios (Purifier); see OH 20i and also OH 30.4n.

10–11 health, / ... peace and riches: While such requests are made throughout the collection, it is nevertheless perhaps significant that Eirene (Peace) is one of the Seasons, daughters of Zeus and Themis (see OH 43i). Hygeia, health personified, is the addressee of OH 68; she is sometimes invoked with Zeus over libations poured at symposia (see OH 68i and OH 73i). The collocation of health, peace, and wealth appear frequently in requests: see OH 14.12–13 (Rhea), OH 17.10 (Poseidon), OH 19.21 (Zeus the Thunderbolt), OH 23.8 (Nereus), OH 32.15–16 (Athene). Note that fertility replaces wealth in OH 10.31 (Physis) and OH 36.14–15 (Artemis). In OH 40 (Eleusinian Demeter), this type of request reaches a crescendo, combining health, peace, wealth, and law, perhaps because of the hymn's prominence in the collection (see OH 40i+18–20n).

16. To Hera

Hera is a daughter of Kronos and Rhea, and the sister-wife of Zeus; see, e.g., the Homeric Hymn to Hera. She has fertility connections, as can be seen in Homer, who in the Iliad portrays her and Zeus making love on top of a mountain, reminiscent of the marriage between Father Sky and Mother Earth (see OH 15i). She is identified with a number of earth-mother goddesses, along with Hestia, in an Orphic verse cited in the Derveni papyrus (see OH 14i). As with Earth herself, Hera is able to produce children parthenogenetically, such as Typhon (Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.326–352), whose parents, according to Hesiod, are Earth and Tartaros (see OH 18.2n). Typhon becomes the arch-enemy of Zeus, and this incident reflects one of the more pervasive themes in mythology, namely, the constant bickering of Hera and Zeus. Occasionally Hera stands up to Zeus directly; Homer, for example, briefly mentions her role with Athene and Poseidon in their attempted coup of Zeus (Iliad 1.396–406). More often, however, Hera unleashes her fury on Zeus' lovers and illegitimate children. She is particularly adamant in pursuing Herakles. Dionysos and those around him do not escape her wrath, either. By her machinations Semele is destroyed (see OH 44i), Ino suffers (see OH 74i), and Dionysos himself, as Herakles and Io, is driven mad (see Euripides Kyklops 3, Plato Laws 672b, and Apollodoros 3.5.1). In the Orphic myth of Dionysos' death, it is sometimes Hera who spurs the Titans to kill the child (see OH 37i and Orphic fragment 304). While in the myth known as the "Return of Hephaistos" (see OH 66i) Dionysos does appear to help Hera, nonetheless it is also possible that the reconciliation Dionysos indirectly effected by leading Hephaistos back to Olympos also led to a grudging reconciliation between him and his step-mother. Thus two outsiders would be integrated into the divine order together.

Despite Hera's antipathy to Dionysos in myth, we do in fact sometimes find them together in cult. Alkaios refers to a sanctuary dedicated to Zeus, Hera, and Dionysos on Lesbos (fragment 129). At Olympia, where her temple predated the one to Zeus, there was a chorus in honor of Physkoa, a local lover of Dionysos, performed at games held in Hera's honor (Pausanias 5.16.1–8). In general, Hera's role in cult is largely one of maintaining social order. She is usually worshipped as a civic goddess, one who protects and maintains the well-being of the community, particularly in her capacity as the goddess of marriage, one of the most important institutions in the ancient world. For more information on her role in Greek religion, see Burkert 1985, pp. 131–135, and Larson 2007, pp. 29–40. In this hymn, however, her traditional cultic roles are omitted as is her mythological persona. Indeed, she is scarcely conceived as an anthropomorphic goddess but instead closely identified with the air and life-bringing rains. Her fertility associations are thus maintained without the usual concomitant chthonic character. While Zeus is sometimes equated with air (see Betegh 2004, pp. 193–197), it is Hera who more often is considered a manifestation of this element. Plato etymologically relates her name and the word for air (Cratylus 404c), and the Stoics also make the identification (see Long and Sedley 1987, fragment 54A, and OH 21i). It is possible that such a connection was also attributed to Orpheus; see Orphic fragment 202(iv). As already mentioned, Hera is sometimes claimed to be the mother of Typhon. This creature is associated with destructive winds (Hesiod Theogony 869–880; see also OH 23.5–7n), and perhaps the version that makes Hera his mother was influenced by a play on Hera/air as in Plato. This hymn thus fits in the sequence of gods that are correlated with the four elements, and the hymn to the Clouds (OH 21) would be its analogue in the subsequent group that replicates this pattern (see OH 15i). It also forms a male/female pair with the previous hymn, a common structural feature of the collection (see OH 14.8–9n).

3 soft breezes you send ... nourish the soul: The word for “soul” in Greek, “psukhē,” also has the connotations of “life” in general, and this is probably its sense here as it is at OH 38.22 of the Kouretes, who appear to be manifestations of the “soft breezes” (see also OH 38.3+n). Furthermore, it is etymologically connected with the verb “psukhō,” “I blow,” and our composer, who elsewhere displays an ear for such wordplay, likely intends one here as well.

4 mother of rains, mother of the winds: For the connection of rain and wind, see OH 21i.

4 you give birth to all: The epithet used here is also given to Hera by Alkaïos (fragment 129).

17. To Poseidon

Poseidon is a son of the Titans Kronos and Rhea, and a brother of Zeus and Hades. He is the god of the sea, and sometimes the sea itself, as in the Lesser Krater, attributed to Orpheus (Orphic fragment 413.7). As our hymn explains, the sea fell to him by lot when the world was divided (line 7 and see note), and all bodies of water fall under his control. Nevertheless, he does infringe a bit on Zeus’ power over the storms, and we often find him stirring them up in mythology (e.g., Odyssey 5.282–296). Also like Zeus, Poseidon is a father of heroes, Theseus being the most famous example. In some variants Poseidon is even the father of Persephone, mating with Demeter in the form of a horse (see OH 69i), which also produces the wonder horse Areion. This points to another important sphere of Poseidon, that of horses (see, e.g., Iliad 23.306–308, Sophokles Oedipus at Kolonos 712–715, and Aristophanes Knights 551–558). A famous equine offspring of his is Pegasos, born to Medousa after she is beheaded by Perseus (Hesiod Theogony 278–281). Another important function of Poseidon is his role in causing earthquakes; his common epithet “shaker of the earth” appears in line 4. He was also imagined to hold or embrace the earth, as another common epithet of his, “holder of the earth,” attests (see line 1). Both epithets are juxtaposed as a playful oxymoron by Hesiod (Theogony 15), and we find each one used in cult. Poseidon was an important deity in bronze-age Pylos (Nestor’s father, Neleus, is his son), and of course he was especially worshipped by those communities whose livelihood depended on the sea, such as Korinth. One tradition reported by Pausanias claimed that Poseidon was the god of Delphi along with Earth until he switched places with Apollon, taking this god’s old site at Kalaurea (2.33.2, 10.5.6). This is an island off Troizen, where Poseidon was an important divinity, and it was also the birthplace of Theseus. Poseidon contended with Athene for this island, but Zeus awarded it to both of them (Pausanias 2.30.6). They also fought over Athens, but here Athene was victorious; the myth is depicted on the west pediment of the Parthenon. A strange ritual to Poseidon as god of horses is portrayed in the Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.230–238. For more details on his cults, see Burkert 1985, pp. 136–139, and Larson 2007, pp. 57–68. Orphism seems to have adopted the traditional view of this god. Indeed, this hymn is wholly composed of conventional items. It represents the element of water, and it is the third of a series of hymns that links some of the Olympian divinities sprung from Kronos and Rhea with the four elements (see OH 15i). OH 22–25, dedicated to maritime divinities, are analogously placed.

- 1: This line is almost identical to the one in the Homeric Hymn to Poseidon, except that instead of “hearken” the Homeric hymn reads “hail” (22.6). The opening address to Mousaios also refers to Poseidon as the “dark-maned holder of the earth” (OH O.5).
- 3: For one view of how the Greeks imagined his abode, see the languorous dreamscape of Poseidon’s palace depicted by Bacchylides (17.97–129); see also OH 24.2–3+n.
- 5–6: Poseidon’s driving his chariot on the sea is a literary trope as old as Homer (Iliad 13.23–31).
- 7: After Zeus becomes king, he divides the world among himself and his two other brothers. They draw lots: Hades wins the underworld, Poseidon the seas, and Zeus the sky (see Iliad 15.185–195, Hesiod Theogony 881–885, and Apollodoros 1.2.1). This was adopted into Orphic mythology as well (Orphic fragment 236). A very similar line appears in line 6 of the following hymn; cf. also OH 15i.
- 9–10: As the “shaker of the earth” (line 4), Poseidon naturally has the power both to cause and prevent earthquakes. Likewise, as the god of the sea he is able to wreck ships or save them (see Hesiod Works and Days 665–668, where he shares this power with Zeus). The Kouretes also hold the power to hinder or help sailors (OH 38.5, 14–17, 23–25), the latter function easing their identification with the Dioskouroi, who are traditionally worshipped as saviors of sailors (see OH 38.21+i). Other gods, too, are invoked in this capacity as well: Tethys (OH 22.9–10), Leukothea (OH 74.4–9) and Leukothea’s son Palaimon (OH 75.5–8).

18. To Plouton

Plouton is another name for Hades. His name is connected with “ploutos” (“wealth”), although Ploutos also is the name of a separate divinity (see OH 40.16n), one of the many personified divine abstractions found in Greek religious thought. Originally Plouton was a separate god, but he merged with Hades sometime before the fourth century ^{BC} and their names became more or less interchangeable. This early merging is probably at the root of the god's dual function as both lord of the dead (Hades) and as provider of the fruits of the earth, including mineral wealth (Plouton). While at first blush it might seem odd for a god to be so intimately connected with both life and death, it should be kept in mind that many divinities hold power over binary opposites. Persephone, too, is a goddess of life and death; see OH 29+i, especially lines 15–16, and OH 30i. Crops and other vegetation come out from below the earth and thus could be interpreted as being caused by Hades and Persephone. There are very few myths associated with Hades-Plouton. The most prominent one is his abduction of Persephone, which is mentioned in lines 12–15 (see OH 41i). This story is part of the foundation myth of the Eleusinian Mysteries (see OH 40i). When Hades receives cult attention, it is almost always in his capacity as a fertility god, and he is usually worshipped alongside his wife Persephone, also called Kore (a word that means “maiden” in Greek). Hades is the son of Kronos and Rhea, and thus brother to Zeus and Poseidon. The placement of this hymn completes the genealogical pattern of Zeus-Poseidon-Hades. Further, with the strong association of Plouton with earth, it also ends the series of the four elements that was initiated with the hymn to Zeus; see OH 15i. The analogous hymns are OH 26–27, and note that OH 29 is a hymn addressed to Persephone.

2 meadow in Tartaros: While the “psukhai” (“spirits, souls”) of the dead are portrayed as wandering on asphodel meadows (e.g., Odyssey 11.539), Tartaros is usually envisioned as a distinct place, where the Titans and Typhon, after being defeated by Zeus, are imprisoned (Hesiod Theogony 717–733 and 868; see also OH 37.3+n). It is in effect the Alcatraz of mythology. Tartaros was originally a vaguely personified primordial being with whom Earth mated to produce Typhon (Hesiod Theogony 119 and 820–822; see also OH 16i). Sacred meadows also appear in the Bacchic gold tablets as part of the special dispensation the initiate receives after death (nos. 3, 27; see also OH 29i and OH 87.12n). Orphic fragment 340 distinguishes the “beautiful meadow” by the river Acheron (see note to line 10), whither those who did good deeds while alive go after they die, from Tartaros, whither the malefactors go by way of Kokytos (see also OH 71.2n). Another meadow that has chthonic connections is the one where Persephone was picking flowers before being abducted by Hades; it is mentioned in line 13.

3 Chthonic Zeus: A common periphrasis for Hades, who is rarely mentioned by name (see also OH O.12+n). The expression does not imply that Zeus and Plouton are the same person, but rather that Plouton is lord of his own element, the depths of the earth, and by extension of the whole earth (see line 6 and note). Similarly, Poseidon is called “sea-dwelling Zeus” at OH 63.15. Hades is also known as Aidoneus, as well as by a number of epithets that essentially function as titles (such as the list given in lines 11–12). This scruple reflects ancient belief that calling a divinity by name might draw their attention to the one invoking them, and Hades, in his capacity as the lord of death, is a god one normally wishes to avoid as long as possible (cf. OH 87.11–12). Our initiates must nevertheless propitiate him, as he would have the power to keep them from a blessed afterlife (compare lines 17–18).

4 holder of the keys to the whole earth: Hades’ portrayal as one who holds the keys to the underworld can represent his power to keep the dead locked up and his ability to prevent them from returning to the land of the living (Pausanias 5.20.3). In this case, however, the keys are more likely intended to be symbolic of the god’s power to give or withhold the wealth of the earth, as is made clear by the employment of the name Plouton in this context; see also OH 25.1 and OH 29.4.

9 of windless, and of impassive Hades: Just as it is in the use of the word “Tartaros” at line 2 (and see note), a blurring between person and place is seen in the usage of the word “Hades,” which designates both the god and the realm he rules (see also line 15). Hades is often described by adjectives and phrases that indicate the lack of something: other typical examples include “tearless” and “without laughter.” The underworld is often seen as the inverse of the land of the living. Comparable is Odysseus’ sojourn to the land of the dead in book 11 of the Odyssey. The psukhai cannot speak, until they drink blood, considered by the early Greeks to be one of the vital forces that make life possible (another one being air; see also OH 66.9+n). There is also an inversion of social custom here. Normally a host provides for the strangers who come to their door, but in this situation Odysseus, although a visitor, must provide for his hosts—and not the hosts themselves at that, but their subordinates.

10 Acheron: The “river of woe,” it is sometimes specially designated as the one which the psukhai must cross to reach Hades proper; see also note to line 2.

12 Euboulos: The name means “of good counsel” and is another form of the name Eubouleus; see OH 41.8n.

12–15: The beginning part of the abduction of Persephone. “Attic cave” and “Eleusis” are clearly intended to evoke the Eleusinian Mysteries, the most famous mystery cult in antiquity and the one with the most participants (see OH 40i).

16 you alone were born to judge: Usually the judges of the dead are prestigious heroes. The most important ones are Minos, king of Krete, his brother Rhadamanthys, and Aiakos, all sons of Zeus (see, e.g., Plato Gorgias 523a–524a). Sokrates at his trial even adds Triptolemos, one of the Eleusinian heroes (Plato Apology 41a), a detail perhaps embellished to play to the sympathy of his judges, of whom some were doubtlessly initiates in the Eleusinian Mysteries. Of course, Hades and Persephone are often depicted as exercising their executive prerogatives, as numerous figures in mythology appeal to them to allow them return to the land of the living, such as Orpheus himself, when he requested to bring back Eurydike (see also OH 87.9n).

19. To Zeus the Thunderbolt

The display of light and sound during a powerful thunderstorm is an awesome sight to behold, even to the modern mind, which of course knows there are rationally grounded scientific principles that explain the meteorological phenomena it perceives. How much more it must have captured the imagination of the ancients when the previously serene skies suddenly and inexplicably exploded in a violent eruption of elemental fury! It is no wonder that a god who wields the thunderbolt would hold a prominent place in any pantheon, and for the Greeks this is in the hands of the chief deity Zeus. In myth, thunder and lightning are supplied to him by his uncles, the Kyklopes, of whom there are three: Brontes (Thunderer), Steropes (Flash), and Arges (Brightness). These Kyklopes gave the thunderbolt to Zeus out of gratitude for his releasing them from the underworld (Hesiod Theogony 139–146, 501–506; Apollodoros 1.1.2 and 1.2.1; Orphic fragment 228). They are usually portrayed as smiths (e.g., Orphic fragment 269, where they are the teachers of Hephaistos and Athene) and so ought to be distinguished from the unsophisticated rustic race of Kyklopes that Odysseus encounters on his journeys. Zeus uses his great power to defeat the enemies of order and civilization; see, e.g., the similar depictions of his might in the Titanomachy and the defeat of Typhon in Hesiod Theogony 687–710 and 839–868. The lightning bolt of Zeus also makes short work of mortals who transgress boundaries and commit hubris, such as Asklepios, the son of Apollon, who effaced the line between life and death by resurrecting men from the dead (see OH 67i). The weapon sometimes kills unwillingly: in the story of Dionysos' birth, Semele is destroyed by the thunderbolt of a reluctant Zeus bound by an oath (see OH 44i). We find this story adopted into Orphic mythology, which further relates that the Titans are again kerblasted by the lightning of Zeus, this time for their murder of Dionysos (see OH 37i). In cult, Zeus is worshipped, as he is addressed here, as Keraunios (Thunderbolt) and also Kataibates (Descender); in fact, both had an altar at Olympia (Pausanias 5.14.7, 10). Those who died by lightning strike were often accorded special honors after death (see OH 20i).

Our hymn focuses on the physical manifestation of the thunderbolt itself in a surprisingly vivid and extended description that fills almost the entire hymn. Like a painter, the poet guides our eye from the appearance of the bolt in the sky, through its dizzying descent, and down to its epiphany on the surface world. It thus encompasses the same collocation of realms as found in other hymns in the collection (see OH 10.14–16n and in particular OH 15.3–5+n) and thus accentuates the cosmological significance of Zeus’ power. Another similarity to OH 15 is that the element fire is emphasized, as it is in the companion hymn that follows. This hymn begins a series that is arranged on the same principle of the four elements that defined the order of OH 15–19 (see OH 15i). Kleanthes also praises the power of Zeus’ thunderbolt, stressing that it is the tool Zeus employs to steer the world with reason (Hymn to Zeus 9–13); compare also the statement that “thunderbolt directs everything,” attributed to Herakleitos (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 220).

16–17: Possibly a vague reference to the birth of Protogonos as reported by the Rhapsodies, where the egg out of which he is born is also called a “cloud” and a “bright robe” (Orphic fragment 121; see also OH 21i).

20. To Astrapaïos Zeus

This hymn forms a pair with the previous one to Zeus the Thunderbolt. It is shorter, but they have a number of similarities: stress on fire, atmospheric description, and detail of sound. “Astrapaïos” means “of lightning,” and, strictly speaking, refers to the gleam of light that accompanies the thunderbolt. The Greeks sharply distinguished between the sound of thunder, the flash of lightning, and the physical bolt itself (see West 1971, p. 207), and so it is perhaps surprising there is no hymn for Zeus of the Thunder included in this sequence. Thunder, however, is personified and mentioned in the opening address to Mousaios (see OH O.38+n), and as a physical phenomenon thunder appears in this hymn and the previous one, as well as the first one dedicated to Zeus, either explicitly or implicitly (see OH 15.9; OH 19.6, 9, 14–15; cf. OH 20.3). OH 19 and OH 20 essentially refer to the same aspect of Zeus, although they do not fully overlap. Zeus as cosmic begetter appears in this hymn (line 5; cf. OH 15.3–5). He is not invoked to bring a myriad of blessings, as in the previous hymn (OH 19.20–23), but rather to give the initiate a “sweet end to... life.” It is interesting to note that, while there are a number of hymns in the collection that ask in one way or another for a noble end of life, the only ones where the addressee is asked to bring a sweet one is here and in OH 73 to Daimon, who is probably being identified with Zeus (see OH 73i; cf. also OH 86.12). It may have particular point here since there was special religious significance attached to death by lightning. In fact, some of the Bacchic gold tablets seem to refer to being killed by Zeus' lightning; see nos. 5, 6, 7, and Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 125–127. Their suggestion—that the initiates are expressing hope of being purified in death and enjoying the same special status in the underworld as the heroes—may be at work in this hymn as well (see further OH 87.12n). The idea, of course, is not that the initiates wish to be struck by lightning but that their efforts in following the cult would effectively purify their psukhē in preparation for death. Fire often has importance as a purifying agent in Greek religion, and it is significant that Zeus is addressed as “pure” in the opening line of this hymn (see also OH 15.8+8–9n). The “sweetness” of the end of life might then be proleptic.

21. To the Clouds

This hymn corresponds to the hymn to Hera; see OH 16i. This goddess has a connection with clouds in mythology, which might have strengthened the association in our composer's eyes. When the mortal Ixion makes advances on Hera, Zeus creates a cloud doppelganger of his wife, with whom Ixion then has relations. He is punished in the underworld for this outrage, tied to a flaming wheel that endlessly spins throughout eternity. The cloud, though, becomes pregnant and gives birth to the centaurs (see Apollodoros, epit. 1.20). In this hymn, the Clouds are represented, in a similar way Hera is portrayed in hers, purely as meteorological phenomena that produce rain and are the loci for thunder and lightning. There were a number of explanations for these manifestations of weather in antiquity. Anaximander speculated that they occur when wind breaks through a cloud (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, nos. 129–131); Anaximenes added that clouds themselves are formed when the air is condensed and that further condensations eventually squeeze out rain (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 158). Herakleitos contended that thunder comes from the crashing of winds and clouds, lightning from the kindling of the clouds, and rain from their quenching (Diels and Kranz 1951–52, 22A14), while Anaxagoras attributed thunder to the collision of clouds, and lightning to their friction (Diogenes Laertius 2.9). The Sokrates in Aristophanes' Clouds explains thunder and rain as the result of clouds, filled with water, colliding and lightning as the result of a dry wind, caught inside a cloud and breaking forth (367–411). These details have probably been cobbled together from Pre-Socratic theories by Aristophanes, if not outright invented, to set up a number of scatological and political jokes. The founder of Stoicism, Zeno, appears to have been unsure whether lightning, thunder, and the thunderbolt itself were the result of the friction or the striking of the clouds occasioned by the wind (SVF 1.117). The explanation in our hymn seems closest to Aristophanes', and there are a number of verbal reminiscences of his work that suggest direct influence; compare also Sokrates' "Hymn to the Clouds" at 263–274 of that play. That the Clouds are already "filled with blazing thunder" perhaps alludes to the relationship between Zeus, who is identified with the thunderbolt in OH 19, and his wife Hera. The Stoics, when allegorizing Zeus as fire and Hera as air, note that the fire is the superior, active principle, with air being subject to it and passive (see SVF 2.1066, 1070, 1075). The Clouds in this hymn do seem quite passive, even impregnated; that they are invoked to send rain at the end (6–7) is not necessarily a contradiction, since this is a conventional formulation. It is repeated verbatim at the end of OH 82 (see also OH 82.4n). For the belief that the clouds were born from the sea, see OH 22.8n. In the Orphic Rhapsodies, the egg out of which Protogonos is born is called a "cloud" as well as a "bright robe" (Orphic fragment 121; see also OH 19.16–17n and West 1983, p. 202).

22. To the Sea

Sea is here identified with the Titaness Tethys, the wife of Okeanos. For their role in traditional and Orphic cosmogony, see OH 83i. That she and her husband might have had a more important role in certain Orphic accounts of creation might explain why our composer has opted to identify the sea with her, as opposed to another primeval watery figure such as Pontos. The male/female pattern we see employed as a way to group hymns elsewhere in the collection is not used here (but note that Tethys and Okeanos appear together at OH O.26–27). Perhaps the reason is to be found in Okeanos' association with death; see OH 83i. Their daughters, the Okeanids, are identified with the Nymphs to whom OH 51 is addressed (and also see line 8).

This hymn, along with the next three, form a group that is associated with water and is the third in the series that repeats the pattern of elements found in OH 15–18 (see OH 15i). It is also interesting to note that this hymn follows the one to the Clouds just as the hymn to Okeanos follows three separate ones to the winds, which receive prominent notice here and in the previous hymn. For the connection between sea, air, and clouds, see note to line 7.

2 dark-veiled: The same epithet is used of Tethys at OH O.26.

7 mother of Kypris: Kypris is another name for Aphrodite, who in one version is born out of the sea; see OH 3.2n and OH 55i.

7 mother of dark clouds: The idea that the clouds and winds are "born" from the sea goes back to the Pre-Socratics. Xenophanes mentions this explicitly (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 183), and it seems implicit in Anaximander (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 129). Aristophanes is probably alluding to this doctrine when he makes Okeanos the father of the Clouds (Clouds 271 and 277); see also OH 82.4n. For the weather phenomena produced by clouds, see OH 21i.

8 mother of every spring round which nymphs swarm: Aside from creation myths where Okeanos and Tethys are considered the first (or first progenitors) of all, they are credited with being the parents of smaller bodies of water. Hesiod lists some of the three-thousand rivers (male) and three-thousand springs (female) that are their brood (Theogony 337–370). Like other personified water divinities, their human form may be loosely considered separate from the actual physical body of water. In the theogony sung by Orpheus at Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 1.495–512, the Okeanid Eurynome becomes the consort to Ophion, and this pair of gods precedes Kronos and Rhea as the rulers of Olympos (see also OH 83i).

9–10: A common request of sea divinities in our collection; see OH 17.9–10n.

23. To Nereus

According to Hesiod, Nereus is the oldest child of Pontos, a male personification of the sea and a child of Earth (Theogony 233–236). Hesiod describes this divinity as being particularly honest, gentle, and mindful of lawful things. His main importance in myth, other than being the father of the Nereids (see following hymn) is his identification with “the Old Man of the Sea” (e.g., at Pausanias 3.21.9), a role he shares with other figures, particularly Proteus (see OH 25i). He plays no role elsewhere in Orphic cult, and his inclusion here seems to be entirely because of his daughters, with whom he forms another male/female pairing (see OH 14.8–9n).

5–7: Like his son-in-law Poseidon, Nereus is connected with earthquakes. “Demeter’s sacred throne” is a kenning for the earth. The theme of winds continues from the previous two hymns. Here they are locked up under the earth, and it seems that their violent motion thus constrained is imagined to be the cause of earthquakes. This might be intended as an interesting twist to the story of the bag of winds that Aiolos, warden of the winds, gives to Odysseus (Odyssey 10.1–75). All of the winds are contained in the bag except for the gentle west wind Zephyros (see OH 81+3–4n) that conveys Odysseus’ ship home. However his men, not knowing the bag’s contents, but thinking that Odysseus was hiding something good from them, foolishly open the bag, thus letting all the violent winds out (similarly, Pandora; see Wolkow 2007). These promptly blow the ship back to Aiolos, who refuses further assistance to the beleaguered Odysseus. Comparable, too, is the imprisonment of Typhon in Apollodoros’ version of his battle with Zeus (1.6.3). This creature has wind associations and, although imprisoned below Mount Etna by Zeus, is the source of its volcanic activity; see also OH 16i and cf. OH 32.12n.

7–8: The same requests are made of Poseidon at the end of OH 17, who also is additionally petitioned to keep ships safe.

24. To the Nereids

The traditional genealogy, retained in this hymn, makes the Nereids daughters of Nereus (which is what their name literally means) and the Okeanid Doris. There are usually fifty of them. Hesiod gives a complete list of their names (Theogony 240–264), while Homer only manages thirty-four, including Thetis (Iliad 18.39–49), the mother of Akhilleus, who, along with Amphitrite, wife of Poseidon, are the most famous ones. One anonymous poem, however, calls them the daughters of Amphitrite (PMG 939.10–11). Their worship was wide-spread and localized (Pausanias 2.1.8), and Sappho invokes them along with Aphrodite to bring her brother back home safe (fragment 5). Thetis is found with her own cults separate from the group (see Burkert 1985, p. 172). Their importance in folk religion is attested by the modern Greek “Neráides,” the generic appellation for all female nature spirits, who take their name from them. This hymn continues the theme of water.

2–3: Bacchylides 17.100–108 paints a similar scene; see also OH 17.3n and cf. OH 75.1–2+1n.

3: The Tritons are a mythological race of mermen, the chief figure of whom is the eponymous Triton, mentioned in line 5.

9–11: “mother Kalliope” is probably meant to evoke the fiction of Orpheus dictating these hymns to Mousaios; see also OH 76.7n+i. Apollon’s presence might similarly be explained, since he is sometimes considered the father of Orpheus (Orphic fragment 895–898; with Kalliope as mother, 896). The connection of the Nereids with the rites of Dionysos is curious. The Nereid Thetis succors Dionysos when he is chased by Lykourgos (Iliad 6.130–137), but this probably says more about Thetis as a helpful goddess (she also rescues Hephaistos, as related at Iliad 18.394–405) than about any particular connection with Dionysian cult. Ino, who nursed her nephew Dionysos and later became the sea goddess Leukothea (see OH 74i), is said to dwell among the Nereids by Pindar (Olympian Odes 2.28–30 and Pythian Odes 11.2). The Nereids are very similar to the Okeanids, who are identified with the nymphs who nurse Dionysos in OH 51.1. Furthermore, the two groups, both of which are composed of a plurality of young female water divinities, are sometimes confused, despite the Nereids' connection with salty water and the Okeanids' with fresh. A further source of confusion is that the Nereids are cousins to the Okeanids, since their mother, Doris, is a daughter of Okeanos, and thus they are half-Okeanid themselves! Interestingly enough, the Hellenistic poet Simias makes the nymphs the daughters of Doris (fragment 13; he probably has the Nereids in mind). As in the case of Sun, Pan, and Apollon, our composer has partially blended three originally separate entities, for which some precedents were found in the earlier tradition. The Nereids' connection with Dionysian cult is explicitly made in line 3, where they are said to “revel in the waves.” This carries the connotations of maenadic frenzy (see OH 1.3+n and OH 52i), and note that the Okeanids are similarly portrayed at OH 51.15–16.

25. To Proteus

Like Nereus, Proteus is an “Old Man of the Sea” (see OH 23i) and in fact may very well just be another name for Nereus. In this hymn, however, he takes on a more cosmic significance. Our composer plays on the folk etymology of his name (“the first”) in lines 2 and 9; Proteus is raised to the level of a primeval being. The same “cosmic etymologizing” from a name also appears in the hymn to Pan (see OH 11i), and Proteus is described as having power over a similar range of realms as Pan (see note to line 9 below). Our hymn also connects the shape-shifting abilities of Proteus (see note to lines 4–8) with his new primeval origin. He is able to change his form because he contains all forms in himself (line 9), even as he himself is the one who has apparently created these forms out of undifferentiated matter (lines 2–3). Proteus is thus cast in the role of a demiurgic figure. This is not as strange as it might first appear, since water in both myth and philosophical speculation is often regarded as the origin of the universe, or at least a very early feature of it; see OH 83i. Water, being an element that is easily observed to possess no firm structure, is an obvious choice for those seeking a single origin for the concrete pluralities in the empirical world; its character is probably also a reason why mythological beings connected with water are often shape-shifters themselves (see note to lines 4–8). This hymn ends the series of ones addressed to water divinities.

1 key-holding master of the sea: For the symbolism of holding keys, see OH 18.4n.

2–3: The epithet “first-born” is quite similar to the name Protogonos, a very important deity in Orphism, who has a central role in the creation of the world (see OH 6i). Physis is also said to be “first-born” (OH 10.5). The word used here for “matter,” “hulē,” is a philosophical technical term. Quandt in his edition of the Orphic Hymns cites Stoic doctrine that called matter “mutable, changeable, and in flux” (SVF

2.305).

4–8: Both Proteus and Nereus are able to change their shape. They are also considered very wise and capable of prophecy, which for the Greeks comprised not just the ability to see the future but also to know of the past and to interpret the present, as lines 4–5 delineate. Shape-shifting and prophecy combine in the one important myth of Proteus (Odyssey 4.348–570). When Menelaos is returning from Troy, he becomes stuck on Pharos, an island off Egypt, due to an act of impiety. A daughter of Proteus, Eidothea, takes pity on the men and instructs Menelaos on how to get the information he needs from her father. He and three companions kill seals from Proteus’ herd, cover themselves with the skins, and wait for Proteus to take his noonday siesta. Then they jump on him and do not let go, even as he changes his shape into various creatures and elements, until he returns to his original form. After being released, Proteus truthfully explains to them what they must do to appease the gods. He also answers Menelaos’ questions about the whereabouts of Lokrian Aias, Agamemnon, and Odysseus. Finally, Proteus reveals to Menelaos that he will not go to the underworld when he dies but rather to the Elysian Fields. Vergil models his account of Aristaeus and his bees on this story. After his bees suddenly die, Aristaeus’ mother directs him to wrestle Proteus in order to find out why, and he learns that it is due to the anger of Orpheus at Aristaeus’ role in the death of Eurydike (Georgics 4.387–527). Nereus is also involved in wrestling and prophecy. During Herakles’ quest for the Apples of the Hesperides, he first needs to secure information from Nereus vital to his success; they wrestle and Herakles must keep hold of Nereus as he constantly alters his form until the old man yields and gives up the information (see Apollodoros 2.5.11). Of course, the ability to transform is not always connected with prophecy. Peleus must hold onto the Nereid Thetis, who keeps changing her shape, until she agrees to marry him (see Apollodoros 3.13.5), and Herakles again wrestles a shape-shifting god, this time the river Achelous, for the hand of Deianira (Ovid Metamorphoses 9.1–88).

9: For Physis, see OH 10i. She is said to preside over the heaven, earth, and sea in her hymn (see OH 10.14–16+n).

26. To Earth

Earth (Greek Gaia or Gē), is the quasi-personified figure of the productive powers of the land, the land itself, and often of procreation in general. She is, to an extent, a generic mother goddess, and thus shares many affinities with her more particular incarnations, such as Rhea (OH 14), Mother of the Gods (OH 27), and Eleusinian

Demeter (OH 40), as well as with certain closely related male fertility gods, such as the Kouretes (OH 31 and OH 38). For her identification with other fertility goddesses in Orphic mythology, see OH 14i. She plays a central role in Hesiod's cosmogony and theogony. Born after Khaos, she parthenogenetically gives birth to a number of similarly quasi-personifications of physical features: Sky, Pontos ("sea," but a different word than the one personified as the addressee of OH 22), and the mountains. She then mates with Sky in the usual way to produce the Kyklopes, the Hundred-Handers, and the Titans (Theogony 116–118; 126–153). In the succession myths that follow, she connives with her youngest son, Kronos, to put an end to the oppressive behavior of her son-husband (154–175) and, in turn, now with Sky, helps Rhea end Kronos' swallowing of their children (453–500). However, she helps her grandson Zeus avoid the danger of being overcome by his progeny with Metis; instead, Metis is swallowed by Zeus, and Athene is later born from his head (886–900; 924–926). See further the note to line 2 below. Earth herself received worship in Greek religious practice; for details, see Larson 2007, pp. 157–158. We also find her connected with the pre-Apollo Delphic oracle (see OH 79.3–6n).

This hymn is the first in the last group of a series (OH 19–27) arranged by physical element, here earth, which mirrors the same order in the hymns to Zeus, Hera, Poseidon, and Plouton-Hades (OH 15–18); see OH 15i.

1 mother of men and of the blessed gods: Compare Homeric Hymn to the Mother of the Gods 14.1 and Homeric Hymn to Earth, Mother of All 30.1, 17; see also OH 10.1+n, OH 14.8–9+n, and OH 27.7+n. Earth, like Physis, is portrayed more as a natural force than a personified entity, and there are close affinities between their hymns in the collection.

2 you bring all to fruition, you destroy all: Life and death, although opposites, were nevertheless conceived as intricately bound polarities, and, as usual in Greek mythic thought, having power over one often implies having power over its contrary. Persephone also holds the power of life and death in her hymn (OH 29.15–16+n; see also OH 30i). A similar sentiment is found in the Homeric Hymn to Earth, Mother of All: "... you are the source of fair children and goodly fruit,/and on you it depends to give life to, or take it away from,/mortal men" (30.5–7). Perhaps comparable is a certain ambiguity of Earth in myth, as, for example, found in Hesiod's Theogony. The blood that falls from the castrated Sky fecundates Earth, who produces the brutal Giants and the horrid Erinyes but also the lovely Ash Tree Nymphs (183–187). Also, after the defeat of the Titans, Earth mates with Tartaros to produce the scourge of the gods, the monstrous Typhon; yet it was Earth who suggested to the gods that Zeus be made ruler after the defeat of the Titans (820–838; 881–885).

4 seat of the immortal cosmos: Hesiod calls Earth “the firm seat of all/the immortals who hold the peaks of snowy Olympos” (Theogony 117–118); compare also OH 18.6–7. See further OH 27.9n.

6 deep-bosomed: Compare Hesiod Theogony 117, where Earth is called “broad-breasted.” This epithet is used twice of the sea in the collection: OH 17.3 and OH 74.3.

27. To the Mother of the Gods

The Mother of the Gods is the Phrygian goddess Kybele. She was also simply known as Meter (Mother). Her worship wound its way from the Greeks in Asia Minor to the mainland and appears to have gained traction in the sixth century ^{BC}. She is an earth fertility goddess, and so quickly became identified with other such figures in Greek mythology and religion: Rhea, Demeter, Earth, Hera—even Aphrodite and Hestia (see OH 14i and the note to line 9 below). Likewise, Hipta, a goddess of Asia Minor, might be a local version of Mother; see OH 49i. Wild music and dancing, ecstatic possession and ritual madness, and the close connection of her worship with mountains were all characteristic of the cult; see notes to lines 11 and 13. While her worship made some headway into official Greek cult, it was for the most part relegated to marginal members of society. Her wandering beggar-priests, called “mētragurtai” (“collectors for Mother”) and “kubēboi,” were held in low regard. In terms of myth, insofar as Kybele is identified with Demeter, she is the mother of Persephone and, just like Demeter in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter, she keeps away from the gods in anger over her daughter’s abduction; see Euripides Helen 1301–1368. The story may have been the subject of the Epidaurian hymn to Mother of the Gods (translation with brief discussion in Furley 1995, pp. 43–45). In later antiquity, Agdistis, a doublet for Mother, takes on a younger consort, Attis, whom in her jealousy she drives to such heights of madness that he castrates himself (Pausanias 7.17.10–12). There seems to be no reference to him in this hymn, although the name does appear in Orpheus’ address to Mousaios (OH O.39). Kybele is connected with the Korybantes, an ecstatic band of warriors who are associated with the Kouretes (see OH O.20, OH 31.5+n and OH 38.20), hence connecting Kybele with Rhea (see OH 14.3n) and also, in our collection, Athene (see OH 32i). The power of the goddess’ madness reaches its gory peak in the self-castration of particularly dedicated male worshippers, known as Galloi, for whom the myth of Attis serves as an etiology. Among the works attributed to Orpheus are Enthronements of the Mother (Orphic fragment 602–605; cf. line 5 and note to line 9) and Korybantic Rite (Orphic fragment 610–611), for which see West 1983, p. 27. For more on the cult of Kybele, see Burkert 1985, pp. 177–179, Larson 2007, pp. 170–171, and the detailed monographs of Vermaseren 1977 and Borgeaud 2004. This hymn should be compared to the hymn to Rhea in this collection (OH 14) and the Homeric Hymn to the Mother of the Gods. It naturally follows the previous one addressed to Earth, and it ends the second sequence of hymns arranged by their association with the four elements; see OH 15i.

2 swift chariot drawn by bull-slaying lions: A typical attribute of the goddess, mentioned at OH 14.2 as well. Bull-slaying lions also appear at Sophokles Philoktetes 400–401, where the goddess is called Earth. The Homeric Hymn to the Mother of the Gods 14.4 associates both wolves and lions with the goddess. See also OH 36i.

7 of you were born gods and men: See OH 26.1n.

8 you hold sway over the rivers and over all the sea: Kybele is also the “queen of the sky” (line 4) and the earth belongs to her as well (line 6), a natural association for a fertility goddess. For the motif of the geographical extent of a divinity’s power, see OH 14.9–10+n. In particular, she shares such broad authority with Pan (OH 11.2–3), a god connected to her through his ability to bestow madness (for this, see OH 11i). In the next line, Kybele is identified with Hestia, who is associated with fire (OH 84.4n); perhaps, then, the related theme of the four elements is also relevant here (see OH 10.14–16n).

9 Hestia ... giver of prosperity: Kybele’s throne is described as being located in the center of the cosmos (line 5), thus corresponding to the central position of the hearth in the home; see OH 84i+2n and cf. OH 40.15+n. Compare also the previous hymn where Earth is the “seat of the immortal cosmos” (OH 26.4) around which “the intricate realm of the stars/revolves in endless and awesome flow” (OH 26.8–9). This is reflecting a geocentric, not a heliocentric or pyrocentric, view of the cosmos; see OH 4.3n and Burkert 1972, p. 317. Euripides in a lost play equated the Earth with Hestia (fragment 944). As with Kybele in this hymn, so too is Hestia called on at the end of her hymn to grant prosperity.

11 whom the drum delights: Drums and other percussive instruments such as cymbals, clappers, and castanets are frequently found in the iconography of Kybele and Dionysos (see further OH 30.1n). Along with the aulos, they play an important role in the wild, frenzy-inducing music that constitutes their rites (see also note to line 13 below). These instruments are mentioned in the Homeric Hymn to the Mother of the Gods 14.3. See also OH 4.4+n. Music and madness is a recurring theme in our collection: see OH 11i, OH 14.3+n, and OH 31.3+n. It is particularly tied to maenadism; see further OH 52.7–8n. In a fragment from a dithyramb, Pindar imagines ecstatic worship of Dionysos celebrated by the gods: Kybele leads off with the beating of drums amid castanets, torches, and the wild shrieks of Naiads (water nymphs); Ares is present, and Athene, too, with the hissing of the countless serpents on her shield; finally Artemis arrives, having yoked lions, as a Bacchant (fragment 70b.6–21). This shows that already by the early fifth century, Dionysos and Kybele were closely related.

12 all-taming savior of Phrygia, consort of Kronos: In this line the identities of Kybele and Rhea are fused. For “savior,” see OH 14.8n.

13 frenzy-loving: The goddess raves and is able to send madness to those she chooses. The rituals of Kybele and the Korybantes (possibly separate from Kybele’s) were supposed to cure madness, and Dionysos himself had that power; see OH 71.11n. Hera, who is sometimes identified with Kybele, has the ability to send madness as well. She drives Herakles insane so that he kills his first wife, Megara, and even more pertinently she employs madness to disrupt the lives of those who help the infant Dionysos (e.g., Ino; see OH 74i) and, in some accounts, she drives Dionysos himself to madness (see OH 14.8n).

28. To Hermes

Hermes is a god with a wide range of functions, which nevertheless boil down to one essential idea: the ability to negotiate boundaries and bridge gaps. Many modes of travel are available to him, including the ability to fly through the air as well as to skim along the surface of the oceans (as beautifully portrayed at Odyssey 5.43–54). He can be a guide to men, directing their travels and even overcoming obstacles that block their path. Thus, for example he is able to bring Priam unharmed through the camp of the Greeks to meet with Akhilleus (Iliad 24.322–467). He is even able to traverse that most awesome divide between life and death; it is Hermes who leads the souls of the dead to the underworld. His ability to journey anywhere makes him an ideal messenger, a role he often undertakes in myth on the behalf of Zeus. Naturally, he is the god of heralds and diplomats. An important skill for these professions is that of speaking well, and thus he is also a god of language. Sometimes, though, a herald might find himself in circumstances where it is preferable to smooth over a difficult situation with words, even if the truth might have to suffer a bit. Hermes knows how to deceive with words. Indeed, Hermes knows how to deceive, period; he is a trickster figure of the first order, much like Prometheus and the Norse Loki. He is a god of thieves, but likewise he is the god of merchants who can protect against thieves. As so often, a god is responsible for the positive and the negative in a specific domain (see OH 30i). Like other trickster figures, Hermes is also a culture hero, inventing things that do much to further the civilized life. The longer Homeric Hymn to Hermes (no. 4) is full of the god’s innovations: the lyre, fire sticks, sacrifice, and wondrous shoes that hide his tracks. The introduction of fire and sacrifice is also attributed to Prometheus, who steals fire from the heavens and whose deception of Zeus at Mekone becomes the paradigm for future human sacrifice (Hesiod Theogony 535–570 and Works and Days 49–53; see also OH 40.8–9n). The Homeric hymn, marked by its cleverness and wit, is itself a piece worthy of Hermes himself. It seamlessly and playfully integrates in its narrative many of the gods’ prerogatives. His role as a god of minor divination is explained as one of Apollon’s gifts to him: Hermes does not receive a share of Delphic honors, but he is permitted to learn about prophecy from the strange bee women who live nearby and who taught Apollon as a child (4.533–566). He also is allowed to keep some of the cows he stole from Apollon, becoming a god of cowherds (4.567–568). This, too, is a mythological etiology that touches on a broader reality. Hermes is the god of all those who look after any herd of animals, such as sheep and goats. Fertility associations are not foreign to this god, who is able to increase the flocks of those he favors (see OH 1i). When the basis of wealth changed from agricultural to commercial, Hermes remained the god who brought profit. He is also the lucky god, and a piece of good luck was called a “hermaion,” literally “a thing of Hermes.” The god is often found in pastoral settings, frolicking with nymphs and other creatures of the wild. Yet he is also a god of physical exercise and athletics, particularly of the gymnasia and wrestling grounds, both very “urban” institutions.

Worship of Hermes tended to be domestic and personal; for details, see Burkert 1985, pp. 156–159, and Larson 2007, pp. 144–150. He seems to have had only a small role in Orphism, at least as far as can be deduced from the little said about him in our extant sources. His role as guide of the dead, which one would figure to be of particular interest in Orphic cults, is highlighted in our collection by a separate hymn to Chthonic Hermes, who seems to have become a separate entity (see OH 57i). Our hymn here, though, is quite traditional in the various attributes it lists, although it is not by any means comprehensive. There is a particular emphasis on Hermes as the god of language. This is understandable in a body of work whose main interest lies in convincing deities through the use of language to be favorable and propitious. It is notable that the rustic side of the god does not appear at all; this may be taken as circumstantial evidence that the cult for which the Orphic Hymns were composed was purely an urban one.

The placement of this hymn is curious at first blush. OH 15–27 are structured along the lines of the four elements, and the following hymn to Persephone would seem also to belong to this pattern, in as much as she is associated with earth (cf. OH 29.4, 6, 17). We might then expect this hymn to stress the chthonic side to Hermes, which it clearly does not do, despite his being called “lord of the deceased” in line 2; instead, the hymn to Chthonic Hermes has that function. However, as already mentioned, Hermes is a figure who negotiates transitions, and it seems this hymn performs the same duty. It serves as a dramatic pause, setting off the next two hymns to Persephone and Dionysos, who of course are divinities of the utmost importance for the initiates. Their hymns begin the central portion of the collection, focusing on the birth of Dionysos and Dionysian cult.

1 son of Maia: The traditional genealogy of Hermes makes him the son of Zeus and Maia, a daughter of Atlas; for details see both of the Homeric Hymns to Hermes (no. 4.1–19 and no. 18). Chthonic Hermes in our collection has a completely different parentage (see OH 57.3–5+n).

2 judge of contests: This epithet appears in Greek literature applied to Hermes, the earliest witnesses being a fragment of Simonides (PMG 555) and Pindar Pythian Odes 2.10. The original context of the Simonides fragment is unknown, but the Pindar citation comes from a victory ode celebrating the victor's winning of a chariot race. The "contests" in our hymn may only be limited to athletic contests, something that is within the domain of Hermes, or refer to any contest in general, given that Hermes is also a god of good fortune. If there were contests involved in the ritual during which our hymns were sung, then the epithet might have a more immediate significance, especially if these contests involved some kind of speech (see OH 7.12–13n; for athletic contests as a metaphor, see OH 87.12n).

3 Argeiphontes: This epithet of Hermes has been understood as "slayer of Argos" in antiquity and in modern times, referring to Hermes' exploit in freeing Io from this multi-eyed giant who guarded her. However, this interpretation has been questioned and "slayer of dogs" has been offered as another possibility. For a technical discussion, see West 1978, pp. 368–369. Both explanations portray Hermes in his guise as the god of thieves, who often need to dispatch guards, whether watchmen or watchdogs.

6 interpreter of all: The word "interpreter" in Greek is "hermēneus," and there is an intentional play on the name Hermes (also in Orphic fragment 413.1). The word and name do not appear to be etymologically related, however. See also Plato Cratylus 407e–408b (and note the pun on Hermogenes' name!).

8 lord of Korykos: Korykos is the southern promontory of the Erythraian peninsula in Kilikia. The mountain most frequently connected with Hermes is the one where he was born, Kyllene in Arkadia. That he is the "lord of Korykos" and not "lord of Kyllene" in this hymn may be due to the location of the cult in Asia Minor, where Korykos would have been more familiar than Kyllene (and thus possibly would have been a place of more emotional attachment for the initiates).

10: The ancient Greeks certainly realized that speech could be used for good or ill. The ambiguity can be seen in the portrayal of Odysseus, the skillful speaker par excellence. His gift with language saves him from the Kyklops Polyphemos. But there are also failures, such as his unsuccessful embassies to the Trojans and to Akhilleus, and the speech that wins him the arms of Akhilleus in turn leads to the death of the great warrior Aias. More to the point, it is Hermes who endows Pandora, that bane for mankind, with language, which allows her to wheedle and lie (Hesiod Works and Days 77–82).

29. Hymn to Persephone

Persephone was called Phersephone and P(h)ersephoneia by the poets, Pherrephatta by the Athenians, and Proserpina by the Romans. However, she is often merely known as Kore (“maid”). She is the daughter of Zeus and Demeter already in Hesiod (Theogony 912–914). Orphism adopts this genealogy but also at times equated Demeter with Rhea, the mother of Zeus (see OH 27i); she flees the advances of her son by turning herself into a snake, but he does so as well and eventually mates with her (see also OH 40i). The story repeats itself in the case of Persephone. She, too, is pursued by Zeus who again takes the form of a snake (Clement of Alexandria Protrepticus 2.16.1). Their offspring is Dionysos, and this might have produced Melinoe as well (see OH 71i). The most important myth involving Persephone is her abduction by Hades, the most famous version of which is found in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter; for a summary, see OH 41i. There was at least one Orphic version as well. She is usually closely associated with her mother in cult, in which fertility and other aspects of a woman’s life receive emphasis, particularly marriage. For an overview of important cults, see Larson 2007, pp. 69–85. Her connection with the underworld and Dionysos is particularly important to Orphism. She frequently appears on the Bacchic gold tablets. A few short ones merely convey greetings to her (nos. 15, 17, 31, 37). In others the initiate appeals to her for their reward in the afterlife for which their initiation into the cult had prepared them, and there is sometimes an allusion to the initiate’s guilt inherited from his Titan forbears who killed Dionysos, Persephone’s son (nos. 5–7, 9, 26a, b; cf. no. 8). In one tablet, the initiate is assured to reach the “holy meadows and groves of Persephone” (no. 3). For an analysis of these tablets, see Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 66–164; see also OH 18.2n and OH 87.12n. We also find the chthonic connection of Persephone stressed in the magical papyri through her thorough identification with other goddesses. There she is identified with Moon, Hekate, and Artemis (see further OH 1i and OH 59.3–4n). In our hymn both sides of Persephone are addressed. She is a fertility goddess, due to her connection both to Demeter and Hades, who, although the lord of the dead, nevertheless has a connection with life in that he can be seen as the one who sends up crops and other growing things from his realm under the earth (see OH 18i). His abduction of Persephone and her reunification with Demeter, and the consequent compromise between the two over her, was interpreted by the Greeks as symbolizing the cycle of growth: the seed is sown under the earth, where it lies dormant throughout the winter until its fruit miraculously reappears in the spring (but see Burkert 1985, p. 160, for another interpretation). Yet, through her marriage to Hades, Persephone is the queen of the dead. Their relationship had a rough beginning, and she can even have a sinister side. Odysseus fears that she might send up a ghost or monster to vex him during his visit to the land of the dead (Odyssey 11.633–635); see also OH 71.4–5+n. It is perhaps for this reason that the poet has omitted the more unsavory details of her birth and abduction (as in the case of her mother in OH 40). This hymn together with the following one to Dionysos forms a mother-son pair; for other similar collocations, see OH 14.8–9n.

1 sole offspring: As in Orphic fragment 294. Demeter also bears this epithet; see OH 40.16+n. It is used of Hekate in Hesiod Theogony 426, a goddess who sometimes is identified with Persephone. This might be one of the reasons why the source of Apollodoros made Styx, and not Demeter, the mother of Persephone (Apollodoros 1.3.1).

4 the gates of Hades: Compare OH 18.4, where Plouton is said to hold the keys to Hades.

5 Praxidike: The name means “exacter of justice.” Pausanias tells us that a group of goddesses called Praxidikai were worshipped at Haliartos (9.33.3). The Orphic Argnonautika mentions the “mysteries of Praxidike” (31) without further elaboration.

6 mother of the Erinyes: In Orphic myth, the Erinyes are the children of Persephone and Hades (sometimes Apollon); see OH 70.2–3n. Once in the magical papyri it seems that Persephone is the name of one of the Erinyes; see OH 69.1n. In our collection, she is also implied to be the mother of Adonis (see OH 56.8–9+n) and Melinoe, although the allusion to the story of the latter’s birth is obscure (see OH 71.4–5+n).

7–8: Eubouleus (“good counsel”) is a name applied to different divinities (see OH 41.8n), but here it refers to Dionysos. The epithet “loud roaring” is characteristic of the god. In the next hymn, he is also described as “loud roaring” (OH 30.1+n), and he was often called Bromios (Roarer), as in OH 40.10. Our composer here euphemistically summarizes the doublet of Persephone and Dionysos’ birth in Orphic myth, as he does in the following hymn. No mention is made of snakes or rape.

9–11 radiant and luminous... brilliant and horned: When Demeter gives birth to Persephone, the infant has an extra pair of eyes on her forehead and horns, and the mother flees in terror at the sight (see OH 14i). This line might be alluding to an identification with Moon, who is often portrayed as bright and horned (OH 9.1–2). As mentioned in the introduction to this hymn, Persephone was identified with the moon goddess, and in later antiquity the phases of the moon were associated with her split existence between the land of the living and the land of the dead (see Richardson 1974, p. 285).

9 playmate of the Seasons: In their hymn, the Seasons are described as playmates of Persephone (OH 43.7+i).

12–14: The poet subtly glides between Persephone as a person and Persephone as the fruits of the earth itself; the same effect is used with Dionysos and the grape (see OH 50.5+n). In the Orphic version of Persephone’s abduction, she is weaving a robe of flowers when Hades appears (Orphic fragment 288). The pointed contrast between spring and autumn is mirrored in the life-death imagery in lines 15–16.

15–16: As is often the case, a god has control over opposites. Many fertility goddesses double as death goddesses; see OH 26.2+n. The Greek in line 16 contains an etymologizing play on words: “Phersephonē pherbeis ... kai ... phoneueis” (“Persephone, you nourish ... and ... kill”). Hekate is called the “all-nourisher” in the magical papyri (PGM 4.2749) shortly after she is addressed as Persephone (4.2747). The Stoic philosopher Kleanthes is reported to have made a similar play on words: he equated Phersephonē with warm air (“pneuma”) that is carried (“pheromenon”) through crops and is killed (“phoneumenon”).

19 a splendid old age to him who is sailing: This refers to the crossing of a river on Charon’s ferry in the underworld in order to reach Hades proper. For interpretation of “old age,” see OH 87.12n.

30. To Dionysos

Dionysos is a very difficult divinity to define—and one suspects that this is exactly how he would want it to be. He is a god of vegetation, particularly of the creeping vine (see lines 4–5). He is a god of liquid fertility: the catalyst that initiates the process of growth, the vital force that sustains it, and the fluid nourishment that flows from it. Semen, blood, water, wine, honey, milk—Dionysos is all of this. His very essence is a fluidity that is at once defined and undefined. At his roots, he is a god of transitions, but in order for there to be a transition, there must be a point A and a point B between which a transition exists. Dionysos swings between these extremes. At any moment, the god can move from one to the next. He is a god of opposites: peaceful and warlike, human and animal, sober and drunk, alive and dead, sacred and profane. Dionysos blurs the lines. There are many Greek gods who oversee conflicting spheres, such as Apollon, the god of medicine and disease. Yet none are so thoroughly defined by the juxtaposition of opposites as Dionysos. The Hymns themselves teem with paradox and contradiction. Even more, they seem to embrace it, to actively present the conflict wherever possible. This frequently occurs at the verbal level and expands to include the addressed divinities themselves. Identities are spliced (e.g., the Erinyes and Eumenides); entities are merged (e.g., Okeanids and the Nymphs). The Dionysian spirit lurks behind this, too. A crucial element of his worship is the process which the Greeks called enthousiasmos, “the god inside” (whence English “enthusiasm”), the belief that the god enters into the worshippers and possesses them (see further OH 50i), which leads to a state of ekstasis, “a standing out (of oneself)” (whence English “ecstasy”). To a degree unmatched by other divinities, Dionysos is with his followers (cf. OH 32i). The effacing of the distinction between divine and human, the strange encounter where someone at the same time is somehow both himself and not himself, coheres perfectly with the transitional nature of the god himself. In the Hymns, religious experience becomes poetic strategy. The various hymns are not merely words to be mechanically recited. It is in their performance that they find their ultimate fulfillment. Through this (and the other ritual acts), the Dionysian spirit was evoked, made manifest, and entered into the very breath of the initiates—an enthousiasmos of language that transported the worshippers, however briefly, beyond their quotidian existence and allowed them to touch the divine. This is the key to understanding the whole collection (see also the introduction to the translation). In one respect, then, performing the Hymns enables one, in essence, to become the god (see also OH 33i and OH 52i). The initiation ritual mirrors Dionysos: as the god is ripped apart by the Titans and is born again, so, too, the initiates, blasted by the vagaries of life, are reborn through initiation into something pure and holy. And just as the pieces of the murdered divine child must be gathered and reconstituted anew, so the initiates, in performing the Hymns where the details of cultic myth and eschatology are scattered in obscure allusions but subtly linked through a complex web of shared and similar epithets and descriptions, reconstitute the esoteric knowledge that leads to a revelation of the secrets of life and death. The learned contests we find mentioned sporadically in the collection might be understood in this light; see OH 7.12–13n. Yet encounter with the divine is fraught with peril. The frenetic invocations of various deities to appear, coupled with the uncertainty as to how they will react to being so summoned, lead to anxieties. Thus the initiates repeatedly call on figures to come kindly disposed and a few times even explicitly request the more dangerous ones to dispel the madness they bring (see OH 71.11n).

This hymn is the first of many that address Dionysos. Coming as it does after the hymn to Persephone, who is (one of) his mother(s) (see note to line 2 below), it functions in a sense as the birth of Dionysos, and in many ways it culminates the series of divinities addressed in the previous hymns. His birth is the moment the entire universe has been anticipating. This initial hymn is followed by figures who play a role in the god's early years (see OH 32i). Starting with OH 40, the collection moves away from cosmology and mythology to a decided emphasis on cultic practice. This reaches its climax through a number of hymns dedicated to different cultic identities of Dionysos (OH 45–47 and OH 50–53), particularly as the divine child, and ends with a hymn dedicated to the traditional thiasos of the god (OH 54). Various Dionysian themes are interwoven in this grouping; imagery and concepts merge and blur the identities of the addressees. These hymns occupy the central portion of the collection and most likely the ritual itself.

For more on Dionysos' role in myth and religion, see Burkert 1985, pp. 161–167, and Larson 2007, pp. 126–143; for Dionysos and Orphism, see Graf/Johnston 2007, passim. There are three Homeric hymns dedicated to this god (nos. 1, 7, 26).

1 loud roaring, reveling: Dionysian worship, particularly the ecstatic elements, was marked by noise: voices raised in song, the clatter of percussive elements (see also OH 27.11n), the sounds of the victim. The epithet used here is closely related to Bromios (Roarer), another name for Dionysos; see OH 40.10+n. Compare “howling” in line 4, and see further OH 29.8, OH 45.4, OH 48.3, and OH 49.3. The “Bacchic cries” of the Erinyes are similarly described (OH 69.2) as well as the crashing of the rain clouds (OH 21.3). For a description of the (maenadic) revel, see OH 52i.

2 primeval, two-natured, thrice-born: A numerical sequence. The word translated here as “primeval” is “prōtogenos,” also used of Dionysos at OH 52.6. It is one of the names of the pivotal Orphic divinity responsible for the creation of the world. The two gods share many features and indeed can be considered the same being (or different manifestations thereof); see OH 6i and note to lines 3–4 below. “Two-natured” probably refers to Dionysos' androgyny, a characteristic shared with Protogenos and other divinities in the collection (see OH 6.1+n and OH 9.4n). It is interesting to note that Apollodoros says that Zeus instructed Ino to raise Dionysos as a girl (3.4.3), and that Mises seems to be interpreted as Dionysos in his feminine manifestation (see OH 42i). Another possibility is that “two-natured” reflects the andromorphic and teratomorphic side of the god, but this is probably what “two-shaped” in the following line is meant to indicate. See also OH 52.5+n, where the god is said to have a “three-fold” nature. The epithet “thrice-born” also contains some ambiguity. In traditional mythology, Dionysos was born from Semele and from

Zeus, insofar as Zeus saved the child after the death of Semele and kept him in his thigh until the child fully gestated (see OH 44i; cf. OH 45.1 and OH 50.3+n). Orphism presented an alternate birth, one where Zeus mated with Persephone in the form of a snake, as briefly mentioned below in lines 6–7 (see also OH 29i+7–8n). Also, in Orphic mythology Dionysos is eventually torn apart and killed by the Titans (see OH 37i); he is then either reconstituted (by Rhea, Demeter, Apollon, or Zeus; see Orphic fragment 59, 322, 325–326) or born again through Semele (see OH 44i). Some authors who refer to a “thrice-born” Dionysos count the birth from Semele, Zeus, and the reconstitution of Dionysos after being dismembered by the Titans (see Orphic fragment 59). It is difficult to securely affirm that interpretation here, as our poet explicitly considers Dionysos the son of Persephone (but see OH 46.6–7+n). The matter is further complicated by the fact that Dionysos is said to have two mothers at OH 50.1. This would indicate Persephone and Semele, but it is hard in that case to reconcile the third birth as either Dionysos being born from Zeus’ thigh (which would seem to contradict the idea of Persephone as mother) or as the reconstitution of the dismembered Dionysos (which would seem to be how some Orphics worked in Semele as the mother of Dionysos). In other words, the births to which “thrice-born” here refers are problematic, since there are four possible births found in our sources (Semele, Zeus, Persephone, reconstitution), all of which are alluded to at different points throughout the collection. The ambiguity, though, might be intentional (see the introduction to this hymn).

3 ineffable, secretive: Just like the god, so too the cult. It is a typical characteristic of mystery cults that certain aspects of their rites are known only to the privileged few who have undergone initiation; cf. “pure” in line 4. See also OH 42.3, OH 50.3 and OH 52.5.

3–4 two-horned ... / ... bull-faced: The bull is used as a sacrificial animal in Dionysian cult, and Dionysos, the suffering god, is sometimes identified with the victim. Plutarch reports that the women of Elis called on Dionysos to come with the following verses: “Come, o hero Dionysos/to the Eleans’ temple/with the Graces/to the pure temple/descend your oxen-foot/o worthy bull/o worthy bull” (Quaestiones graecae 299a–b = PMG 871). Likewise, Pentheus, under the spell of the god, experiences double vision and perceives him horned like a bull (Euripides Bacchae 918–924; cf. also 99–104 and 1017). Protogonos “bellows like a bull” in OH 6.3 (and see note to that line). Dionysos is bull-faced again at OH 45.1 and is described as horned at OH 52.2 and 10, and OH 53.8. See also OH 50.5+n.

4 warlike: Dionysos occasionally engages in combat. Most famous is his participation in the Gigantomachy (Apollodoros 1.6.2). In Euripides Bacchae, the maenads, roused to violence, attack a village and rout its defenders (751–764), and the god is explicitly linked to the panic of war (303–304; cf. OH 11i and OH 32.6n). Korybas, who seems to be an analogue for Dionysos, is also called “warlike” (OH 39.2+n). See further OH 45.5+n.

4 pure: Purity is essential in ritual, and, as in line 3, the god and his worshippers share the same quality; see introduction as well as OH 15.8+8–9n, OH 40.11+n, OH 53.4, and OH 84.4+n. The idea recurs in the Bacchic gold tablets; see the discussion in Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 121–131.

5 raw flesh in triennial feasts: An important part of maenadism is the notion of sparagmos, the ripping apart of wild animals by the frenzied women, and of ōmophagia, the eating of the raw flesh afterward (see OH 52i). It is not known whether this was actually practiced in cult or is merely a mythological embellishment. Dionysos is invoked as Omestes (Eater of Raw Flesh) by Alkaïos (fragment 129). See also OH 52.7, where Dionysos also is said to take raw flesh in the hymn dedicated to him as God of Triennial Feasts.

5 wrapped in foliage, decked with grape clusters: Dionysos appears to be imagined as the grape-vine itself at OH 50.5 (and see note to that line).

6 Eubouleus: Dionysos is also called this at OH 52.4. The name is also used of Zeus and Adonis in the collection and elsewhere of Protogonos; see OH 6i and OH 41.8n.

8 fair-girdled nurses: A number of female divinities are called the nurses of Dionysos in the collection: the Nymphs (OH 42.10, OH 46.3, OH 51.3, and OH 53.6; in this last they are also called “fair-girdled”), Aphrodite (OH 46.3), and Hipta (OH 49.1). See further OH 46.2–3n and OH 51.3n.

31. Hymn to the Kouretes

The Kouretes are a band of armed young men connected with Krete. In myth, they dance about the infant Zeus and clatter their arms in order to muffle the sound of his crying. Hesiod tells the story of how his mother, Rhea, was sent to Krete, but he does not mention the Kouretes (Theogony 453–500). The poet, however, is aware of them, for in one of the fragments from the Catalogue of Women he mentions them as “sportive, dancing gods” (fragment 123); they are either the siblings or cousins of the satyrs and the mountain nymphs. Already in Hesiod, then, there is some relationship with Dionysian figures. Kallimakhos narrates the story of their dancing around Zeus in his Hymn to Zeus 52–54. These various characteristics—percussive sounds, wild dancing, mountain dwelling, and the link with Rhea—facilitated an identification with the Korybantes of Kybele (see OH 14.3n and OH 27i), and the two names are often interchangeable (e.g., OH 38.20 and cf. Kallimakhos Hymn to Zeus 46). Our hymn blends Kretan and Phrygian imagery. The Kouretes, whose name translates as “youths,” played a role in Kretan cult. A hymn found inscribed at Palaikastro in Krete addresses Zeus as the “greatest kouros” and calls on him to usher in fertility for the new year. In particular he is asked to “leap into” the fields, animals, and homes of the town to spark fertility and bring wealth; see also OH 45.7n. A fragment from Euripides’ Kretans hints at an initiatory ritual that is possibly Orphic (fragment 472 = Orphic fragment 567). Pythagoras is supposed to have been initiated in their cult at Mount Ida, where he also allegedly saw the tomb of Zeus, who was considered to die and then be reborn each spring. The existence of a religious fraternity that bore the name Kouretes at Ephesos lends special significance to the whole collection (see Burkert 1985, p. 173). The Kouretes also gained prominence within Orphic circles. They guard the infant Dionysos on Krete, just as they guarded the infant Zeus (Orphic fragment 297), sometimes with Athene (see OH 32i). However, they do not seem to be hiding him but outright guarding him, and, unlike in the case of Zeus, they fail to protect him against the machinations of the Titans. On occasion we find the Kouretes surrounding Dionysos in the material record; for example, they appear on a relief from an altar at Kos, dated to the middle second century ^{BC} (see Burkert 1993, pp. 270–271). Some sources have them guarding the infant Persephone/Kore as well (Orphic fragment 279). Athene is sometimes imagined to be their leader (Orphic fragment 267–268), the overlap with dancing in armor a clear point of contact (see Plato Laws 796d, where he also mentions the Dioskouroi of Sparta). This helps explain why her hymn immediately follows; see OH 32i. The Kouretes are invoked by name in the fragmentary Gurôb Papyrus, shortly after Demeter and Rhea, with whom they might have been explicitly connected as they are in the Orphic fragments. For more information, see West 1983, pp. 166–168, Larson 2007, pp. 24–25, and Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 82–83. This hymn should be compared to OH 38 and OH 39.

1–4: In Greek cult, young men sometimes danced in armor, the most famous of which was the pyrrhikhē, although this is sometimes used as a quasi-technical term to describe all such dances. A number of origins for the pyrrhikhē were proposed by ancient scholars, and the Kouretes are sometimes thought to be its inventors. Interestingly enough, Attic vase paintings sometimes have the very unwarlike satyrs dancing in armor, a curious inversion of roles that may be parody or may hint at a Dionysian connection with the dance (see Ceccarelli 2004, pp. 108–111). Other armed dances were known, too, and they did not always take place in cultic settings. For an example of such entertainment at a symposium performed by a woman, see Xenophon Symposium 2.11. Armed young men dancing and singing in cult are also found in Rome, where a group known as the Salii would dance and sing at certain festivals; we find mention of a particular song, the carmen saliare, in ancient sources, but what little text has come down to us is very corrupt.

3 discordant is the lyre you strike: Harmony, both in music and in its more general application to anything exhibiting a balanced structure, was an important component of Greek morality, and we find writers, notably Plato, using the idea of harmonious music as a symbol of order, civilization, and rationality. Conversely, the lack of harmony often carries the opposite connotations. Thus, the cacophony implied by this line goes hand-in-hand with the wild, “out of control” ecstatic dance movements of the Kouretes and thus prepares for the mention of “mountain frenzy” in line 5 (compare also the “howling” in line 2). See also OH 27.11n.

5 priests in the train of a mother: Compare OH 38.6, where the Kouretes are mentioned as the “first to set up sacred rites for mortals.” In both passages, the Kouretes gain significance as the mythical paradigm for the practitioners of the actual ritual for which our collection was composed.

32. To Athene

Athene is one of the chief divinities of the Greek pantheon. Her life begins in impressive fashion. Zeus takes as his first wife Metis (Counsel, Resourcefulness, Wisdom) but finds out later that she is destined to give birth to a mighty daughter and a son who will overthrow his father. Zeus’ grandfather, Sky, had tried to forestall a similar fate by pushing his children back into Earth’s womb at birth, which did not work. His son, Kronos, took the next step of swallowing his children at birth to avoid a similar fate, but this, too, failed to prevent his demise. Zeus goes even further—he swallows the mother before she is even able to give birth! Eventually, though, he gets a headache. Hephaistos performs exploratory surgery and splits his head open with an axe—then suddenly out pops a goddess, fully armed, shouting a lusty battle cry, and scaring the assembled gods. Thus Athene makes her debut on the cosmic stage; see Hesiod Theogony 886–900 and 924–926, Homeric Hymn to Athene (no. 28), Pindar Olympian Odes 7.35–44, and Apollodoros 1.3.6. The motif was popular in Attic vase painting.

From the very beginning, then, Athene is associated with war. However, she is unlike Ares, the other war god, in that he revels in the blood and gore of fighting, while she, taking after her mother, is more interested in the intellectual aspects of strategy and tactics (see OH 65i). The battle of Herakles and Kyknos, a son of Ares, in Hesiod’s Shield is, in some ways, a battle by proxy between these two divinities. War is not the only pursuit to which she applies her wisdom. Athene is the goddess of all sorts of handiwork, both in the female domain, such as weaving, and in the male domain, such as carpentry (see note to line 8). She is very much a figure invested in human civilization. Her closeness to the mortal sphere is reflected in her intimate relationship with heroes, as for example when she appears to her favorite Odysseus, a hero after her own mind, on Ithaka (Odyssey 13.221–440). She is also particularly connected with Herakles. An instructive contrast to her relation with human beings would be the aloofness of Apollon (see OH 34i), although she falls short of Dionysos’ “possessive” nearness (see OH 30i).

It is perhaps not surprising, then, that she was a very popular figure in cult, especially at Athens, the city after which she seems to have been named. Her claim to this polis is told in the story of her competition with Poseidon. They vied for the title of its chief divinity and held a sort of contest. Poseidon caused a salt spring to gush forth on the acropolis, while Athene planted an olive tree. She was chosen because of the utility of her gift (see Herodotos 8.55 and Apollodoros 3.14.1–2). The most important festival in Athens, the Panathenaia, was held every year in her honor, on the occasion of her victory against the giants in the Gigantomachy. Every fourth year the Panathenaia was more elaborately celebrated and included athletic and poetic contests. The cultural hegemony of Athens throughout the centuries ought not to blind us, however, to her extensive worship throughout all of Greece. For example, Kallimakhos’ fifth hymn, known as the Bath of Pallas, alludes to a rite at Argos during which her cult image, the Palladion, was washed in the river Inakhos and carried with the shield of Diomedes in a procession (1–56). For more information on her role in myth and cult, see Burkert 1985, pp. 139–143, and Larson 2007, pp. 41–57.

Orphism seems to have accepted her traditional birth (see Orphic fragment 263–266 and cf. also Mousaios fragment 75), but she is given a special role in accounts of the infant Dionysos’ death at the hands of the Titans. She saves the still beating heart of the dismembered child and returns it to Zeus, who later brings about the rebirth of Dionysos (see OH 44i). Such a connection between these divinities may seem odd at first glance, but there are a number of points of contact. Both were prominent at Athens, both were born from the body of Zeus (head, thigh), both are famous for their role in the Gigantomachy (see note to line 12), and both have a connection with vegetation (olive, ivy). Athene, like Dionysos, is sometimes associated with mountains (see note to lines 4–5) and madness (see note to line 6), while both have a touch of the androgynous about them (see note to line 10). Her role in saving his heart might have been influenced by the story of the Athenian king Erikhthonios. He was born when Hephaistos, enamored of Athene, wanted to make love to her. She refuses his advances (cf. line 8), but some of his semen falls on her thigh. Disgusted, she wipes it off with wool, and throws it down upon the earth, which, thus fecundated, becomes pregnant and gives birth to a child. This child Athene hides in a box with a serpent (in some versions the child himself is serpentine) and entrusts the box to the daughters of the Athenian king Kekrops with orders not to open it. Of course they disobey the order, and eventually they are either killed by the snake or, driven mad by Athene, leap from the acropolis to their death (see Euripides Ion 20–26 and 267–274, Pausanias 1.18.2, and Apollodoros 3.14.6). Athene’s protection of a child, the chthonic character of this child, and the element of madness could easily have suggested to the person who originated the Orphic tale a way to work in Athene. Furthermore, the infant Dionysos is guarded by the Kouretes, whose leader is sometimes said to be Athene (see OH 31i). In one sense, then, this virgin goddess has a somewhat analogous relationship to her younger half-brother Dionysos as Artemis does to Apollon, whose birth she assists shortly after her own in some versions of the story (see OH 36i). Both goddesses are also virgin goddesses who can offer protection (to young people and warriors), and in our collection both are associated with mountains, are described as masculine, and are said to be fond of madness (see note to lines 4–5 and 10 below). The connection with the Kouretes, mountains, and madness also brings Athene into connection with Kybele, the Phrygian mother goddess (see OH 27i) as well as Rhea (see OH 14i). Athene, then, is intricately bound up in a web of associations centered around chthonic divinities.

This role of the Kouretes and Athene in the (re)birth of Dionysos in the tradition probably explains why their hymns follow the first one in the collection addressed to him. Apollon also has a part to play in the Titans’ attack on Dionysos, and this might well be the reason why the hymns to Apollon and the Titans (OH 34 and OH 37) occur in this sequence, too. The first hymn to Dionysos functions symbolically as his “birth,” and it is not surprising that we find in quick succession a number of divinities (along with related ones subordinated to them) at this point in the collection. The second hymn to the Kouretes and the one to Korybas form a bridge to the one to Eleusinian Demeter (OH 38–40; see OH 39i), which is the first hymn of the central group that focuses on Dionysos in his cultic aspects (see OH 40i).

This hymn to Athene should be compared to the two Homeric hymns in her honor (nos. 11 and 28) and Proclus’ Hymn to Athene Polymetis (no. 7). The fact that the name Athene never appears in the collection as well as this hymn’s lack of attention to Athenian myth suggests that the composer is consciously presenting the goddess as a Panhellenic (or even Panmediterranean) divinity.

1 Pallas: A common alternate name of Athene, who is often invoked with both. The ancients interpreted the name to mean “brandisher, shaker (of arms)” or “virgin.” Another attempt at etymology was offered in Orphism, where the name was thought to refer to the fact that Athene saved Dionysos’ heart while it was still “shaking,” i.e., beating (see Clement of Alexandria Protrepticus 2.18.1 and West 1983, p. 162). In some accounts, Pallas is the name of a giant that Athene killed in the Gigantomachy and from whom she took the name (see note to line 12 and Burkert 1985, p. 140). This giant is said to be her father in some versions of this story, thus offering a faint reflection of the implicit threat to Zeus that Athene and her unborn brother once posed (compare also her role with Poseidon and Hera in a failed coup against Zeus at Iliad 1.396–406). The name Pallas appears in the Gurôb Papyrus; see Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 188–189.

6 frenzy: The madness here is associated with that of battle (see, e.g., Odyssey 22.297–309). In some versions of Athene’s birth, the gods standing about Zeus recoil in terror as she leaps out in full panoply, roaring. Ares is connected with battle rage (see OH 65.6+7n), and Pan, too, is a source of panic on the battlefield and elsewhere (see OH 11i). But madness, as well as loud noise, are also typical characteristics of Dionysos (for noise, see OH 30.1n; cf. OH 30.4n). Athene is also said to cause madness in the wicked (line 9) and to be “frenzy-loving” (line 11), the latter epithet also being used of Pan (see OH 11.5, 21). Similar descriptions are used of other divinities, particularly Kybele, with whom the Korybantes/Kouretes are associated (see OH 27.13+n).

8 slayer of Gorgo: The epithet is also applied to Athene at Euripides Ion 1478; earlier in the play, the story of Athene’s triumph over the giant Gorgo in the Gigantomachy is briefly mentioned (987–997); see also note to line 12. After slaying this monster, Athene strips him of his breastplate, which was adorned with snakes. This is the aegis, a common prop for Athene in both literature and iconography. It is sometimes related to Medousa, whom Perseus slew with the help of Hermes and Athene (Apollodoros 2.4.2). In Pindar fragment 70b.17–18, the hissing snakes of Athene’s aegis contribute to the gods’ celebration of Dionysian rites (see also OH 36.2n).

8 blessed mother of the arts: The intelligence of Athene finds outlet not only in war but in skilled labor: for a list, see Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.8–15. Hesiod calls a carpenter the “servant of Athene” (Works and Days 430). She is credited with assisting in the building of the Trojan Horse (Odyssey 8.492–495) and Jason’s ship, the Argo (Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 1.18–20, 526–527, etc.). This goddess is sometimes worshipped under the title of Ergane (Worker), e.g., at Athens (Pausanias 1.24.3). The school of Anaxagoras rationalized Athene as skill (tekhnē)

9 you bring prudence to the virtuous: Athene was identified with prudence by the Stoics; see West 1983, pp. 242–243.

10 male and female: Similarly in Proclus' Hymn to Athene Polymetis 7.3. Athene's close association with heroes, her virginity, and her many pursuits that were typically reserved for men all combined to give the goddess a particularly masculine bent (as she declares herself at Aeschylus Eumenides 736–738). Likewise, she can be portrayed as rejecting what was considered to be typically feminine behaviors; see Telestes PMG 805 (preserved in Athenaios 14.616f–617a), where it is denied that Athene had rejected playing the pipes because they disfigured her face (and where it is asserted that she gave them to Dionysos as a gift), and also Kallimakhos Bath of Pallas 13–32. In this collection, though, she is one among a number of divinities that are addressed as androgynous, including Artemis and Dionysos; see OH 9.4n.

10 shrewd: The Greek word for “shrewd” is “mētis,” a play on the name of Athene’s mother; see introduction to this hymn. Note that in Orphism Metis is one of the names applied to Protogonos (see OH 6i).

11 many shapes: Athene often takes disguises when dealing with mortals, particularly in the Odyssey; note especially Odysseus’ acknowledgment at 13.313. However, this, too, is a characteristic shared by many of the divinities in the collection.

12 Phlegraian Giants: For the battle of the Gigantomachy, see Apollodoros 1.6.1–2 and Proclus Hymn to Athene Polymetis 7.4. In addition to Pallas (see note to line 1) and Gorgo (see note to line 8), Athene also kills the giant Enkelados by tossing the island Sicily on him, perhaps reminiscent of how her father defeats Typhon (see OH 23.5–7n).

12 driver of horses: According to Pindar (Olympian Odes 13.63–82), Athene invented the bridle and gave it to Bellerophon so he could tame Pegasos, and in gratitude he established an altar to Athene Hippias (Athene the “horse-rider” or “knight”). There was also an altar to Athene Hippias at Olympia (Pausanias 5.15.6). Appropriately enough, she is Diomedes’ charioteer during his battle against Ares (Iliad 5.793–863).

13 victorious Tritogeneia: The Greek word “nikēphore,” “victory-bringing,” anticipates the following hymn to Nike (Victory); it was also a cult title of Athene at Pergamon. The name Tritogeneia is obscure. It appears already in Homer as an epithet of the goddess (Iliad 4.515). Hesiod (Theogony 894–898) seems to interpret it as Athene being “born for three” (for herself, her mother, and her unborn brother). The name was also connected in antiquity with Lake Triton, said to be the location of her birth or where she was raised; both the one in Boiotia and the one in Libya were given this honor (see Aeschylus Eumenides 292–294, Pausanias 1.14.6 and 9.33.7).

16 health: This is also one of the items Proclus requests of Athene at the close of his Hymn to Athene Polymetis 7.43–44. Athene was also worshipped as Health in Athens (see Plutarch Pericles 13.8 and OH 68i).

33. To Nike

Nike (Victory) is first attested at Hesiod Theogony 383–385, where she is said to be the daughter of Styx and Pallas and the sister of Zelos (Rivalry), Kratos (Power), and Bia (Force). She never really evolves beyond her origin as a personified abstraction and consequently plays no role in mythology or Orphic literature. At Athens, a temple to Athene Nike was dedicated near the south entrance of the acropolis. The great statue of Athene by Pheidias in the Parthenon portrayed Athene holding a winged Nike in her right hand (Pausanias 1.24.7). We find a similar motif in another statue by Pheidias, this one of Olympic Zeus at Olympia (Pausanias 5.11.1–10). Nike also had her own altar at Olympia (Pausanias 5.14.8). She was a popular cult figure and frequently represented in art; one of the most famous extant sculptures from the ancient world is the Nike of Samothrace (see further OH 38i). The position of the hymn in our collection, following the one to Athene, fits the pattern of inserting subordinate divinities immediately after the governing one. Much of the hymn seems to focus on Nike’s role in warfare (lines 3–7), which is certainly consistent with the martial motif found in the preceding hymn to Athene. Yet Nike could also be invoked in other agonistic contexts as well, and note that Nike is asked to appear for “works of renown,” just as the Stars are asked to visit in the context of a “race for works of renown” (see OH 7.13+12–13n and cf. OH 76.12+n). Thus the ritual act the initiates are performing appears to merge with the Homeric idea of winning glory in battle. This notion might have further significance beyond endowing the initiation with a certain prestige. Some of the Bacchic gold tablets suggest that the initiates felt that they would join the heroes of old in a pleasant afterlife or even become a hero themselves (see OH 87.12n and Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 115–116); “works of renown” might be referring to a similar idea here.

34. To Apollon

Apollon is one of the chief divinities of the Greek pantheon. Leto, a daughter of the Titans Phoibe and Koios, is his mother and Zeus his father (Hesiod Theogony 404–408, 918–920). Artemis is his sister, sometimes born with him, sometimes born shortly before and assisting Leto in his birth on the island Delos (see OH 35.5n). Apollon is a god who presides over many spheres; listings of such are common in literature (e.g., Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.131–132, Plato Cratylus 405a, and Kallimakhos Hymn to Apollon 42–46). He is perhaps most famous for his role in divination, with Delphi being the most renowned of a plethora of oracles in his name. Both sickness and the healing of sickness fall under his jurisdiction, and Asklepios is often said to be his son (see OH 67i). Apollon is also the god of archery. This is sometimes joined with his ability to bring disease, as those whom he hits with his arrows suffer sickness and death (e.g., Iliad 1.43–52). Music, dance, and festivities are dear to him. He is the god of the lyre, and the one who protects poets (Hesiod Theogony 94–95; Homeric Hymn to the Muses and Apollon). It is very possible that his connection with the bow facilitated one with this instrument (or vice versa); compare the vivid simile at Odyssey 21.404–411 and see also OH 67.2n. Orpheus himself is sometimes said to have been one of his sons (Apollodoros 1.3.2). In myth, he almost always appears as a young man, not quite an adult, who can be somewhat dour and aloof, especially in his relation to human beings (e.g., Iliad 21.461–467). Nevertheless, the god does have a sense of humor (as at Odyssey 8.333–343), and his worship often involves joyous and extravagant displays of music and pomp. Along with Hermes, he is idealized as a paragon of male beauty (see Kallimakhos Hymn to Apollon 36–38). Gold and light are often used to describe him and his implements (cf. the tongue-in-cheek treatment at Kallimakhos Hymn to Apollon 32–35). His identification with Sun perhaps begins in the late Archaic or early Classical period and is quite common in Hellenistic times and afterward, as well as in Orphic circles (see OH 8i). They were originally distinct entities, though, as can be seen in their different genealogies in Hesiod Theogony (371–374 vs. 918–920). Apollon was as popular in cult as he was in myth, and he was worshipped widely throughout the Greek-speaking world. Delphi and Delos were his two main cult centers, but he was also particularly important at Sparta and other Dorian cities. For more information, see Burkert 1985, pp. 143–149, and Larson 2007, pp. 86–100; relevant details are noted passim in the notes below. In Orphism, he sometimes brings to Delphi the remains of his half-brother Dionysos, torn apart by the Titans, and there revives him (see OH 46i for this story and Dionysian worship at Delphi). His role in Dionysos’ death and rebirth is probably the reason for the position of his hymn in the collection; see OH 32i. For his possible parentage of the Eumenides in Orphic mythology, see OH 70.2–3n.

The structure of this hymn falls into two main divisions. The first part mentions the various traditional associations of the god in terms of cult centers, attributes, and epithets; it comes to an end in line 10, marked by a direct appeal to the god, an element that usually closes a hymn. The second part picks up on the solar aspects mentioned in the first and gives them a cosmic dimension, culminating in the expanded discourse of universal harmony (lines 16–25). This hymn particularly recalls the earlier ones to Sun (OH 8) and Pan (OH 11) and to a lesser extent Protogonos (OH 6). In some ways it functions in a similar manner to OH 15–18 in that it fully anthropomorphizes the fundamental abstract powers that constitute the universe (see OH 15i). The palpable two-fold division is curiously reminiscent of that in the longer Homeric Hymn to Apollon, which easily falls into a Delian (3.1–178) and a Delphic (3.179–546) section (and many scholars suppose that two originally separate hymns have been imperfectly merged into one). It just may be that our composer took a cue from the Homeric hymn, insofar as he understood it. There is a shorter Homeric Hymn to Apollon (no. 21) and another one dedicated to both him and the Muses (no. 25). The reader will find it fruitful to consult Kallimakhos’ Hymn to Apollon (no. 2), as well as Mesomedes’ and Proclus’ hymns to Sun. Apollon is also invoked with hymnic language in the magical papyri, sometimes with Daphne, one of his mythological lovers (found in the following spells: PGM 1.262–347; 2.1–64 and 64–184; 3.187–262; 6.1–47); compare also the invocations of Sun therein (for further references, see OH 8i).

1 Paian: Paian seems originally to have been a completely separate divinity from Apollon, but he eventually becomes subsumed under this god. Nevertheless, Paian occasionally remains clearly distinguished, such as in the magical papyri (PGM 1.296–297). He gives his name to the “paian,” a particular type of song that has strong associations with healing (Iliad 1.472–474; and cf. Iliad 5.899–904, where the god Paieon heals Ares) and victory (Iliad 22.391–394). For an exhaustive overview of both god and song, see Rutherford 2001. The cry “Iē” often accompanies an invocation of Paian (see line 2); for a fanciful etymology, see Kallimakhos Hymn to Apollon 97–104. In our collection, the name Paian is also used of Sun (OH 8.12), Pan (OH 11.11), Dionysos (OH 52.11), and Apollon’s son Asklepios (OH 67.1); the alternate spelling Paion is used of Herakles (OH 12.10).

1 slayer of Tityos: This was a giant who tried to rape Leto during her wanderings after she had given birth to Apollon and Artemis. He was shot dead by the baby Apollon (and sometimes by his twin sister Artemis as well) from the arms of his mother. For such a monstrous act, he was punished in a way similar to Prometheus, by having his ever-regenerating liver continually eaten by vultures in the underworld. For the story, see Odyssey 11.576–581 and Apollodoros 1.4.1–2. Artemis is also called “slayer of Tityos” in Kallimakhos Hymn to Artemis 110.

1 Phoibos ... Lykoreus: Phoibos (Bright One) is a common epithet of Apollon, found throughout the collection (OH 0.7, OH 35.4, OH 67.6, OH 79.6). Lykoreus means “the one of Lykoreia,” which is the name of the summit of Mount Parnassos at Delphi or a village thereupon; see Strabo 9.3.3 and Pausanias 10.6.2–3. The collocation of Phoibos and Lykoreus is also found at Kallimakhos Hymn to Apollon 19 and Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 4.1490.

2 dweller of Memphis: Apollon is routinely identified with the Egyptian Horus (Herodotos 2.156.5; Plutarch De Iside et Osiride 356a and 375f; PGM 4.455, 988–989, and 1985). Apollon/Horus does not seem to be particularly connected with Memphis, but perhaps our composer is positing a connection (or confusing him) with Hephaistos/Sun, who was (Herodotos 2.153.1, and see Vanderlip 1972, p. 29 n. 8).

3 Titan: Technically speaking, Apollon is the grandson of a Titan, not a Titan himself; cf. OH 36.2. However, Sun is also invoked as Titan in OH 8.2, and most likely Apollon is being addressed here in his role as sun god. He is also called Titan at PGM 2.86.

3 Pythian god: Pytho was another name used for Delphi or its environs. It is here that Apollon slew a dragon that resided there and that was, in some versions, guarding the oracle held by Earth (for this oracle, see OH 79.3–6n and 5n). This story is one of the many variations of a hero slaying a dragon (see Fontenrose 1959 and Watkins 1995). After the monster was killed, Apollon crowed over the corpse that it rot on the spot, and Sun obliged (note the close connection—and distinction—here of Apollon and Sun, perhaps significant in light of their later identification). This was said to be the origin of the name Python, coming from the Greek verb “puthō” (“I rot”); hence the appellation “slayer of Python” in line 4. See Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.300–374 for the canonical account. The story also served as the foundational myth for the Pythian Games, one of the great Panhellenic events of ancient times, second in prestige only to the Olympic Games. There were musical contests as well as athletic ones, and Sakadas, a three-time champion in the competition for instrumental music on the auloi, is credited with the creation of the Pythian nome, a piece that used music to symbolically describe Apollon’s victory over the serpent and that quickly became a standard piece in the aulete’s repertoire; for more details, see West 1992, pp. 212–214.

4 Grynean, Sminthian: Gryneion was an Aeolic city near Kyme where a temple and an oracle to Apollon existed. “Sminthian” is a cult epithet, already found in Homer (Iliad 1.39). It is usually connected with a Greek word for mouse, and hence could also be translated as “Mouser.” This connects Apollon with agriculture, as mice are often a pestilence in the fields as well as the granary.

6 you lead the Muses into dance: Apollon is traditionally the leader of the Muses, and together they entertain the gods (e.g., Iliad 1.601–604 and Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.186–206), providing a divine paradigm to be emulated in the human realm. See also OH 43i. The Homeric Hymn to the Muses and Apollon (no. 25) is probably a hymnic variation on Hesiod Theogony 94–97 and 104.

7 Bacchos, Didymeus, Loxias: If “Bacchos” is the correct reading of “Bakkhie,” Apollon is being identified with his half-brother. Note that Dionysos is called Paian (OH 52.11) and that both gods are “wild” or “savage” (Apollon at line 5 and Dionysos at OH 30.3). For the Delphic connection between the two, see OH 46i. Apollon is called “ivy-tressed” in the magical papyri (PGM 2.99). In Neoplatonic theology, both gods together with Sun form a triad (Orphic fragment 305(ii), 311(x), and 322(v); van der Berg 2001, pp. 63 and 170), and in Proclus’ hymn to Sun, both Paian/Apollon and Dionysos are his children (1.21–24). One could, however, read “Bakkhie” as “Bacchic” instead, and the evidence cited above could certainly also be used to support this interpretation. Perhaps also relevant is that the Egyptian god Osiris, who was identified with Dionysos, had a brother and a son named Horus, both of whom were identified with Apollon (Herodotos 2.156.5; Plutarch De Iside et Osiride 355e–356a). A couple of the manuscripts of the Orphic Hymns, though, have “Brankhie.” This would refer to Brankhos, who was a lover of Apollon, and became a seer at Didyma (Kallimakhos fragment 229, in Nisetich 2001, pp. 127–129), a town near Miletos that in historic times was famous for its temple to Apollon and oracle (Herodotos 1.42). Brankhos is also credited with delivering Miletos from a plague (Kallimakhos fragment 194.28–31, in Nisetich 2001, p. 105). The juxtaposition with “Didymeus” in our hymn perhaps speaks for reading “Brankhie.” Loxias is a common epithet of Apollon. It means “the oblique one,” referring to the riddling and enigmatic character for which Apollon’s oracles are (in)famous (cf. Herakleitos in Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 244; for a concrete example, see the famous misinterpretation by Kroisos at Herodotos 1.53 and 1.90–91).

8 the eye that sees all: Here Apollon is clearly identified with Sun; see OH 8.1+n. The eye in this line is a terrestrial one, looking down on human activity. Compare with the “gaze” in line 11, which begins the second section, where Apollon’s eye encompasses the entire cosmos. When Orpheus invokes Apollon at the beginning of the Rhapsodies, he addresses him as the “eye that sees all” (Orphic fragment 102; see also West 1983, p. 6).

11–15: The classic tri-partite view of the world, already in Hesiod, is present here: sky-earth-underworld. The expanse of Apollon’s gaze is comparable to the power of other divinities described elsewhere in the collection; see OH 10.14–16n. There may also be an implied transition day-twilight-night, with the “day” component being understood from the identification Apollon/Sun and his position in the ether.

16–23: The theme of cosmic harmony has already appeared at OH 8.9, 11, and OH 11.6, but here gets its most detailed treatment, being explicitly connected to the seasons (already anticipated at OH 8.9 and perhaps OH 11.4). See OH 8.9n and 11n, as well as OH 11i. The musical ideas expressed in this hymn seem to have been drawn from Claudius Ptolemaeus (called Ptolemy in modern times), the famous astronomer who was active at Alexandria in the second century AD. At Harmonics 3.12 he writes: “In connection with these movements, the Dorian tonos, being the most central of the tonoi, we must compare to the middle crossings in latitude, those positioned towards the equinox, as it were, in each sphere.... Those tonoi which on account of their higher melody are higher than the Dorian are arranged as if in summer, with the crossings at the raised pole, that is, where the North Pole rises, and with those at the arctic, where the south [sic] is at the opposite. Those which on account of their lower melody are lower than the Dorian are arranged as if in winter, with the crossings at the invisible pole, that is, where the South Pole rises towards those at the arctic, where the North is at opposite” (translation by Solomon 1999, pp. 160–161; see also Barker 1989, pp. 386–387). The geocentric view we find elsewhere in the collection (see OH 4.3+n) might also have been influenced by Ptolemy. If there is a connection between him and the Hymns, this would provide a fairly secure terminus post quem of around 200 AD for their composition (see further the introduction to the translation). A mode in ancient times represented a collection of notes of certain pitches at fixed intervals out of which a melody might be composed, a kind of tonal palette. Aristides Quintilianus preserves six that he terms ancient ones, among them the Dorian (18.5–19.10; see Barker 1989, pp. 419–420, for translation and notes; see also the discussion in Barker 1984, pp. 165–166). The term Ptolemy employs, “tonos,” can also be used to mean “mode,” or it can signify what we would call a key (see Barker 1989, pp. 17–27, and West 1992, pp. 184–189). Traditionally, the Dorian mode had the characteristics of being steady, calm, and restrained (it was also considered to be the most manly and dignified; see West 1992, pp. 179–180). Ptolemy, as seen in the quote above, gives a similar valuation to the Dorian tonos as the means between extremes (see also Harmonics 3.7). The emphasis on the Dorian in our hymn might also have been facilitated by Apollon’s prominence among Dorian areas such as Sparta and Krete (see introduction). One of the most famous dictums of the ancient world, “mēden agan” (“nothing in excess”), was inscribed on the temple of Apollon at Delphi. Sun in Proclus’ first hymn is said to fill the cosmos with harmony (1.23; see further van den Berg 2001, pp. 169–170 and line 4 of that hymn), while his son Phoibos calms the strife of elements as he sings to the kithara (1.13–14 and 19–20; see van den Berg 2001, pp. 168–169).

24–25: For Pan and his “whistling winds” see OH 11.10–12+n. Sun is also associated with string and wind instruments (OH 8.11). All three divinities are called Paian in their hymns (see note to line 1). An identification of Pan and Apollon is not as far-fetched as it may seem at first blush. Besides their association with music, both are pastoral gods (see Euripides Alkestis 1–7 and Kallimakhos Hymn to Apollon 47–54). Pan is connected with Mount Lykaion (“wolf mountain”) in Arkadia (see Larson 2007, p. 151) and Apollon is sometimes called “Lykeios” (which can mean “wolf-like, of a wolf”; Pan also bore this name at Tegea). Both Apollon and Pan, among other gods, were also worshipped on Mount Kotilion in Arkadia (see Larson 2007, p. 99). Apollodoros (1.4.1) tells us that Apollon learned prophecy from Pan, but this Pan is said to be the son of Zeus and Hybris and thus to be distinguished from the Pan whose father is Hermes (see OH 11i). Nevertheless, such a fine distinction might well be lost or misunderstood, and it is possible that our composer was influenced by an account that made the god Pan Apollon’s teacher (a relationship perhaps even intentionally imitating the centaur Kheiron’s traditional role in training mortal heroes, including in the arts of music).

35. To Leto

Leto is the daughter of the Titans Koios and Phoibe (Hesiod Theogony 404-408; see also line 2 of this hymn). Her importance in Greek myth is fully derived from that of her children, Apollon and Artemis. Hesiod emphasizes her gentle ways; compare also Iliad 21.497–504 and the folk-etymologies of her name at Plato Cratylus 406a–b. However, even she can be roused to anger, such as when Niobe boasts of her own children (Ovid Metamorphoses 6.146–312). She sometimes has her own cult (see Burkert 1985, pp. 171–172), but her role in cult is more often subordinate to one or both of her children, and she seems to have played no role in Orphic myth.

5 Ortygia, ... Delos: Ortygia (from the Greek “ortux,” meaning “quail”), is sometimes another name for Delos, e.g., in Kallimakhos Hymn to Apollon 2.59. Leto’s sister Asteria, while fleeing the advances of Zeus, turns herself into a quail, dives into the ocean, and becomes the island Delos (Apollodoros 1.4.1). However, these two places are often distinguished from each other, as in Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.16, which is identical to line 5 of this hymn. If Ortygia is to be understood as a separate place, one likely candidate is the small island Rheneia that lies opposite Delos and that, according to Strabo 10.5.5, once was called Ortygia. Thucydides reports that Polykrates, the tyrant of Samos in the middle of the sixth century ^{BC}, once chained the two islands together (3.104). Perhaps our composer sees them as two parts that form a unity, for he does refer to Apollon and Artemis as twins in line 1, which would be difficult to reconcile if their respective places of birth were significantly far apart. Nevertheless, calling them twins is conventional, and the “problem” might not have been felt as such; the gods, after all, are capable of many wonders. Of the other places known as Ortygia, the most likely alternate candidate would be the sacred grove near Ephesos, where a competing narrative of the birth of Apollon and Artemis was told (Strabo 14.1.20; for the importance of Ephesos for Artemis, see OH 36i). The more traditional account places the birth of Apollon (and sometimes Artemis) on Delos (see Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.14–139, Kallimakhos Hymn to Delos, and Apollodoros 1.4.1). Note that Artemis is called Ortygia at Sophokles Women of Trakhis 213, and in the Birds, Aristophanes puns on a Greek word to call Leto “quail-mother” (870).

36. To Artemis

Artemis, like her brother Apollon, governs many different spheres, some contradictory. She loves to hunt wild animals with her bow and arrow, yet she also protects them. Artemis is called “Mistress of Animals” (e.g., Iliad 21.470) and often appears as such in early iconography, usually winged, with animals to her left and/or right that she holds in a firm grasp (e.g., Boardman 1991, pl. 46.2). The wilderness is her domain, particularly forests and mountains, far away from human settlements, but she is also a goddess who protects cities. As our hymn mentions in lines 3–5, she assists in childbirth (including that of her brother, Apollon, according to Apollodoros 1.4.1), even though, as a virgin goddess (Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.16–20), she never experiences this process herself. Similarly, she is the one who protects and nurtures the young, while at other times she is blamed for the premature deaths of children. As with many Greek divinities, the ability to do one thing entails the capacity for its opposite, particularly expressed in terms of preservation versus destruction.

The dark side of the goddess is seen in her connection, at least in myth, with human sacrifice. While the Greek army is mustering at Aulis for the expedition to Troy, Agamemnon kills a deer sacred to Artemis. The goddess prevents the Greeks from sailing, and the seer Kalkhas reveals that the only way to propitiate her is for Agamemnon to sacrifice his daughter Iphigeneia as recompense for the slaying of Artemis' "daughter." The father grimly complies (see, e.g., Aeschylus Agamemnon 104–257). In some versions of the story, Artemis substitutes a deer for Iphigeneia at the last moment, unbeknownst to the men. This is the storyline adopted in Euripides' Iphigeneia at Tauris, but here, too, human sacrifice plays a role: Iphigeneia has been made Artemis' priestess in this barbarous land and now presides over the sacrifice of strangers (cf. Herodotos 4.103.1–2). Her brother Orestes comes to rescue her. They steal the statue of the goddess and bring it back to Athens, where a ritual is enacted that involves a worshipper slightly slitting his throat and letting the drops of blood fall on the altar. Artemis' belligerent nature appears in the great slugfest among the gods at Iliad 21.468–496, during which she chides her brother for refusing to fight Poseidon and then is soundly thrashed when confronted by her step-mother Hera.

Yet there is a joyous side to her as well. Nymphs typically attend her as she roams the countryside and hunts. She is also a leader of the dance and song, often as her brother Apollon provides the music (see, e.g., Homeric Hymn to Artemis 27.11–20 and Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.186–206). In fact, dances of young girls, particularly those on the cusp of marriage, are a prevalent feature of her worship (for a possible example of which, see Alkman PMGF 1). Many of her cults, such as the famous one in the Attic deme of Brauron, are centered on the feminine spheres under her control, which include childbirth and protection of the young. Her most important cult site was in Asia Minor at Ephesos, where her sanctuary numbered among the ancient wonders of the world. According to Kallimakhos, it was the Amazons who instituted sacrifice for Artemis, by setting up a statue and dancing a war dance around it (Hymn to Artemis 237–258). For more on her worship, see Burkert 1985, pp. 149–152, and Larson 2007, pp. 101–113.

Artemis became assimilated with many divinities over time (cf. “of many names” in line 1). Her worship at Ephesos was a result of being identified with Kybele (see OH 27i), a connection perhaps facilitated through their shared association with mountains and lions (see OH 27.2+n; lions often appear in the “Mistress of the Animals”-iconography). The Thracian goddess Bendis, who is at times identified with Kybele, is also matched with Artemis (Orphic fragment 257). Very common is Artemis’ merging with Moon, and thence with Hekate, as at Orphic fragment 356, where Tyche is also added (see further OH 1i, OH 9i, and OH 72.2n). Artemis’ concern with childbirth and association with Moon also naturally link her with Eileithyia; see OH 2i. Thus the hymns to Hekate (OH 1) and Moon (OH 9) should also be read closely with this one. Compare further the two Homeric hymns to Artemis (nos. 9 and 27) and Kallimakhos’ Hymn to Artemis. She plays very little role in Orphism, and consequently our hymn focuses on her traditional attributes.

2 Titanic: Apollon is also called a Titan; see OH 34.3+n.

2 Bacchic: Compare also “frenzy-loving” in line 5. Artemis and Dionysos share many traits: mountain haunts, blood-thirsty savagery, Eastern associations, and groups of female followers. Artemis joins a divine Dionysian thiasos in Pindar fragment 70b.19–21, and Timotheus (PMG 778(b)) might be describing her as a maenad. As “Bacchic” and “torch-bearing” (line 3), she might be so imagined here as well; see OH 1.3+n and OH 52i. For a possible identification of Apollon and Bacchos, see OH 34.7n.

3 torch-bearing goddess bringing light to all: This imagery evokes Artemis’ identification with Moon and Hekate; see OH 9.3n. In Orphic fragment 400, Artemis appears in a list of alternate names for Persephone, which also include Torch-Bearer and Light-Bringer (see also OH 40.11+n). She is also called a bringer of light at Kallimakhos Hymn to Artemis 204.

3 Diktyнна: This is a Kretan goddess, who is sometimes identified with Artemis (Euripides Hippolytos 145–147) or made into one of her companions (Pausanias 2.30.3). The maiden fled the amorous attentions of Minos by leaping into the sea (cf. the story of Ino; see OH 74i), where she was rescued in the nets of a fisherman (see Kallimakhos Hymn to Artemis 189–203). Hence she was called Diktyнна, Lady of Nets (Greek “diktuon” means “net”). The name, however, in reality is probably to be connected with Mount Dikte, as in Kallimakhos’ telling of the myth. The epithet “lady of Kydonia” in line 12 below refers to the Kretan town, where there was a temple to Diktyнна (Herodotos 3.59.2; Strabo 10.4.13). For more on this goddess, see Larson 2007, pp. 177–178.

6 roam in the night: For Moon's movement at night, see OH 9.2. Hekate is also closely associated with night; see OH 1.5.

7 masculine: There are a number of goddesses who are called masculine in the collection; see OH 9.4n.

8 Orthia: This might refer to a temple of Artemis on Mount Lykone in Argos, which also contained cult statues of Apollon and Leto (Pausanias 2.24.5). However, it is more likely an alternate spelling of Ortheia, a Spartan goddess who comes to be identified with Artemis. Part of her worship included boys enduring lashes from their fellows at her altar in a test of endurance; see Pausanias 3.16.7–11, who also gives an account of the origin of the wooden cult statue of the goddess. It is perhaps of note that he says a sanctuary to Eileithyia is not far from the one to Ortheia (3.17.1).

37. To the Titans

The Titans in myth are a group of twelve beings born of Earth and Sky, along with the three Kyklopes and three Hundred-Handers. For the story of their birth and their problems with Sky, and later Zeus, see OH 4i and OH 13i. In Orphic mythology, the Titans, sometimes spurred by Hera, become jealous when Zeus places the infant Dionysos on his throne. They paint their faces and, with the help of toys and a mirror, lure the child away from the throne despite his being guarded by the Kouretes. They then kill him and eat his corpse. Zeus eventually finds out about this horrid crime and incinerates the Titans with his lightning bolts. The heart of Dionysos is saved by Athene, and this heart serves as the basis for the god's reconstitution. Out of the smoldering ashes of the Titans, charged with Zeus' lightning bolts, is born the human race. Our knowledge of this story comes from later sources, and it is not clear how far back it goes: see Orphic fragment 57–59 and 301–331, West 1983, pp. 74–75, Burkert 1985, pp. 297–298, and Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 66–93. For the significance of this myth for Orphism, see the introduction to the translation. Our hymn obliquely refers to this origin of the human race in lines 2 and 4, and it is expanded to include all living things in line 5; see also OH 78.11–12+n, and cf. OH 10.14–16+n. The murder of Dionysos is tactfully left out.

3 Tartarean homes: After their defeat by Zeus, the Titans are cast down into Tartaros, a primeval being who had become a particularly gloomy part of the underworld; see OH 18.2n. There they are imprisoned, guarded by the monstrous Hundred-Handers (Hesiod Theogony 717–735). Despite being locked up in mythology's version of Alcatraz, they can still wreak harm on the upper world. They are among the gods

Hera invokes when she strikes the earth with the palm of her hand in a request to give birth apart from Zeus to a powerful child; this results in Typhon, a great monster that threatens the gods and is eventually defeated by Zeus (Hesiod Theogony 820–880). She makes a similar, if less sinister, appeal at Iliad 14.271–279.

38. To the Kouretes

This is the second hymn in the collection addressed to the Kouretes; for more information on these figures, see OH 31i. That hymn concentrates on their more traditional associations with Krete and the Phrygian Kybele. This hymn integrates the Kouretes into a more wide-ranging grouping popular in late antiquity that brought together a number of originally independent bands of male divinities involved with soteriological mystery cults. Explicitly mentioned are the gods of the island Samothrace (lines 4 and 21) and the Dioskouroi (line 21). The cult on Samothrace seems to have had pre-Greek origins but later developed into a Greek mystery cult. It became very popular after the Classical period; one of the most famous statues from antiquity, the Nike of Samothrace, now in the Louvre, was dedicated to the gods of this cult for a naval victory (second century ^{BC}). They were in particular supposed to protect sailors from drowning at sea. After a friend had pointed out the dedications from rescued sailors at Samothrace as proof that the gods must exist, the notorious atheist Diagoras of Melos (late fifth century ^{BC}) is reputed to have quipped that dead men do not make dedications (Cicero De natura deorum 3.89). For more on this mystery cult, see Burkert 1985, pp. 281–285, and Larson 2007, p. 174. The brothers of Helen, Kastor and Polydeukes, were also called on to aid sailors in distress. The phenomenon now known as St. Elmo’s fire was in antiquity considered to be their epiphany (see Alkaios fragment 34 and the Homeric Hymn to the Dioskouroi no. 33). In myth, they are the sons of Tyndareus, a king of Sparta. Homer in the Iliad considers them to be mortal (3.236–244), but later tradition holds Polydeukes, along with Helen, to be descended from Zeus, who surreptitiously mated with Tyndareus’ wife Leda in the form of a swan. She gave birth to two pairs of twins, the male Kastor and Polydeukes and the female Klytemnestra and Helen, the first child in each pair descended from Tyndareus and the second from Zeus. Kastor was granted immortality at the request of his brother, but they alternate their time in the land of the living with their time in the kingdom of the dead (see Odyssey 11.298–304 and Pindar Nemean Odes 10.80–82). They thus can be construed, like Dionysos, as gods who die and are reborn, which may help explain their merging with the gods of Samothrace and the Kouretes here. In fact, the name Dioskouroi is a composite meaning “Zeus’ [dios] young men [kouroi],” “kouroi” being linguistically related to the “kour-” in Kouretes (a word meaning “youths”; see OH 31i).

Like the Kouretes, they also dance a pyrrhikhē (see Plato Laws 796d and OH 31.1–4n).

This hymn equates the Kouretes, the Dioskouroi, and the gods of Samothrace by associating these figures with the winds that are connected with fertility and the dangers of the sea; what binds these two ideas together, in turn, is the idea that certain winds come at certain seasons (cf. Hesiod's extended discourse on the topic at Works and Days 618–694). This hymn should be compared to those addressed to Leukothea and Palaemon (OH 74–75), the winds Boreas, Zephyros, and Notos (OH 80–82), the other hymn to the Kouretes (OH 31), the one to Korybas (OH 39), and the two Homeric hymns to the Dioskouroi (nos. 17 and 33).

1–2: The hymn opens with traditional attributes of the Kouretes. The percussive sound of the beating of brazen arms is analogous to the bronze clappers and cymbals used in ecstatic cult, particularly that of Kybele (see OH 27.11n).

2 dwellers of heaven, of earth and sea: Compare also line 8. Numerous divinities in this collection are connected with these three realms; see OH 10.14–16n. There is a natural analogue to this, though, since the Kouretes are identified with the winds, which are physically present in all three.

3 life-giving breezes: The Kouretes are connected with fertility, as they are in Kretan cult (see OH 31i), but here, and in lines 22 and 24, they are identified with the winds that blow throughout the world. The association is perhaps facilitated by the connection of the Kouretes with Zeus, the storm and weather god. In our collection Hera, who is associated with air, sends “soft breezes” that “nourish the soul” (see OH 16.3+n).

6 first to set up sacred rites for mortals: The Kouretes, as in OH 31.5, are portrayed as mythical paradigms for actual cult practice; see further OH 76.7+n.

13–19: The typical Greek conception that what a god gives can also be taken away by the same god is found here. This is further strengthened by the identification with winds, which can be gentle and beneficial or powerful and destructive. As with many other hymns in the collection, the composer is aware of this contradictory dichotomy so essential to Greek religious thought. The negative side is acknowledged in these lines; the positive side is explicitly desiderated at the end (lines 24–25).

20–21 Kouretes, Korybantes, ... / masters of Samothrace, true Dioskouroi: The hymn reaches a crescendo with the aggregation of various appellations. The Kabeiroi in the opening address to Mousaios seem to be viewed as another name for the Dioskouroi; see OH O.20+20–22n and OH 39i.

39. To Korybas

Korybas is the singular form of Korybantes, the group of priests and adherents of Kybele who were known to practice rites designed to cure madness (see OH 27.13n) and who were often equated with the Kouretes (see OH 31i). In this regard, it is significant that Korybas is called Koures, the singular of Kouretes, in line 3 (and see below). Sometimes Korybas is said to be the son of Kybele and the eponymous father of the Korybantes (Diodorus Siculus 5.49). Hippolytos reports of a hymn to Attis, well-known in his time, which was understood by the Naassenes, a sect of Christianity, as expressing their own beliefs (Refutation of All Heresies 5.9.8; translation and discussion in Borgeaud 2004, pp. 106–107). In this hymn, Attis is said to have been called Adonis by the Assyrians, Osiris by the Egyptians, Adamna by the Samothracians, Korybas by the Haemonians, and Papas by the Phrygians. “Haemonians” is a synecdoche for Thessalians, a people infamous for its witches (see OH 1.1n).

Clement of Alexandria in his Protrepticus relates a foundational myth for the rites of the Korybantes (2.19). In this story, they are three brothers; two of the brothers kill the third; they then cover the body with a purple cloth and garlands, convey it on a bronze shield, and bury it on the foothills of Mount Olympos. Clement summarizes the mysteries succinctly as “murders and burials.” This story is almost certainly alluded to in line 6 of this hymn. If so, we see that Korybas, thus foully murdered, becomes a restless spirit roaming the earth and potentially wreaking vengeance on any he encounters by driving them to madness; compare with the Erinyes and Melinoe (see OH 69i and OH 71.4–5+n). Like Melinoe, he is also called on to avert the horrid phantoms he is also capable of sending (see OH 71.11n).

Clement further identifies these brothers with the Kabeiroi, another group of divinities found in mystery cults. In fact, these gods are equated at times with those of Samothrace. They are mentioned in the opening address to Mousaios with the Kouretes and Korybantes (see OH O.20–22+n), and it seems likely that the association is lurking in the background here, more tightly connecting Korybas with the previous hymn to the Kouretes who are invoked as Samothracian gods (OH 38.4, 21; compare also the Attis hymn cited above). What is more, Clement says that the brothers as fugitives took a basket containing the genitals of their dead brother, now called Dionysos, to Etruria, where they established his worship (cf. OH 46i). He ends his account by acknowledging that some people with reason call Dionysos Attis. The connection is significant, because Attis castrates himself after suffering madness sent by Kybele (see OH 27i). A loose identification among Attis, Dionysos, and Korybas seems to lie at the heart of our hymn. It is probably as a doublet of Dionysos that Korybas is called “the greatest king of eternal earth” (line 1) and “warlike” (line 2 see note) and this identification helps explain why the hymn follows one dedicated to the Kouretes, who in Orphic accounts guard the enthroned infant Dionysos (see OH 31i).

The merging of identities is further underscored by the presence of Demeter in this hymn, called Deo in line 7. This goddess is sometimes equated with Rhea and Kybele (see OH 14i and OH 27i). Clement, in his discussion of the Korybantic rites, notes that the priests, called “Lords of the Rites” (Greek “Anaktotelestai”), do not allow celery to be placed on the altar, since they consider it to have been born from the blood of the murdered brother. He then compares this taboo with the worship of Demeter during the Thesmophoria festival, where pomegranate seeds that have fallen on the floor are forbidden to be consumed on the grounds that such seeds were born from the blood of Dionysos. Clement’s discussion of the Eleusinian Mysteries frames his account of the rites of the Kabeiroi. Interestingly enough, Psellos at Quaenam sunt graecorum Opiniones de daemonibus 3 says that a Korybas and a Koures were mimetic forms of demons who were included in the initiation to the Eleusinian Mysteries. Prima facie, this indicates that the pair Korybas/Koures belonged to that part of Orphic/Dionysiac demonology that became connected with Eleusis, at least in the minds of those who tried to unravel the mysteries. It is therefore no surprise that the block of four “Eleusinian” hymns in our collection immediately follow this one.

Korybas, then, as an analogue of the murdered Dionysos, ends the theme of this god’s rebirth that is implicit in OH 31–38, which are addressed to figures who played a role in this endeavor (and divinities subordinate to them), and which transitions to the central section of the collection (see further OH 30i, OH 32i, OH 40i).

2 the warlike: This is an adjective used of Dionysos at OH 30.4 and of the Kouretes’ weapons at OH 38.1 and 7.

8 into the shape of a savage, dark dragon: The significance of this is obscure. It is probably alluding to some myth now lost to us. Clement cites an anonymous poet referring to the birth of Dionysos from Persephone and Zeus: “A bull, father of a dragon [or: snake], and a father of a bull, a dragon [or: snake]; / in the mountain an oxherd carries his secret goad” (Protrepticus 2.16.3). Note that Demeter’s chariot is drawn by dragons in the following hymn (see OH 40.14+n).

40. To Eleusinian Demeter

Demeter is the goddess of agriculture, specifically of cereals and their cultivation. She is one of the “original six” Olympians born from Kronos and Rhea. However, as one of the most important fertility goddesses in the Greek pantheon, she often is identified with Earth herself. In antiquity, her name was commonly analyzed as “dē” (believed to have been a variant of “gē,” “earth”) and “mētēr” (“mother”); Orphic fragment 399, for example, addresses her as “Earth mother of all, Demeter, giver of prosperity and wealth.” This identification extends to other fertility goddesses as well, such as Rhea and Kybele (see OH 14i and OH 27i). It is reported that Orpheus himself supposedly claimed Rhea was known as Demeter after the birth of Zeus, etymologizing the “dē” element as related to the “di-” root in Zeus’ name (Orphic fragment 206). Zeus mates with her, and she gives birth to a daughter, Persephone, with whom she is closely connected in cult. We find mention of this already in Hesiod Theogony 912–914. In Orphic accounts of this union, Demeter, here equated with her mother Rhea, attempts to flee the amorous attentions of her son Zeus by transforming herself into a snake. Undeterred, Zeus does likewise, and from this was born Persephone, who has monstrous features that frighten her mother away (see OH 14i). A similar story is found in Arkadia; here, Demeter turns herself into a horse to escape Poseidon, who follows suit. Their children are the Erinyes and the wonder horse Areion (see OH 69i). The ophidian rape by Zeus has been diplomatically omitted from this hymn.

The most important myth concerning Demeter is the abduction of Persephone by Hades, memorably told in the beautiful Homeric Hymn to Demeter. The story, however, is not mentioned at all in this hymn but in the following one to Mother Antaia, another name of Demeter, as well as in OH 18, OH 29 and OH 43. For details, see OH 41i. It is notable that again, just as in the case of Zeus’ rape of Demeter, the unpleasantness of the abduction of Persephone is passed over in silence in this hymn.

The account of Persephone’s abduction, Demeter’s search for her, and their consequent reunion formed the foundation myth of the Eleusinian Mysteries, which were very old, perhaps performed in some form as far back as the bronze age. Eleusis is a village that was originally independent of Athens but eventually became part of its territory at some point before the seventh century. The cult was appropriated by the Athenians, who in later times worked hard to give these local mysteries Panhellenic importance, much like Delphi. In this they were quite successful. The mysteries were very popular and continued unabated until officially shut down by the emperor Theodosius in 392 AD, although they were by then already largely neglected. For details of the cult, see Burkert 1985, pp. 285–290, and Larson 2007, pp. 69–85, who also discusses other cults of Demeter and Persephone. The Eleusinian Mysteries were concerned with securing wealth and happiness in this life and a better fate in the hereafter—concerns which we find also in Dionysian/Orphic mysteries, among others, as well. Our hymn focuses exclusively on the material benefits of this life, and it radiates a joy in the wealth and abundance of the world, which may help to explain the omissions of the unsavory mythological elements as noted above. The Eleusinian Mysteries might also be specifically mentioned in our collection because they were felt to have special connection with the actual cult in which the Hymns were in use. It is notable that Mousaios had connections with the Mysteries; see OH Oi. Their prestige might also be a factor in their appearance throughout the collection; compare their possible influence on the early development of the Orphic myth of Dionysos in Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 73–75. At any rate, the polytheistic nature of Greek religion made such associations possible. One may be a member of many mystery religions, to hedge one's bets as it were. On one of the Bacchic gold tablets, for example, the initiate claims to "have the rites of Bacchos and Demeter Chthonia and the Mountain Mother" (no. 28). Most likely some, if not all, of our initiates were members in other mystery cults, too.

This hymn is the first of a group of four with Eleusinian themes. It comes in the middle of the collection (in terms of number of lines), and it leads directly to the ritual complex involving Dionysos (see OH 44i), which probably was the high point of the rite during which these hymns were originally performed. It is perhaps not accidental that Eleusinian Demeter receives the most elaborate request at the end of her hymn: peace, law, wealth, and health. A number of hymns before this one mention three of these items in their closing appeals (see OH 15i), and the only hymns that mention even two of these afterward are OH 65 and OH 84.

1 Deo: This name of Demeter is usually understood by modern scholars to be a shortened form of "Demeter," although it is possible that it is just a by-form of the "dē" element. Ancient scholars saw it as such and tried to attach it to words that alluded to aspects of her mythology. For example, the author of the Derveni papyrus, in his interpretation of a poem by Orpheus, asserts that the "dē" is derived from a Greek verb meaning "to tear, to cut up" and explains that Zeus injured the goddess during intercourse, something which he reports that Orpheus "makes clear" later in the poem he was reading (see Betegh 2004, pp. 189–190; the Derveni author might be giving an allegorical meaning to an explicit mention of plowing).

2 nurturer of youths: This epithet is applied to other divinities in our collection: Hekate (OH 1.8), Artemis (OH 36.8), and Eirene (Peace) in the hymn to Ares (OH 65.9; cf. OH 12.8 and OH 19.22). As the hymn to Ares makes clear, peace and agriculture are closely linked, for when there is no war, men turn their swords to ploughshares; compare lines 4 and 19 of this hymn. Demeter may also be seen as a nurturer of youths insofar as she was nurse to Demophoön and tried to make him immortal (Homeric Hymn to Demeter 2.98–255). This same epithet recurs in line 13.

8–9: Those who were the first to do something were held in high regard by the ancient Greeks, who did not hesitate to invent such figures and/or give credit to the gods when no historical personage was at hand. Here Demeter is lauded as the first to create crops and the first to develop the technical means to harvest them. In respect to the latter, she fits the pattern of the culture hero, the one whose innovations pave the way for the development and improvement of human civilization; cf. OH 38.6+n and OH 76.7+n, where the Kouretes and the Muses respectively teach mortals the sacred rituals (as does Demeter in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter 2.473–482). The most famous divine culture hero in myth is probably Prometheus (see, for example, Aeschylus Prometheus Bound 436–506, and cf. OH 28i and OH 66i). Demeter is said to have taught the Eleusinian prince Triptolemos the secrets of agriculture, and he in turn traveled the world to teach his fellow man. We find Demeter linked to plowing in Hesiod's injunction to his brother to pray to Demeter and Chthonian Zeus right before beginning to plow (Works and Days 465–469). Another early connection between the goddess and agricultural technique is found in a Homeric simile where Demeter is shown separating grain from chaff (Iliad 5.499–502).

10 Bromios: Another name for Dionysos; the name means the “roarer” (cf. OH 30.1+n). This god becomes associated with Demeter at Eleusis through Iacchos, who seems to be a personified form of the cry the sacred procession would shout out on their way to Eleusis; see OH 42.4+n.

11 torch-bearing and pure: Torches are typical staples in the process of celebrating fertility divinities, who often have their festivities celebrated at night, including Dionysian revels (see OH 52i and OH 54.10). They were an important part of the Eleusinian cult, as might be deduced from the title of one of its highest functionaries, the Dadoukhos (a word meaning “torch-bearer”); see OH 42.4n. Demeter carries a torch while fasting and in search of her daughter (Homeric Hymn to Demeter 2.47–50, 59–63), and Artemis-Persephone is called Torch-Bearer” (see OH 36.3n). See further OH 9.3n. Purity is a general concern in Greek religion but especially in matters such as initiations. For example, potential initiates in the Eleusinian Mysteries needed to bathe themselves in the sea along with the pig they were to sacrifice. Both these adjectives, then, are as much descriptive of our initiates as they are of the goddess herself. See also OH 30.4+n.

14: A different kind of yoking than mentioned in line 8. Triptolemos is often portrayed in a winged chariot, bringing the knowledge of Demeter to all (see Boardman 1991, p. 219, Boardman 1975, p. 226, and Boardman 1989, p. 226). The dragons here are symbolic of Demeter's chthonic connection; compare line 12 where the goddess is addressed as appearing from beneath the earth. Demeter Chthonia (Demeter From Beneath the Earth) was in fact worshipped at Hermione (see Larson 2007, pp. 78–79). The dragons might also have a connection with Korybas, who in the previous hymn was said to have taken the form of a dragon in accordance with “Deo's thinking” (lines 7–8), an obscure allusion.

15: Demeter is here described in maenadic terms; see OH 1.3n. The throne might be referring to Kybele's throne (see OH 27.5+9n). The circular movement perhaps symbolizes the revolution of the celestial bodies around the earth (see OH 4.3n).

16 only daughter ... many children: The contrasting juxtaposition is typical of our poet's style, but the reference here is somewhat puzzling. Persephone is usually her only child in myth, but Demeter sometimes is said to have children beside her. In an early myth, she has as a lover the mortal hero Iasion, with whom she lies in a thrice-plowed field. From this union she gives birth to Ploutos (Wealth; see OH 18i), but Iasion is killed by Zeus (Hesiod Theogony 969–974 and Odyssey 5.125–128; see also Homeric Hymn to Demeter 2.488–489). Herodotos mentions that Aeschylus (in a play now lost to us) made Artemis the daughter of Demeter on the basis of an Egyptian tale (2.156.5–6); the historian, however, is skeptical of this last detail. Kallimakhos says that Hekate was the daughter of Demeter (fragment 466; see Orphic fragment 400). Since Artemis and Hekate eventually are identified as the same goddess, it is possible that both births point to one original account, perhaps Orphic. They both might have already been identified with Persephone, too (see OH 29i). However, in our collection Persephone is explicitly said to be Demeter's only daughter (OH 29.1–2). It is difficult, though not impossible, to construe “many” to just mean Persephone-Artemis-Hekate and Ploutos. On the other hand, “many children” may be symbolic insofar as Demeter is viewed as a nurturer of children (see lines 2 and 13) or it may be used in the sense that the crops she sends up are “her children.” The attribute “only daughter” is even more puzzling, as she has two sisters, Hestia and Hera, in conventional mythology. But Demeter was equated with Hestia and Hera in early Orphic thought (see OH 14i and Betegh 2004, p. 222), and our composer might have in mind Demeter as the personification of female fertility in these lines; this gains some support from the general description of her powers in line 17 and the “many children” in line 16, if we are to understand this attribute broadly.

18–20: The repetitions augment the sense of religious fervor and insistence as the hymn closes with a mighty crescendo. The theme running throughout the hymn, that Demeter is a goddess who brings benefits that contribute to the well-being of both the individual and society, is neatly summarized in these lines. The word “riches” is a translation of the Greek “ploutos,” which alludes to her son Ploutos (see note to line 16 above). Peace and rule of law might be intended as personifications of two of the Seasons, Eirene and Eunomia respectively (see OH 43i), and perhaps health should be personified as well (Hygeia), the addressee of OH 68; see also OH 15.10–11n.

41. To Mother Antaia

Mother Antaia is here another name for Demeter. The mythological complex surrounding the abduction of Persephone, absent in the previous hymn, is the focus of this one. Indeed, one of the remarkable features about the hymn is that more than half of it is narrative, a departure from the usual aggregation of epithets, names, and description.

The Homeric Hymn to Demeter contains the most famous version of the myth. Demeter fasts in grief after her daughter's disappearance, although she does not know yet that Hades has abducted her. Hekate comes to assist her, and they find out from Sun what has happened. Depressed, Demeter wanders the world disguised as an old woman (cf. also OH 74i). She eventually reaches Eleusis and becomes a nurse to Demophoön, the newly born son of the king of Eleusis. The baby becomes a kind of surrogate child for the goddess. The mother one night sees the nurse putting her son in the fire and cries out, not knowing that Demeter had intended to make him immortal. In anger Demeter leaves but not before ordering that a temple be built in her honor and promising to introduce rites in Eleusis later. For now, she keeps apart from the gods and causes a great famine with the intent to wipe out the human race and thus deprive the gods of the sacrifices they so very much crave. Hades is willing to let Persephone return, but she has already tasted of the pomegranate seeds he had given to her. Therefore she cannot remain permanently in the land of the living. For the one part of the year she must remain in the underworld with her husband; during this time Demeter grieves over her daughter and nothing grows. However, during the other two parts of the year, she is reunited with her daughter, and in her joy life flourishes anew. Thus the myth explains the origins of the seasons, which the ancient Greeks generally numbered three (see OH 29i). At the end of the poem, Demeter returns to the plains of Rharion outside of Eleusis. She restores the crops and teaches her mysteries, as she had promised, to the princes of Eleusis. There are a number of allusions to this story that are sequentially spread over a number of hymns in the collection; see OH 43i. For a similar story involving Kybele, see OH 27i. The abduction of Persephone and the wanderings of Demeter were the subject of at least one poem attributed to Orpheus (collected under Orphic fragment 379–402; see Richardson 1974, pp. 77–86, for a discussion of the versions of Orpheus, Mousaios, and Eumolpos). Relevant details are in the notes passim.

1 Antaia: The word is properly an adjective with the base meaning of “opposite” and further specialized senses of “hostile” and “besought with prayers.” As an adjective it is used of Kybele in Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 1.1141. Later grammarians say that it was also used as a proper name for Rhea and Hekate. It is therefore not surprising to see Demeter called by this name. Both the negative and positive connotations of the word are probably intended in this hymn. The goddess was once hostile to men; now they shower her with prayers, as this hymn does.

1–2 mother/of immortal gods and of mortal men: Similarly described are Rhea (OH 14.8–9), Earth (OH 26.1), and Kybele (OH 27.7); see also OH 10.1+n.

4: In the Homeric Hymn to Demeter 2.192–211, after the disguised Demeter agrees to be a nurse for Demophoön, she comes to Eleusis. She stands brooding in the palace until an old woman, Iambe, offers her a stool covered with a white fleece. Demeter sits but says nothing until Iambe tells her jokes that make her laugh. She refuses wine from the queen but asks instead that they make for her a drink made of water, barley-meal, and pennyroyal. It is with this that she breaks her fast. The drink, known as the kukeon, was also imbibed by initiates at the Eleusinian Mysteries. In the Orphic version(s), Iambe does not appear, but instead we find a woman named Baubo, a native Eleusinian, who gets the mourning mother to laugh by exposing her pudenda and who then offers her the kukeon that Demeter had earlier refused (Clement of Alexandria Protrepticus 2.20.3–21.1; Orphic fragment 394–395).

5–7: In the Homeric Hymn to Demeter, it is not the goddess but rather Hermes who goes into the underworld to fetch Persephone. Dysaules is the husband to Baubo (see the note to line 4 above). Pausanias reports that the Phliasians claim that he was the brother to Keleos (king of Eleusis in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter), that he came to them after being expelled by an Athenian, and that he taught them the mysteries (2.14.2). Pausanias is skeptical of the story, remarking that Dysaules is not mentioned among the group instructed by Demeter in her Homeric hymn and citing lines 2.474–476, but he admits that Dysaules might have arrived due to some other reason (2.14.3). In the Orphic version, Dysaules' sons Triptolemos and Eubouleus inform Demeter of the abduction of Persephone, and she teaches them the knowledge of agriculture as a reward (Pausanias 1.14.3). Clement of Alexandria tells us that Triptolemos was a cowherd and Eubouleus a swineherd and that the swine of Eubouleus fell into the earth during the abduction of Persephone (Protrepticus 2.20.2 and 2.17.1; see Orphic fragment 390–391). The latter is adduced to explain the custom in the Thesmophoria, a festival in honor of Demeter and Persephone, of women throwing pigs in a pit and later taking back the rotting corpse (see Larson 2007, p. 70), which would seem to be symbolic of Persephone's (and Demeter's?) journey. It is likely that Eubouleus is the one to whom the “innocent child of Dysaules” refers in this hymn. At Eleusis, there was a god named Eubouleus who was considered to have brought Persephone back up from the underworld, much like Hermes does in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter.

8: A problematic line. As it stands, Euboulos might be a vague reference to Ploutos, the son of Demeter and Iasion (see OH 40.16n), or to the Kretan grandfather of the goddess Diktynna (another name of Artemis; see note to OH 36.3n), whom Diodorus Siculus calls the son of Demeter (5.76.3). Elsewhere in the collection, Hades is called Euboulos (OH 18.12). The name might be an alternate form of Eubouleus, but it cannot refer to the one mentioned in the previous line. Eubouleus is also used of gods: Hades, Zeus, Dionysos, and Protogonos (see OH 6i). None would fit the context, however. This led Theiler to suggest changing the Greek verb “bore” to “made”: the sense then would be that Demeter changed Eubouleus (who had helped her find and retrieve Persephone) into a god, and thus he was no longer bound by human needs. This would fit in neatly with the story of Demophoön in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter and with the fact that there was a god Eubouleus at Eleusis (see note to lines 5–7 above). Note, too, that on some Bacchic gold tablets it is claimed that the initiate will become a god (nos. 3, 5, 9; see OH 87.12n). A third possibility is that something has fallen out between lines 7 and 8. The “you” might then be someone else, such as Persephone.

42. To Mise

Mise is an obscure goddess who appears to be connected with Demeter and Eleusis. She is mentioned in a poem by Herodas, in which a character sees a girl at a “Descent of Mise,” a cultic context that suggests a journey to the underworld (Mimiamb 1.56). In the lexicon of Hesychios, she is connected with Meter and said to be invoked in oaths (entry M 1442). The name might appear in an account attributed to Asklepiades of Tragilos (fourth century BC) by Harpocration (see Orphic fragment 391), who says that the Eleusinian pair Dysaules and Baubo had two daughters, Protonoe and Nisa, the latter name possibly a corruption of “Misa,” which would be another form of “Mise.” Two inscriptions have been discovered bearing the name. One was found in the precinct of Demeter in Pergamon, the other on an altar dedicated by a priestess to “Mise Kore” near Pergamon. For a review of the evidence and interpretation, see Ricciardelli 2000, pp. 398–400 and Morand 2001, pp. 169–174. In this hymn, Mise is identified with Dionysos and seems to be a reflection of the female side of the god who elsewhere appears androgynous (see note to line 4). Whether they are considered distinct or the same is difficult to determine. The Eleusinian connection is strong in the beginning portion of the hymn: the epithet “law-giving” in line 1 is also a cultic title of Demeter and Persephone, Iacchos was the name of a god chanted by the sacred procession to Eleusis (see note to line 4), and Eleusis is the first place mentioned in the list found in lines 5–10. The three goddesses mentioned in lines 6–10 are all connected with a young boy who dies and is reborn: Meter and Attis (see OH 27i), Aphrodite and Adonis (see OH 56i), and Isis and Osiris, who already in the Classical period was identified with Dionysos (Herodotos 2.144; see also Diodorus Siculus 1.13.5 and 1.22.7–23.8 and Plutarch De Iside et Osiride 364e ff.). For the identification of Isis with Aphrodite, Meter, Demeter, and other goddesses, see OH 55.15–28n.

1 fennel stalk: A reference to the thyrsos; see OH 45.5n.

2 unforgettable and many-named seed: See also OH 50.2+n.

4 Iacchos: Participants in the Eleusinian Mysteries would walk from Athens to Eleusis at night by torchlight with song, dance, and bawdy banter; see OH 40.11n. The god invoked was Iacchos, who seems to be a personification of the cry “iakkhe!” This god was identified with Dionysos; see Sophokles Antigone 1146–1152. The chorus of initiates calls on Iacchos in their procession in Aristophanes Frogs 340–353 and 372–416, and a ghost procession is supposed to have materialized during the Persian Wars as a sign of the eventual disaster of the Persian campaign (Herodotos 8.65). The name Iacchos appears in the Eleusinian myth in which Baubo exposes her genitals to the mourning Demeter (Orphic fragment 395 and see OH 41.4n), where there probably was a pun on “iakkhos” (“female genitalia”) and Iacchos, who sometimes is regarded as the child of Demeter; see Graf 1974, pp. 194–199. Iacchos also played a role in the Lenaia, an Athenian festival (see OH 50i). For the androgyny of Dionysos, see OH 30.2n; for a list of androgynous deities in the Hymns, see OH 9.4n.

6 mystic rites in Phrygia: Compare OH 49.2–3 where Hipta, a nurse of Dionysos, is said to take part in the mysteries of Sabos and the dances of Iacchos.

9–10 your divine mother, / ... black-robed Isis: The epithet “black-robed” is used of the goddess in the third hymn to Isis by Isidoros (3.34); see Vanderlip 1972, p. 62. For Isis as the mother of Dionysos, see Plutarch De Iside et Osiride 365e–f.

10 train of nurses: A reference to the Nymphs who took the infant Dionysos after the death of Semele; see OH 46.2–3n.

11 contests: The Stars, too, are asked to come to the “learned contests of this sacred rite”; see OH 7.12+12–13n.

43. To the Seasons

The Seasons (Greek Horai), as their name suggests, are the personifications of the seasons. This hymn adopts the Hesiodic genealogy (Theogony 901–903) that makes them the daughters of Zeus and Themis (“established custom” or “law”), and, like their mother, they represent an aspect of the cosmic order (see further OH 79i). For Homer, these divinities are in charge of access to Olympos (Iliad 5.748–751) and in one scene take care of the horses of Hera and Athene when they return (Iliad 8.432–435). The Orphic Rhapsodies follow Hesiod with respect to the birth and names of the Seasons (Orphic fragment 252). Their names mean “law-abiding” (“eunomia”), “justice” (“dike”), and “peace” (“eirene”). Dike has her own hymn (OH 62), Eunomia is the mother of the Graces (OH 60.2), and both Eunomia and Eirene are summoned, though not personified, at the end of the hymn to Eleusinian Demeter (OH 40.19; but see OH 40.18–20n). According to Pausanias (9.35.2), however, at Athens there were only two Seasons worshipped, whose names were Karpo (Fruit) and Thallo (Blossom). The Seasons do not merely embody the seasons but also come to represent youthful feminine beauty as well. They clothe Aphrodite when she emerges from the sea and adorn her with numerous ornaments (Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 6.5–18), and they crown the newly-fashioned Pandora with a garland of spring flowers (Hesiod Works and Days 74–75). This connection with spring and flowers is emphasized in this hymn, which fits the context of fertility introduced with Eleusinian Demeter (OH 40).

The Seasons are also linked with the myth of Persephone’s abduction and return in our collection. The entire story is scattered over several hymns, but nevertheless the chronological order is maintained; in performing the hymns, the initiates recreate the myth piecemeal. The abduction portion appears in two earlier hymns: the one to Plouton, where there is brief narration (OH 18.12–15), and the one to Persephone (OH 29.14). The next part, Demeter’s search and recovery of her daughter, again with short narration, is told in the hymn to Mother Antaia (OH 41.3–7). Now in this hymn, the cycle is completed. Every year, Persephone’s reappearance in the land of the living heralds the beginning of spring, the season of growth. It is not surprising, then, to see the personifications of spring dancing with her in celebration of the return of life (see also OH 29.9–13); note in particular the “circling dances” and “come forth to the light” in line 8 and that their dancing pleases “Zeus and their mother, giver of fruits” in line 9. “Their mother” refers to Themis, who rejoices that the cosmic order, manifested in the cycle of seasons, is maintained. The idea of renewal is also important to Dionysos, the focus of the previous hymn, both because he is a fertility god himself and also because he was reborn, just like his mother Persephone (albeit metaphorically). In this context, the invocation at the end of the hymn that the goddesses appear to the new initiates has special point. They, too, are being “born again” into a new life (see OH 30i). It also segues into the theme of birth, which had appeared in the earlier hymns of the collection and which will dominate OH 44–55 (see OH 44i).

The Fates, too, join the festivities. They do so not only because they are the (half-)sisters of the Seasons (see OH 59i) but also because they have a natural interest in the cosmic order as well. The seasons recur as they are fated to do so. We find the Seasons and Fates linked in cultic contexts. In the precinct of Zeus at Athens, Pausanias saw an unfinished statue of the god with both groups above his head (1.40.4). On the altar at Amyklai they were depicted next to Demeter, Persephone, and Plouton, along with Aphrodite, Athene, and Artemis (Pausanias 3.19.4).

The Graces naturally take part in the dance as well. They are very similar to the Seasons in that they, too, are a plurality of three young women who are paradigmatic of feminine beauty and charm (see OH 60i). They join the Seasons in adorning Pandora (Hesiod Works and Days 73–74). In perhaps one of the most beautiful scenes from ancient Greek literature, both groups dance in a circle with Hebe, Harmonia, and Aphrodite. In their midst Artemis sings. Ares and Hermes play along with them. And all of this is in tune with the glorious music of Apollon as he expertly plays the lyre (Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.186–206). Our composer has skillfully captured the essence of this joie de vivre and grafted it to a genuine religious awe before the uncanny powers of fertility. It is a fitting coda to the block of four hymns with Eleusinian themes.

44. To Semele

Semele is one of the daughters of Kadmos, the founder of Thebes. Zeus falls in love with her, and they begin to have an affair. Eventually Semele, sometimes at the instigation of a disguised and jealous Hera, secures an oath from Zeus and then demands that he appear to her as he does to his wife. Thus constrained, Zeus reluctantly complies; he reveals himself to the mortal woman in his full stature as god of thunder and lightning. The resulting fireworks burn Semele to a crisp. Zeus notices that she was pregnant, and he decides to save the unborn child. He sews it up in his thigh, and, once it reaches full maturity, Zeus gives “birth” to his son, Dionysos; see Euripides Bacchae 1–42, Apollodoros 3.4.3, Ovid Metamorphoses 3.257–313, Orphic fragment 328, and OH 48.3+n and OH 50.3+n. Sometimes Dionysos is given to Semele’s sister, Ino, to nurse, and she in turn is further pursued by Hera (see OH 74i); in other versions, baby Dionysos is given to his half-brother Hermes, who hands the child off to the Nymphs in the East to rear (see OH 51i), sometimes with Silenos (see OH 54.1+n). For the nurse Hipta, see OH 49i. Semele is already mentioned as the mother of Dionysos by Homer (Iliad 14.325), by Hesiod (Theogony 940–942), and in the three Homeric hymns to Dionysos (1.21, 7.1, 26.2). An alternate name for her is Thyone (Homeric Hymn to Dionysos 1.21, Sappho fragment 17, Apollodoros 3.5.3). The Orphics offered a different version, namely that Dionysos, sometimes called Zagreus, was the son of Zeus and Persephone (see OH 29i), but some accounts attempt to retain the traditional genealogy; for a reconstruction of how and why this was done, see Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 74–80. In one of these versions, after Dionysos is killed by the Titans, Athene saves his heart and brings it to Zeus; he promptly cuts it up, makes a little soup out of it, and feeds it to Semele, who then is impregnated and gives birth to Dionysos; see Orphic fragment 314–316 and 327, Proclus Hymn to Athene Polymetis 7.7–15 (translation and commentary in van den Berg 2001, pp. 277 and 287–293), West 1983, pp. 162–163, and Graf/Johnston 2007, p. 78. In our collection, both Semele and Persephone are called the mother of Dionysos, but in one case it is implied that Persephone received Dionysos to rear after he was born (presumably by Semele; see OH 46.6–7+n, and cf. OH 30.2+n).

This hymn begins a series (through OH 54) whose focus is on Dionysos; in particular, these hymns are linked by the motif of (re)birth, a theme that is prevalent at the beginning of the collection (see OH 2i). A number of them refer to ritual contexts and, insofar as the hymns are performative acts (see OH 30i), probably reflect something of the actual activities of our cult during this particular rite, though details are vague; see lines 6–9 and note.

6–9: There is a tradition that Dionysos descended into the underworld to retrieve his mother and convey her to Olympos (Pausanias 2.37.5; cf. Pindar Olympian Odes 2.25–28 and the comic parody in Aristophanes Frogs, in which Dionysos goes to fetch the recently-departed playwright Euripides). Here, though, it seems that Persephone has received her kindly in the underworld. Semele might originally have been an earth goddess, and these lines might be an indirect remnant of this tradition. The “ritual of the table” is obscure. Perhaps it is related to the myth mentioned in the introduction to the hymn that has Zeus feeding Semele Dionysos-soup. Note the phrase “all mortal men reenact your travail,” which of course suggests birth, and it would certainly be easier for a worshipper to drink soup in a ritual context than to be set on fire (see also OH 47.5n). The idea of ingesting the god is already bound together with his role as god of wine and the concept of enthousiasmos (see OH 30i). See also Graf/Johnston 2007, p. 156.

45. Hymn to Dionysos Bassareus and Triennial

Dionysos is already the addressee of OH 30, but this hymn is the first of a series dedicated to a specific cultic identity of Dionysos. Here he is invoked as Bassareus and Triennial; cf. OH 52, which is addressed to Triennial and which mentions Bassaros in line 12, a variant of Bassareus. This epithet is derived from the Thracian word “bassara,” “fox” and, by extension, the fox-skin worn at times by the god and his maenads. Thracian maenads could be called Bassarids, and a lost play by Aeschylus bears their name as a title. In this play, it seems they tear apart Orpheus, who, incidentally, is their countryman. The violence mentioned in our hymn might very well have been influenced by this play, although by now the violent death of Orpheus had become a literary standard. In any case, it is possible that the Thracian connection induced our poet to include a hymn addressed to Dionysos Bassareus. Bassarids are first mentioned by Anakreon (PMG 411b), who also uses a related verb, “anabassareō,” to indicate reveling at a symposium (PMG 356a). This hymn continues the birth theme (see OH 44i) and alludes to maenadic ritual in lines 3–5. It is not difficult to conceive a period of joyous shouting, dancing, and brandishing of thyrsi (perhaps limited to the female initiates, if there were any) that was intended to be symbolic at the rite when this hymn was performed; see also OH 52i and OH 54i.

1 bull-faced god conceived in fire: For Dionysos’ relationship to bulls, see OH 30.3–4+n. “Conceived in fire” would appear to refer to his traditional birth from Semele (see OH 44i and OH 30.2n).

2 many-named: For a list of the names used of Dionysos in the collection, see OH 50.2n.

3 bloody swords: Not a weapon normally associated with Dionysos. Plutarch tells us of a rite in which women who represented the Minyads, the daughters of Minyas who had rejected Dionysos (see note to line 5, “wrathful in the extreme”), were pursued by a priest armed with a sword (Quaestiones graecae 299c–300a). There are a number of Attic vases from the first half of the fifth century ^{bc} that portray Orpheus being killed by Thracian women who wield all sorts of weapons, including swords (see Bundrick 2005, pp. 116–126). The violence of the god is further alluded to in line 5. See also OH 30.4+n (“warlike”).

3 holy Maenads: See the introduction to this hymn.

4: For a picture of Olympians celebrating Bacchic frenzy, see Pindar fragment 70b.6–21. Loudness is a characteristic of Dionysos and his worship; see OH 30.1+n.

5 thyrsos: The thyrsos is a wand topped with a pine cone that is sometimes wrapped in ivy. The shaft can be made from the fennel stalk; see OH 42.1 and Euripides Bacchae 147. It is one of the most widespread attributes of Dionysian worship, frequently mentioned in literature and often depicted in iconography. In the context of discussing initiation, Plato gives a prose quotation vaguely attributed to “the followers of the mysteries” that “the fennel-stalk bearers [narthēkophoroi] are many, the bacchoi few” (Phaedo 69c = Orphic fragment 576), which seems to point to a distinction between general worship of Dionysos (maenadism?) and the more restricted mystery cults that require initiation, such as the Eleusinian Mysteries (see also Graf/Johnston 2007, p. 143). The thyrsos is sometimes used as a weapon, e.g., by Dionysos in the Gigantomachy or by a maenad repelling the licentious advances of a satyr in vase paintings (e.g., Boardman 1975, pl. 313). See also OH 44.3, OH 50.8, and OH 52.4.

5 wrathful in the extreme: Examples of Dionysos' wrath abound in mythology, particularly in a group of myths that involve the rejection of his worship. Some of the more famous victims include Lykourgos, the Thracian king who hounded Dionysos and his maenads (Iliad 6.130–140), Pentheus and the women of Thebes (Euripides Bacchae), the daughters of Minyas, who eschewed going to the mountains to worship the god (Ovid Metamorphoses 4.1–40 and 390–415; also see the Plutarch citation in note to line 3), and the daughters of Proitos, who in some versions of their story also refuse Dionysos (Apollodoros 2.2.2). Orpheus himself experienced the god's wrath after rejecting him, being ripped apart (sparagmos) by maenads and/or the Bassarids (see OH 52i). See also OH 30.4+n and OH 47i.

7 leaping god: Leaping, frolicking, gamboling, prancing—all these are typical expressions of abandon in ecstatic cult; Dionysos himself often leads the wild processions (see, e.g., OH 52.3–4 and 7–8). Other related figures described in similar terms are Pan (OH 11.4), the Nereids (OH 24.7), the Kouretes (OH 31.1), and the Nymphs with Pan (OH 51.8). Note that all of these are groups, save Pan, who, like Dionysos, can function as chorus-leader. The leaping may have fertility connotations like the “leaping” in the Palaikastro hymn to Zeus does (see OH 31i). Dionysos is called the “dancer” at OH O.8, and his “feet quiver in the dance” at OH 46.4.

46. To Liknites

This hymn is addressed to Dionysos Liknites (Dionysos of the cradle), who is also mentioned in OH 52.3. The title “Liknites” comes from the Greek word “liknon,” the primary meaning of which is “winnowing-fan.” This was a common cult object in Dionysian mysteries, well-attested in vase paintings (e.g., Boardman 1989, pl. 233) and often containing a phallus; see Graf/Johnston 2007, p. 148, and compare the story of Korybas' murder (OH 39i). There are hints in later writers of a story in which the goddess Hipta places a winnowing fan on her head, wreathes it with a snake, and receives the infant Dionysos in it after he is born from Zeus' thigh (Orphic fragment 329); this coheres with her role as nurse of Dionysos in our collection (see OH 49.1). An enigmatic vase painting from the Classical period might be depicting a variant of this account (Boardman 1989, pl. 157; for discussion, see Loucas 1992); here, a woman (Hipta?) is bearing a covered winnowing-basket to two seated gods, who might be Sabazios and Kybele (see also OH 49i).

Dionysos was worshipped as Liknites at Delphi, and Plutarch tells us that it was believed his remains had been brought there (De Iside et Osiride 365a). This dovetails with one version of the Orphic myth of the Titans' dismemberment of Dionysos where it is Apollon who gathers the remains of his half-brother and buries them on Parnassos (Orphic fragment 322). Plutarch further says that the Holy Ones perform a secret sacrifice in Apollon's temple when Liknites is awakened by the Thyiads, a group of Attic women who performed maenadic rituals for Dionysos every other year on the slopes of Parnassos (see OH 52i and OH 53i; see further Plutarch Mulierum virtutes 249e–f and De primo frigido 953d). Dionysos was the most important deity at Delphi for three months in the winter, when Apollon was thought to be vacationing up north among the Hyperboreans. There is also some obscure testimony that Dionysos was at Delphi before Apollon, perhaps even identified with Python, the serpent Apollon kills (for Python, see OH 34.3n; for the identification of Dionysos and Python, see Fontenrose 1959, pp. 374–379). For more information on the worship of Dionysos at Delphi, see West 1983, pp. 150–152, and Larson 2007, pp. 137–138; cf. also OH 79.7–10n. Our hymn does not appear to refer explicitly to the Delphic Liknites, but for the sleeping Dionysos, see OH 53.2–3+i. The theme of birth continues in this hymn. It also adds the notion of vegetation (“blossoming” in line 2), which is further developed in some of the following hymns, thus highlighting Dionysos' connection with plant-life (see further OH 50i). There is no explicit mention of a ritual, but the name itself implies one, and it can easily be imagined that at this stage of the rite a winnowing-basket was brought in and/or its contents revealed (see OH 47i).

2–3: The Nymphs rear Dionysos already in Homer (Iliad 6.132) and are found throughout the collection in this capacity (see OH 30.8n). Apollonios of Rhodes recounts that a specific nymph, Makris, received the infant Dionysos (Argonautika 4.540 and 1131–1140). For other nurslings of nymphs, see OH 51.3n. Hipta, too, is called the “nurse of Bacchos” (OH 49.1), while sometimes it is his aunt Ino, among others, who rears the child after her sister perishes (see OH 44i). Nysa is the name of a number of mountains in Asia Minor, and it is where Dionysos is often said to have been reared by the Nymphs; see the two shorter Homeric hymns to Dionysos (1.6–9, where Nysa is situated in Egypt [cf. Herodotos 2.146.2]) and 26.3–9, as well as Apollodoros 3.4.3 and OH 51.15. Its appearance here stresses Dionysos' Eastern associations, as do Sabazios and Hipta, the addressees of the two hymns after the next, respectively; note, too, that a winnowing basket seems to have been a part of Sabazios' mysteries, at least in Athens (see OH 48i). In ancient etymologies Nysa was used to explain Dionysos' name (for a somewhat technical discussion, see West 1978, pp. 373–375, with further references). The Homeric Hymn to Demeter locates the abduction of Persephone in the Nysian field (2.17) but gives no indication where this field might be in the world. The mention of Aphrodite suggests an identification with Adonis; see further note to lines 6–7.

4 quiver in the dance: For Dionysos as a dancing god, see OH 45.7n and OH 52i.

5: Compare the short Homeric Hymn to Dionysos (no. 26) and see OH 51.15–16n.

6–7: Persephone is often the mother of Dionysos in Orphic mythology, but here she is the ultimate nurse of the child Dionysos, just as she is the nurse of Aphrodite's son Adonis (compare line 3 and see OH 56i). This would seem to contradict other hymns in the collection where she is explicitly the mother of Dionysos (e.g., OH 30.6–7), and it is possible that we have a vague reference to a tradition that retained Semele as the conventional mother of Dionysos and worked in Persephone as his most important nurse. For the problem of reconciling the birth of Dionysos from both Semele and Persephone in Orphism, see OH 30.2n and OH 44i.

7 loved by the deathless gods: The manuscripts have “feared” instead of “loved,” which is odd since Dionysos quickly became an accepted member of the Olympic pantheon (e.g., for fetching Hephaistos; see OH 66i). If “feared” should be retained, perhaps comparable is Alexander's mother, Olympias, who scared men with tamed snakes coming out of winnowing-baskets (Plutarch Alexander 2.9); compare Pan's birth (OH 11i). On the other hand, this idea of fear might just be a generic reference to the kind of horror Dionysos can effect (as at the end of Euripides' Bacchae); compare the “bloody swords” and “wrathful to the extreme” in OH 45.3 and 5.

47. To Perikionios

This hymn, like the previous one, is addressed to Dionysos in one of his particular ritual manifestations, albeit one rather obscure to us. “Perikionios” means “twined round the pillar,” and the only reference to this title comes from a scholiast to Euripides Phoenician Women 651, who cites the late third- or early second-century historian Mnaseas (fragment 18). The brief notice states that after the palace of Kadmos had been blasted by Zeus' lightning, ivy enveloped it to protect the infant therein; thus Dionysos was called Perikionios among the Thebans. Our poet might very well have had something like this in mind, especially if it is Dionysos who causes the ivy to cover the palace in the original myth (cf. line 2). It is possible that some confusion has occurred; our composer might have been influenced inadvertently by the story of Dionysos and the pirates, where as part of his epiphany ivy covers the sail and mast of their ship

(Homeric Hymn to Dionysos 7.38–42). The far distance of our cult from Thebes could have facilitated such a misunderstanding. Perhaps related is Pausanias’ account of the Thebans’ claim that after Semele had been struck by the thunderbolt, a log fell down from heaven and that subsequently a certain Polydoros (Semele’s brother in some sources) decked it out in bronze and called it Dionysos Kadmeios (9.12.3). This is Theban cult, but a number of Athenian vase paintings show a pole or column outdoors on which is affixed a mask of Dionysos (bearded) with other accoutrements (e.g., Boardman 1989, pl. 24). There are scenes of women around it handling wine or dancing wildly (sometimes with satyrs); see Larson 2007, p. 135. One in particular might have some (albeit indirect) relevance for our collection. On one side the mask of Dionysos lies in a liknon among ivy with two women standing around, one carrying a basket of fruit, the other a wine decanter (see Boardman 1989, pl. 233). This probably represents the stage before the mask is ritually affixed to the column. It is perhaps not a coincidence, then, that this hymn follows the one addressed to Dionysos Liknites and part of the rite performed by our initiates might have consisted of a mask of Dionysos being carried to a column, accompanied by the initiates’ singing the previous hymn to Liknites, and then the incense offering being given as this hymn was sung. That is not to say that our cult had preserved a centuries-old form of worship unchanged. It is more likely that certain types of Dionysian worship were adopted and adapted in Orphic (and other) circles (compare the notion of the bricoleur in Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 70–71 and passim; cf. also OH 4i). It is also a possibility that a rite might have been invented or an older one altered in later times on the basis of literary sources (see note to line 5) or under the influence of a local indigenous cult through an identification with a Hellenic divinity. Regardless of how the rite came to be and what exactly it entailed, it is difficult to see why a hymn to such an obscure figure as Dionysos Perikionios might have been composed for our collection unless it had some sort of immediate ritual significance for the cult.

1: For Dionysos as wine god, see OH 50i.

5: Who is “everyone” and why were they tied up? The hymn seems to refer to a single specific event, and up to this point the one that makes the most sense is the first “birth” of Dionysos at the death of Semele. Imprisonment, however, is not part of that story. Another possibility is suggested by a comparison to Euripides Bacchae. While there is no explicit connection in terms of language, and while Euripides mentions the palace of Pentheus and not Kadmos, nonetheless in the play Dionysos first causes an earthquake and then sets his mother’s grave on fire with lightning bolts (576–603). The latter detail is certainly an explicit allusion to Dionysos’ birth, the legitimacy of which is called in question at the outset of the play. Afterward we find out how Dionysos tricked Pentheus in order to escape his earlier imprisonment

(604–641). Our poet seems to have grafted some literary antecedents to the particular ritual act that this hymn accompanies. The vivid details stir the imagination of the participants. In essence, the performance of this hymn recreates a mythic scenario, composed of the birth of Dionysos (compare the ritual of the table mentioned in OH 44.6–9+n) and aspects of his epiphanies found in previous literature. The “everyone” then would be the initiates, and the “bonds” a metaphor for their previous uninitiated life. Dionysos, a deity of transitional states (see OH 30i), is often connected with freedom and release (see OH 50i); indeed, the Romans called him Liber (“the free one”).

48. To Sabazios

Sabazios was a Phrygian god. His worship is first attested to have reached Greece by the end of the fifth century. Aristophanes mentions him in a number of contexts. Two guards attribute their sleepiness to him, probably because of intoxication (Wasps 9–10). His mysteries are mentioned in the context of female ecstatic worship (Lysistrata 387–390), and he is mentioned alongside Kybele in a list of gods related to birds (Birds 873–875). One fragment, from the play Seasons, calls him Phrygian and a player of the aulos (fragment 578), an instrument particularly connected to Dionysian ecstatic worship. Demosthenes gives us some insight into the practice of his cult in fourth-century Athens, although we need to take his account with a grain of salt because he is trying to smear his rival Aeschines (18.259–260; see also Orphic fragment 577). While Sabazios is not explicitly named as the god of this cult, the latter is invoked with the cry “euoi, Saboi,” and Strabo explicitly links the cult to Sabazios and Kybele (10.3.18). There are a number of Dionysian elements present: ivy, winnowing-basket (see OH 46.2–3n), fawn-skins, ecstatic dancing and singing. Initiations are mentioned, and one element that stands out is the handling of live snakes (also an element in some Dionysian cults; see also OH 46.7n). Sabazios’ name appears in Orphic contexts, although he is not attested in any of the fragments attributed to Orpheus. He is identified with Dionysos as the son of Zeus and Persephone (Diodorus Siculus 4.4.1), and Clement of Alexandria mentions his mysteries in the context of Zeus mating with Persephone in the form of a snake (Protrepticus 2.16.2). For the possible influence of Sabazios’ worship on this Orphic genealogy, see West, 1983, pp. 97 and 110. However, the importance of Sabazios in Asia Minor also allowed his identification with Zeus, as in our hymn, which retains the Dionysian connection by making Sabazios the father of Dionysos (but see OH 49.2n); interestingly enough, the historian Mnaseas called Sabazaios the son of Dionysos (fragment 36). Among the four inscriptions dedicated to “mother Hipta,” Sabazios-Zeus is mentioned in three of them (see OH 49i). This hymn fits the birth theme that is prominent in this central Dionysian group (see OH 44i) and, with the following hymn, forms a male-female pairing, a familiar pattern in the collection (see OH 14.8–9n). That two divinities from Phrygia in Asia Minor are given such a prominent position is a strong indication that our cult was also located in this region.

3 Eiraphiotes: Dionysos is also called this name in the Homeric Hymn to Dionysos 1.17 and in some Orphic accounts of his birth from Zeus’ thigh; see Orphic fragment 328. Of the etymological explanations for this name given in antiquity, most relevant is the one that derives it from the verb meaning “sew” and it thus might be rendered as “the one sewn up”; see OH 44i and OH 50.3n.

49. To Hipta

Hipta was an Asiatic mother goddess of whom very little is known. Proclus mentions her in connection with the Orphic version of Dionysos’ birth from Zeus’ thigh: she receives the child in a winnowing-basket wreathed with a snake and takes him to Kybele at Mount Ida (see OH 46i). This myth—or a similar one—might be behind Strabo’s notice that Sabazios-Dionysos is “in some way the child of Mother” (10.3.15): the qualification “in some way” suggests something along the lines of a nurse or adopted mother. The only other certain instances of Hipta’s name come from four inscriptions found in an area not too distant from Mount Tmolos in Lydia; see Morand 2001, pp. 177–181. On three of these inscriptions Sabazios-Zeus is also mentioned (see OH 48i). This pairing is mirrored in the placement of this hymn after the one to Sabazios. Hipta is addressed as “Mother” in all four, which strongly suggests an identification with Kybele; compare the vase painting mentioned in OH 46i. Such an identification might be intended in our hymn, since she is called “chthonic mother” (line 4) and connected with Mount Ida in Phrygia and Mount Tmolos (see OH 27i). That Proclus distinguishes between Hipta and Mother does not entail their separation in our collection; he might have had a different version of the story in mind, or tried to rationally reconcile two slightly different ones. Indeed, Strabo might have called Hipta by the more familiar “Mother” in his report.

2 Sabos: An alternate name to Sabazios. The mysteries mentioned here are coordinated with the “dances of Iacchos” in line 3. Since Iacchos can be another name for Dionysos (see OH 42.4n), it would seem that Sabos is being identified with Dionysos, contrary to OH 48.1–3. It is possible, of course, that our poet is distinguishing each name to refer to a different entity or at least taking advantage of the different names to intentionally blur lines. Mise is described as taking part in Phrygian mysteries with Mother; see OH 42.6.

50. To Lysios Lenaios

This hymn is dedicated to Dionysos under two epithets. The first one, “Lysios,” means “he that frees, he that sets loose, the redeemer.” The notion of freedom from restraint, whether this restraint be physical, social, or spiritual, was an essential part of the religious conception of Dionysos. Insofar as he is a god of transitions, he “loosens” the moorings that tie an individual to any particular fixity; see OH 30i. Myth reflects this particular trait: Dionysos cannot be bound (e.g., Homeric Hymn to Dionysos 7.13–15), and he can free others from their bonds (e.g., Euripides Bacchae 443–450); see also OH 47.5+n. Lysios was a cult title of Dionysos (see Pausanias 2.2.6–7, 2.7.5–6, and 9.16.6), found also at OH 52.2. It is used as an epithet at OH 42.4 (“redeeming”) as well as in lines 2 and 8 of this hymn. In Orphic contexts, Dionysos is said to be able to release one from madness and other suffering (see OH 53i) and even free an initiate from the guilt inherited from his murder at the hands of the Titans (Bacchic gold tablets no. 26a and b; see also Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 132 and 147). Dionysos, more so than any of the other divinities in the collection, is the god that saves. Our poet, however, has evidently opted for a more limited view of Lysios, the one joined with the idea of the freedom of restraint as induced by intoxication. The second epithet, Lenaios, makes this clear, as it functions to limit the preceding Lysios. The word means “of the wine-press” (Greek “lēnos”; see Diodorus Siculus 3.63.4). It was a cult title of Dionysos at Athens and connected with the Lenaia festival, which was a celebration that took place every January. The Lenaia became an official venue for the performance of comedy and then eventually tragedy in the second half of the fifth century, although it was not as prestigious as the Greater Dionysia. We know very little about this festival. Of particular relevance is that officials from the Eleusinian Mysteries were involved in the procession and that part of the ritual involved the worshippers calling on the god as “son of Semele, Iacchos, giver of wealth” (for Iacchos, see OH 42.4n). While the name itself would seem to suggest this festival revolved around wine, modern scholars have favored a different interpretation that sees the name Lenaia as being derived from “lēnai,” another word for maenads (see OH 52i). And this etymology might very well have been on the mind of our initiates, for the name of the festival occurs at OH 54.9 in a clearly maenadic context (cf. line 8 of this hymn, which contains maenadic imagery). For more on the Lenaia, see Pickard-Cambridge 1988, pp. 25–42, and Larson 2007, pp. 134–135. Our hymn, however, focuses on Dionysos as the god of wine and its effects: the release from cares, the happiness it brings, and the ever-present danger of disorderly conduct. This ambiguity of the power of wine is seen in the story of Ikarios. When Dionysos comes to Attika, he is received hospitably by this man. In gratitude, Dionysos teaches him the secrets of making wine. Ikarios shares the fruits of his labor with some shepherds one night, who, later believing to have been poisoned, kill him (see Apollodoros 3.14.7). Normally, though, wine was seen as a beneficial gift the god gives to human beings as a temporary respite from their daily existence (e.g., Hesiod Works and Days 614 and Euripides Bacchae 280–282; see also OH 30i). Dionysos is often depicted in the iconography himself in the act of drinking or carrying the necessary accoutrements, usually accompanied by satyrs and/or maenads (e.g., Boardman 1975, pll. 6, 110, 256, and 343). He is intimately connected with the symposium and revelry. Wine can be thought of as the god himself (see Euripides Bacchae 284–285), who, when ingested, possesses the worshipper (enthousiasmos) and effects a state of ekstasis (see OH 30i).

This hymn continues the theme of Dionysos’ birth (lines 1 and 3), and, as with previous hymns in this grouping (see OH 44i), contains a reference to a specific Dionysian cult. The connection with vegetation, introduced with OH 46.2, is understandably strong here (lines 2, 4, 6, 10), and Dionysos seems to be imagined as the grape-vine itself in line 5 (see also OH 30.4–5 and cf. OH 56i). There is much overlap with OH 52, both in linguistic and iconographic terms.

1 two mothers: For the convoluted references to Dionysos’ births in the collection, see OH 30.2n.

2 unforgettable seed, many-named: Comparably invoked are Protogonos (OH 6.4), an Orphic figure that was sometimes identified with Dionysos (see OH 6.3n+i), and Mise (OH 42.2), who appears to be a female form of Dionysos and who also receives the epithet “many-named” alongside “unforgettable seed” in the same metrical position. Dionysos is again called “many-named” at OH 45.2 and OH 52.1 (and see note), and it is particularly apt in this grouping where he is invoked as Bacchos (OH 44–54 passim, i.e., the entire group), Bassareus/Bassaros (OH 45.2 and OH 52.2), Liknites (OH 46.1 and OH 52.3), Perikionios (OH 47.1), Eiraphiotes (OH 48.3), Iacchos (OH 49.3), Lysios and Lenaïos (OH 50 and OH 52.2), the God of Trienneial Feasts (OH 45 and OH 52), Eubouleus (OH 52.4), Erikepaios (OH 52.6), the God of Annual Feasts (OH 53), and perhaps Sabos (see OH 49.2+n).

3 born of secrecy: This refers to Dionysos’ birth from the thigh of Zeus (cf. Homeric Hymn to Dionysos 1.7); see OH 44i. He is the “secret offspring of Zeus” at OH 52.5; see also Supplementum Hellenisticum 276.9 (Kallimakhos). For secrecy in mystery cults, see OH 30.3n.

5 many-shaped god, you burst forth from the earth: Although many entities in the collection are described as having many shapes or forms, it is particularly apt of Dionysos, a god whose fluid nature resists any form of permanence (see OH 30i). In addition to adopting various mortal disguises (e.g., as his own priest in Euripides Bacchae), he can also appear as an animal, such as a bull (see OH 30.3–4+n), goat, and lion (Homeric Hymn to Dionysos 7.44). In this line he even seems to be identified with the grape-vine itself. Compare lines 4 and 10, where he is the one who yields the sweet fruit, and see further OH 30.5+n, OH 51.3n, and OH 53.8–10+i. The same effect of blending god and object is found in the hymn to Persephone (see OH 29.12–14+n); see further OH 56i and OH 67.5+n. For the many forms of Protogonos, see OH 6i.

8: For the thyrsos, see OH 45.5+n; for madness and the revel, see OH 52.7–8n.

51. To the Nymphs

The Greek word “numphē” generally refers to a young woman, either of marriageable age or newly-wed (see OH 71.1n), but it also signifies any of a variety of minor female deities of nature. Nymphs were connected with a number of geographical features: forests, trees, mountains, springs, and meadows (Odyssey 6.122–124, Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.97–99). Groups often are called by specific names that reflect their topographical associations. Thus Dryads are nymphs of the trees (Greek “drus”), Oreads are nymphs of the mountains (Greek “oros”), Naiads are nymphs of the springs (from the Greek verb “naō,” “I flow”), and so forth; see also notes to lines 12 and 14. Nymphs are referred to as the daughters of Zeus by early poets (e.g., Iliad 6.420, Hesiod fragment 304, Alkaïos fragment 343). The Ash Tree Nymphs, on the other hand, are born from the blood that drips from the severed genitals of Sky (Hesiod Theogony 183–187). Hesiod also gives the mountain nymphs a different genealogy, making them the sisters of the Kouretes and satyrs (see OH 31i and OH 54i). The Nereids and Okeanids (see line 1 and note), both pluralities of young women connected with natural features, could also be construed as nymphs. Our hymn identifies them specifically with the Okeanids at first but subtly widens the scope to include their traditional venues of woods, mountains, and meadows while stressing their connection with water (see note to lines 15–16). Rustic and pastoral settings away from civilization are their domain. Caves and grottos are favorite haunts. They are found running with Artemis, frolicking with Hermes and Pan (see note to line 8), or sporting with Eros, Aphrodite, and Dionysos (see OH 58.3n). They also are part of the Dionysian thiasos (see OH 54.6), and in some accounts they are the ones who raise the infant Dionysos after the death of Semele, as here (see line 3 and note). This last detail integrates the hymn in the series that focuses on Dionysos’ birth (see OH 44i). We capitalize “Nymphs” when they refer to this particular grouping.

Nymphs were widely worshipped in antiquity, almost always tied to a particular locale. Odysseus kisses the ground on his return to Ithaka and prays to the Naiads whose sacred cave is nearby (Odyssey 13.345–360). A famous cave to the nymphs and Pan on Mount Parnassos, the Korykian Cave, gained Panhellenic importance due to its proximity to Delphi. Any feature of the land could become a place to worship a nymph or group of nymphs. For more details on their cults, see Larson 2007, pp. 153–155. Nymphs were known to kidnap men that caught their fancy from time to time, such as Herakles’ friend Hylas (Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 1.1207–1239) and Hermaphroditos (Ovid Metamorphoses 4.285–388), a belief that survives in modern-day Greek folklore.

1: The Okeanids are the daughters of Okeanos and Tethys; see OH 83i and OH 22i, respectively. They may have been identified with the Nereids with whom they are sometimes confused; see OH 24.9–11n.

3 nurses of Bacchos: See OH 30.8n and OH 46.2–3n. Nymphs often were viewed as nurturers of the young, similar to their mistress Artemis, and Dionysos is not the only baby they rear. Aphrodite announces that they will raise her child Aineias until he reaches adolescence (Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.256–275); the chorus in Sophokles Oedipus Tyrannus fancifully speculate whether Oedipus was born from a nymph and either Pan, Apollon, Hermes, or Dionysos (1099–1109); and Zeus was nursed by nymphs (Kallimakhos Hymn to Zeus 32–48), as was Hermaphroditos (see the introduction to this hymn). That they are both the nurses of Dionysos and the ones who “nurture” the fruits (line 4) might indicate an identification between Dionysos and vegetation, as apparently at OH 50.5 (see note there and OH 53i).

4 you haunt meadows: When Persephone was abducted by Hades, she was picking flowers in a meadow with the Okeanids; see Homeric Hymn to Demeter 2.1–8 and 2.414–425. This meadow is sometimes located in Nysa (see OH 46.2–3n). For chthonic associations of meadows, see OH 18.2n.

8 Pan: The nymphs are often found in connection with Pan (e.g., Homeric Hymn to Pan 19.19–27). They are mentioned together at OH O.15. See also OH 11.9+n.

12 herds of goats: Compare Odyssey 9.154–155, where Odysseus believes that the nymphs have sent him and his men goats. Like Hermes, nymphs were believed capable of increasing the fertility of herds. This is presumably the reason why the faithful swineherd Eumaios offers a portion of pork to the nymphs and Hermes (Odyssey 14.435–436). The nymphs known as the Epimeliads (from Greek “mēlon,” “sheep”) probably were thought to increase flocks of sheep (Pausanias 8.4.2).

14 Hamadryad: A tree nymph (Dryad) whose life is coextensive with that of the tree in which she dwells (Greek “hama,” “together with”). Their appearance in myth is particularly tied to stories of an impious woodsman cutting down the tree, thus killing the nymph as well. See Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite (cited in the note to line

3), Pindar fragment 165, Kallimakhos Hymn to Delos 79–85, Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 2.475–483, and Ovid Metamorphoses 8.738–878.

15–16: For Nysa, see note to line 4 above. By “frenzied,” it is suggested that the Nymphs are maenads (see OH 52i), as at OH 53.2; cf. Iliad 6.130–137, Pindar fragment 70b.12–14, and the chorus to Euripides’ Bacchae. Deo is another name for Demeter (see OH 40.1n). She and Dionysos are joined together here in their capacities as divinities of grain and vegetation respectively, both of which require water for growth. This involves the Nymphs, since they are explicitly and repeatedly connected with water in this hymn. They are Okeanids (line 1), “clothed in dew” (line 6), and “water-loving” (line 14), they “frequent springs” (line 6), and they are asked to “pour streams of pure rain” (line 18). They are chthonic (line 3) not only because of their fertility associations but also because the sources of rivers, springs, and lakes are underground (compare line 2). Their description in line 9 equally applies to mountain streams, and that they find pleasure in cold (line 13) probably refers to their love of fresh, cold bodies of water. In the Lesser Krater, attributed to Orpheus, nymphs are actually equated with water (Orphic fragment 413.2). Their liquid nature makes them fit companions of Dionysos (see OH 30i).

52. To the God of Triennial Feasts

This hymn is the first of a group of three that bring to a close the Dionysian, cultic section of the Hymns. The previous three hymns dedicated to Dionysos (OH 46, 47, 50) call on the god under specific cult titles. The titles of this hymn and the following two, in contrast, refer to general characteristics of cult rather than any specific one. “Triennial” refers to a celebration every two years (the ancient Greeks counted inclusively). While there were a number of festivals that occurred biennially (e.g., the Isthmian Games and Nemean Games), it appears that a large number of such celebrations were devoted to Dionysos, particularly maenadic ones, e.g., that of the Thyiads (Pausanias 10.4.3; see also Euripides Bacchae 133, Diodorus Siculus 4.3.2–3, Larson 2007, pp. 127–128, and further OH 46i). This hymn also follows the trend, as it primarily depicts the kind of processions that are typically performed by maenads (sometimes with satyrs; see OH 54i). While many of the traditional trappings of maenadic processions appear intermittently in the other Dionysian hymns of the collection, nearly all of them are mentioned here. The worshippers proceed at night, guided by torchlight (see OH 9.3n). They brandish thyrsi (see OH 45.5n) and wear fawn-skins. Madness seeps into them along with the god. Vigorous movement leading to wild dancing and singing creates a raucous revel (see note to lines 7–8). The ivy-wreathed group, the thiasos, heads to the mountains, where animals are ripped apart (sparagmos; see OH 11.9n, OH 30.5n, and OH 45.5n) and the raw flesh devoured (ōmophagia; see line 7 and note); other wondrous works, such as causing milk and wine to spring from the ground and the handling of snakes, are performed by the frenzied. To what extent this ideal reflects real practice and to what extent it is the result of the powerful images Euripides evokes in his Bacchae is something that is debated by scholars (see Larson 2007, pp. 136–137, with further references). Whatever the case may be, by the time our collection had been composed, such elements had become standard indications of ecstatic Dionysian worship and iconography, so much so that their appearance in the Hymns does not imply that the initiates were female, any more than the hymn to Eleusinian Demeter entails the group was located at Eleusis (and note that Kadmos and Teiresias dress up as maenads in Euripides Bacchae 169–214; cf. further Herodotos 4.79 and OH 54i). It is a routine rhetorical strategy in hymns to remind the gods of their favorite haunts and activities. This particular one focuses on Dionysos as the leader of processions. The god is often depicted in literature and art as participating in his own rituals among his worshippers (e.g., Euripides Bacchae 135–167; see also OH 53.6). In the Hymns, a number of female divinities are portrayed as maenads or described with maenadic imagery (see OH 1.3n), and Themis in her hymn founds maenadic rites (see OH 79.7–10+n). Such participation on the part of the gods helps blur the line between worshipped and worshipper, bringing the initiates into a more intimate contact with the powers they invoke (see OH 30i). There may have been a(nother) torch-lit procession at this point of the ritual (albeit probably not to a mountain), and Dionysos and his thiasos, upon finding such kindred spirits engaged in mimetic performances, would be more disposed to join the initiates in the ceremony. Triennial celebrations are mentioned at OH 30.5, OH 44.7, OH 53.4–5, and OH 54.3; see also Homeric Hymn to Dionysos 1.11.

1 many-named: See OH 50.2n; as in that hymn, so, too, here Dionysos is addressed by many names.

2 bull-horned, ... Lysios, Lenaios: For Dionysos and bulls, see OH 30.3–4n. The cult titles Lysios and Lenaios, the titles under which OH 50 is dedicated to Dionysos, are repeated here, as well as that of Liknites in line 3, to whom OH 46 is addressed.

2–3 Nysian ... conceived in fire. / Nourished in the thigh: These lines reflect the traditional myth of Dionysos’ birth, for which see OH 30.2n and OH 44i. “Nourished in the thigh” alludes to that part of the story when Zeus, having saved the fetus after the immolation of Semele, sews him into his thigh to hide him from Hera; hence, he is the “secret offspring of Zeus” in line 5 (see also OH 48.3n and OH 50.3n). For Nysa, see OH 46.2–3n.

4 thyrsos-shaking Eubouleus: For the thyrsos, see OH 45.5n; for Eubouleus, see OH 30.6n.

5 nature three-fold: It is not entirely clear what is meant by this. At OH 30.2, Dionysos is called “two-natured, thrice-born” (and see note). The three natures indicated here might refer to those births in that he has three different “mothers”: Semele, Persephone, and the thigh of Zeus. On the other hand, since Dionysos was devoured by the Titans and thereby had contact with them, it is possible that his nature is threefold: human through Semele, Titanic through the Titans, and Olympian through Zeus (cf. the composite nature of human beings in Orphic anthropogonies, summarized and discussed in Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 85–90). Another possibility is that Dionysos’ nature can be seen to embody the bestial, the human, and the divine. As with the contradictory references to Dionysos’ birth throughout the collection, the ambiguity might be intentional.

6: “Primeval” is the translation of “prōtogone,” which naturally recalls the Orphic entity known as Protogonos, who also shares with Dionysos the sobriquets Erikepaïos, Eubouleus, and Bromios; see OH 6.4n+i. Through this identity, Dionysos can rightly be called both the “father and son of the gods.”

7 raw flesh: See the introduction to this hymn and OH 30.5+n.

7–8: Madness is a running motif throughout the collection, as many divinities are described as bringing it and/or being able to cure it, particularly those beings that are related to ecstatic cults, with the concomitant belief that the worshipper becomes possessed by the divinity in question (see OH 71.11n). Madness thus also finds expression in the wild abandon to song and dance in the revel; see OH 27.11n and OH 50.8. This is the state of ekstasis that results from enthousiasmos (see OH 30i), and something that is not limited to Dionysos alone (see OH 11i and OH 27i). Dionysos’ connection with madness was probably facilitated by his connection with wine and intoxication (see OH 50i). As often with the case of this god, the normal order in the world is subverted (cf. its use to great effect as a running motif in Euripides Bacchae) and leads to paradox; here, madness is transformed into lucidity (see also OH 54.11). For Dionysos as a dancing god, see OH 45.7+n.

10 annual feasts: This looks ahead to the title of the next hymn, where the triennial celebration is reciprocally mentioned in line 5.

11 Paian: This is normally a name for Apollon; see OH 34.1n; for Dionysos’ worship at Delphi, see OH 46i.

53. To the God of Annual Feasts

This is the last hymn to Dionysos in the collection, and it is closely related to the previous one (OH 52i). There, the emphasis is on maenadism. We find this theme here as well in lines 6–7, which serves as a bridge to the following hymn, but Dionysos is first and foremost presented as a god of vegetation, whose “awakening” in the spring heralds the return of plant-life after the winter; cf. the Thyiads at Delphi who wake Dionysos Liknites; see OH 46i. Plutarch reports a similar practice among the Phrygians and Paphlagonians, who believed a god was asleep in the winter, and he further says that the Phrygians awakened him in the summer by “Bacchizing” (De Iside et Osiride 378f). As our group of initiates might have been active in Phrygia, it is just possible that Plutarch is referring to the local rite that was made “Orphic” by the group (less likely the ritual itself). This is the only place in the collection where Dionysos is called “chthonic” (line 1), and his association with the underworld, where he “sleeps,” is indicated by the “sacred halls of Persephone” (line 3). The initiates invoke him with “fruity” terms (lines 8–10), and elsewhere in the collection he appears to be identified with the fruit itself (see OH 50.5+n). He is therefore much like Adonis and Persephone (see OH 56i and OH 41i, respectively), whose time split between the upper and lower worlds was interpreted as the cause of the seasons (and cf. line 7 of this hymn). In Orphic fragment 350, someone is foretelling Dionysos of his future worship in annual rites and his ability to free mortals from suffering and madness; see West 1983, pp. 99–100, for translation and brief discussion, and further OH 71.11n.

4 pure: For the importance of ritual purity, see OH 30.4n.

4–5 every third year. / ... triennial revel: See OH 52i, which also refers to annual feasts in line 10.

6 he sings a hymn: For Dionysos as participant in his own worship, see OH 30i and OH 50i.

8 horned: For the horned god, see OH 30.3–4+n.

54. To Silenos Satyros and the Bacchae

This is the last hymn of the group whose overriding theme is Dionysian cult. It addresses the figure Silenos and mentions the other traditional members of the mythical Dionysian thiasos, the silens/satyrs and the Bacchae (or maenads); for the Bacchae, see OH 52i. The silens and satyrs were probably originally distinct, but very early merged into one group and their names are used interchangeably. The first mention of silens is on the François Vase (see Boardman 1991, pp. 33–34 and pl. 46), and satyrs are first mentioned by Hesiod (fragment 123, preserved at Strabo 10.3.19; see OH 51i). As line 7 of this hymn tells us, they are half-man, half-beast. Specifically, they are for the most part human, with equine tails and ears, snub noses, and a receding hairline; their bodies can be covered with hair, and early vase paintings sometimes give them hooves instead of feet. They are often shown ithyphallic. Sometimes they are found with hircine features. These are creatures of the wild, and they pursue quite a hedonistic lifestyle, spending their days laughing, drinking, dancing, making music, and chasing after nymphs (see, e.g., Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.262–263). While originally independent of Dionysos, they became part of his retinue at an early date. They were insanely popular on vase paintings; see, for example, Hedreen’s 1992 book-length study (which only treats the Archaic period!). In myth, they play no significant role outside of being in the company of Dionysos (e.g., the story of the return of Hephaistos; see OH 66i). We find them as the chorus of a peculiar kind of drama, the satyr play, which was introduced with (or shortly after) Attic tragedy. In Classical times, a tragic poet would stage three tragedies followed by a satyr play at the Greater Dionysia. These performances were light-hearted affairs, aptly called “tragedy at play” by Demetrius (On Style 169). Despite the fact that the only extant satyr play is Euripides’ Kyklops, on the basis of this and numerous fragments we have some idea of the nature of this genre. Lissarrague neatly sums it up thus: “The recipe is as follows: take one myth, add the satyrs, and observe the results” (1990, p. 236). The chorus in a satyr play is led by Papposilenos (Granddaddy Silenos!), who is distinguished from the rest by being costumed as an old satyr, covered with white hair (as depicted on the Pronomos vase, which shows the actors at a rehearsal; see Boardman 1989, pp. 167–168 and pl. 323); he is the leader of the thiasos here as well (see line 6). Silenos occasionally plays a role in myth as a distinct individual. His most famous “exploit” is being found drunk in the garden of Midas, king of Phrygia. The king returns the lost satyr to Dionysos, who grants him a boon that turns into the famous “golden touch” (Ovid Metamorphoses 1.85–145). Another satyr, Marsyas, either invents the reed instrument known as the auloi or picks them up after Athene discards them (see OH 32i). He then challenges Apollon to a music contest in Phrygia, loses, and is flayed alive by the god (see Ovid Metamorphoses 11.146–193). In cult, too, the satyrs are completely dependent on their master, although Pausanias does mention a temple for Silenos at Elis and stresses it is completely independent from Dionysos (6.24.8). Male worshippers of Dionysian ecstatic rituals could apparently take the role of satyrs, as well as pans, as is attested by Plato (Laws 815c–d) and by early rituals involving masks (see Burkert 1985, pp. 103–104); see also OH 52i. Satyrs and Silenos himself seem to be entirely ignored in Orphism, maybe because their light-hearted nature did not fit well with the serious cosmic and eschatological themes found in the mysteries (but see note to line 10 below). Their appearance in our collection is due to their traditional association with Dionysos. As they are followers of Dionysos, so, too, their hymn follows his. It is possible that our initiates dressed up as satyrs and Bacchae (perhaps just for this part of the ritual); see also OH 45i and OH 52i.

1 foster father: On some vase paintings, Silenos receives the infant Dionysos from Hermes (see, e.g., Boardman 1989, p. 225 and pl. 126), and it seems that his rearing of Dionysos was mentioned in satyr play (alluded to in Euripides Kyklops 1–8; cf. Horace Ars Poetica 239 and the euhemerized account in Diodorus Siculus 4.4.3–4). In this respect, Silenos is similar to the centaur Kheiron, another horse-human hybrid, who often raises heroes.

3 triennial feasts: See note to line 9 and OH 52i.

5 wakeful reveler: This refers to the all-night character of ecstatic Dionysian worship. If the ritual in which the Hymns were performed took place at night, as it seems likely (see OH 3i and OH 78i), then Silenos would be a model for our initiates, who might be getting a little sleepy at this point! See also OH 85.9–10n.

6 Naiads: For this particular type of nymph, see OH 51i.

9 Lenaian: OH 50 is addressed to Lysios Lenaaios; see the introduction to that hymn.

10 revealing torch-lit rites: Silenos and the satyrs are sometimes portrayed as being among the first initiates in Dionysian mysteries (see, e.g., Euripides Bacchae 120–134). As in the opening address where Orpheus' initiation of Mousaios would have been felt to be paradigmatic of all future initiations, so, too, Silenos and company function as the mythic paradigm of passing down esoteric knowledge to new initiates; see further OH 76.7n. Despite their wild and unrestrained temperament, these creatures sometimes do display a divine wisdom. In some versions of the Midas story, Silenos is intentionally captured by the king who wishes to know his secrets (see Herodotos 8.138.3, who locates the story in Macedonia, and Pausanias 1.4.5; compare also Vergil's sixth eclogue). Alkibiades' long praise of Sokrates ironically plays on the satyrs' contradictory nature of surface chicanery and concealed knowledge (Plato Symposium 215a–222d), which fits well the context here of Silenos being a revealer of secret rites. The hybrid nature of these creatures in general, both physically and psychologically, makes them very suitable companions for their master Dionysos (see OH 30i).

11 finding calm in the revels: This paradoxical statement is very similar to what is expressed at OH 52.7–8 (and see note).

55. To Aphrodite

Aphrodite is the goddess of love, beauty, and sexual relations. For Homer, she was the daughter of Zeus and Dione (Iliad 5.370–417), a goddess sometimes considered a Titan, sometimes a nymph (see OH O.19n); her name is a feminine variation of Zeus. Hesiod gives another account, in which she is born after Kronos castrates his father Sky and tosses the severed genitals into the sea. They undergo a sort of foamy chemical reaction out of which Aphrodite is born (Theogony 188–206). Hesiod’s story teems with etymological explanations. Aphrodite is so called because she was born from foam (Greek “aphros”). She bears the names Kythereia because she came to the island Kythera; and the name Kyprogenes because she first came out of the sea on Kypros and so was “born on Kypros.” She also took on the epithet “fond of genitals” because of their role in her birth. When she rises out of the sea, the Seasons are there to clothe her and deck her out with all sorts of finery, a scene memorably portrayed in Botticelli’s painting The Birth of Venus (compare also the sixth Homeric hymn). In Hesiod’s version, then, Aphrodite is thus a cosmic power that antedates Zeus and the other Olympian gods. Orphic mythology accepted the Hesiodic version, although in at least one variant it is Zelos (Envy) and Apate (Deception), not the Seasons, that welcome the goddess out of the sea (Orphic fragment 189; see also OH 3.2n). The Orphics, however, also maintained that she (or a second Aphrodite) was the daughter of Zeus but that Zeus created her by ejaculating into the sea (Orphic fragment 260).

Aphrodite was connected with both the carnal and spiritual sides of love, and accordingly literature portrays many sides of her. The Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite (no. 5) opens with a grand description of her powers: even Zeus is under her sway, and only three goddesses—Artemis, Athene, and Hestia—are immune to her charms (5.1–44). When Hera seeks to seduce Zeus to distraction during the Trojan War, she borrows a magical piece of clothing from Aphrodite, a concrete manifestation of the love goddess’ abilities (Iliad 14.197–223). Aphrodite is raised to a cosmic principle of procreation, much like in our hymn, in Lucretius’ opening address to her (On the Nature of Things 1.1–49), and she is endowed with further philosophical embellishment in the Neoplatonist Proclus’ second hymn. Yet there is a comical side to this goddess as well. She is caught having an affair with Ares by her husband, Hephaistos, and the entangled lovers are displayed to the male gods, whereupon Apollon and Hermes engage in some playful banter (Odyssey 8.266–366). It should be kept in mind that the bard in the story who sings this tale does so to cheer up the sorrowing Odysseus. Apollonios of Rhodes shows her as a frustrated mother at wit’s end on how to handle her unruly child Eros (Argonautika 3.1–166). There is a nasty side to this divinity, too. Helen meekly acquiesces to Aphrodite’s demand to go to bed with Paris after the goddess ominously warns her not to disobey (Iliad 3.383–420). She unceasingly victimizes the mortal Psyche, first by asking Eros to make her fall in love with a monster; then, after Eros saves Psyche only to be betrayed by her, Aphrodite imposes a series of impossibly difficult tasks that eventually lead to Eros rescuing Psyche and a reconciliation with Aphrodite (Apuleius Metamorphoses or The Golden Ass 4.28–6.24). There is also something sinister lurking in Sappho’s depiction of the goddess, who can cause someone to fall in love even if they are unwilling (fragment 1.21–24). Love can be pleasant, wonderful, charming, exhilarating, frightening, and brutal—often all at the same time—and the stories of Aphrodite provide firm evidence that the Greeks were acutely aware of this complexity.

At Symposium 180d–181c, Plato sharply distinguishes two cult manifestations of the goddess, Aphrodite Ourania (Aphrodite the Heavenly or Born from Sky) and Aphrodite Pandemos (Aphrodite of All the People). The former, for him, represents the spiritual side of love, while the latter the physical. However, in actual cult practice this distinction is not observed. Indeed, Aphrodite Pandemos is found worshipped as a deity promoting civic harmony, the power of love to soothe civil discord and bring opposing sides together (see note to line 9). Her daughter, Harmonia, may be seen as a reflection of this (see OH 65i). Not surprisingly, Aphrodite is also worshipped in connection with marriage, particularly the producing of children. She also protects sailors. For more on Aphrodite and her role in cult, see Burkert 1985, pp. 152–156, and Larson 2007, pp. 114–125. She is found connected with other male gods in both myth and cult, in particular Hermes, Ares, and Hephaistos; see OH 57.3–5n, OH 65i, OH 66i, respectively. The significance of these pairings seems largely to consist of a harmonious unison of opposites (male/female, life/death, war/peace, beauty/ugliness). We also find her connected with Dionysos in cult (Pausanias 7.25.9) and in our hymn (lines 2 and 7; compare “maddening” in line 13, and also see OH 56i). As a goddess of beauty, she often consorts with other beautiful goddesses, such as the Seasons and Graces (see OH 43i and OH 60i, respectively).

The placement of this hymn resumes the series of major Olympian gods that had been interrupted by a long digression on divinities associated with Dionysos, and the resumption is facilitated by Aphrodite’s connection to him (see further OH 69i). The hymns to Adonis (OH 56), Eros (OH 58), and the Graces (OH 60) are grouped with her for obvious reasons. Chthonic Hermes (OH 57) is said to be her son in his hymn, while the Fates (OH 59) also appear to have been conceived as connected with Aphrodite, perhaps as her daughters (see note to line 3 and OH 59i), thus forming a triplet with Chthonic Hermes and Eros. OH 61–68 may also be considered part of the “Aphrodite” group; see OH 61i, OH 65i, and OH 68i.

1 heavenly, smiling Aphrodite, praised in many hymns: The first word of the hymn, “heavenly,” is one of the main cult titles of the goddess (Aphrodite Ourania). “Smiling” is a translation of the Greek “philommeidēs,” which literally means “fond of smiles.” The word, like the similar “philommēdēs” (“fond of genitals”), is a common epithet of the goddess, who is often portrayed as smiling. Aphrodite is indeed “praised in many hymns”: there are three Homeric hymns dedicated to her (nos. 5, 6, 10), two hymns by Proclus (nos. 2, 5), and literary pieces in the hymnic style, including Sappho fragments 1 and 2 and the opening of Lucretius’ On the Nature of Things. The reference to “many hymns” probably is first and foremost to the ubiquity of her worship through the identification with similar goddesses in other traditions and thus anticipates lines 17–19. This hymn, then, is imagined as following worthy precedents.

3 mother of Necessity: Necessity (Greek Anankē) is a divinity who plays a role in Orphic theogony. She mates with Time in the form of a winged serpent, and their children are Ether and Khaos (Orphic fragment 77, 110–113; see West 1983, pp. 70, 194–197, and 231 for more details). If “necessity” in the hymn to the Fates should be personified, then our poet would appear to have conceived them to be the daughters of Aphrodite (see OH 59.18n). Necessity is identified with Adrasteia in Orphism. As Adrasteia can sometimes be identified with Nemesis, the inevitability of Nemesis might also explain the position of OH 61–64 in the collection (see OH 61i). The idea of compulsion appears in the imagery of yoking (lines 4, 13, 14); compare also Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.33–43, Sappho fragment 1.21–24, and PGM 4.2934.

4–7: Aphrodite’s wide-ranging powers are expressed through their geographical extent over the sky, earth, and sea, a rhetorical strategy employed in describing the powers of other gods as well; of particular relevance here are the hymns to Rhea (OH 14.9–10) and the Mother of the Gods (OH 27.4–8); see further OH 10.14–16n. Eros is similarly described in his hymn, although his powers extend beneath the earth as well (OH 58.5–7). See also Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.2–6, Euripides Hippolytos 447–451, and Lucretius On the Nature of Things 1.1–27.

8 Erotes: A divinity may sometimes be conceived as a plurality, as for example Pan and Eileithyia (see OH 2i and Burkert 1985, pp. 170–171). Pindar also makes Aphrodite the mother of Erotes (fragment 122.4), and Proclus gives the group a Neoplatonic interpretation in his second hymn at line 3 (see van den Berg 2001, pp. 199–200).

9 Persuasion: Sometimes Persuasion is conceived as a separate goddess. She was worshipped together with Aphrodite at Athens (Pausanias 1.22.3). Sappho makes her the daughter of Aphrodite (fragment 200). In the decking out of Pandora, Persuasion joins the Graces in placing necklaces around her neck, while the Seasons crown her with a garland of spring flowers (Hesiod Works and Days 73–75). She is thus conceived as part of the traditional retinue of Aphrodite. One of the Okeanids is named Persuasion (Hesiod Theogony 349), and this might be the same Persuasion in the Pandora episode. In Orphic theogony, Eros and Persuasion are the parents of Hygeia (see OH 68i). Aphrodite's connection with persuasion is a function both of its utility in amatory pursuits as well as its benefits in forging a consensus in public affairs.

15–28: The second half of this poem, equal in length to the first half, is an extended invocation to the goddess to appear, and it includes a list of places where the goddess might be. It is typical of the hymnic style to attract the attention of the addressee by calling to mind their favored locales, which often have specific cultic importance. This is the significance of the mention of Kypros, one of her most important cult sites and traditionally the place where she first stepped onto land after she was born. The other locations broaden her associations. Olympos is mentioned first, as she is naturally conceived above all as a Greek goddess. This also places her in the sky, and the further mention of land and sea recalls the three realms over which Aphrodite was earlier said to have dominion (lines 4–7). Syria points to her connection with the Semitic goddess Astarte, already identified with Aphrodite by Herodotos (1.150), while Egypt alludes to Isis. Aphrodite is included in a long list of deities identified with Moon/Isis in Apuleius Metamorphoses or The Golden Ass 11.2 and 11.5, as well as an even longer list in the first hymn to Isis by Isidoros (line 24, and note that the Syrian Astarte appears in line 18).

20: Sappho imagines that the golden chariot of the goddess is pulled by sparrows (fragment 1.8–10), birds that were considered in antiquity to be particularly promiscuous.

56. To Adonis

Adonis is an old Near Eastern divinity of vegetation and fertility. His name is derived from the Semitic “adon” (“lord”), and he is a counterpart to the Babylonian Tammuz, who is loved by a fertility goddess (Ishtar), dies an untimely death, and is ritually lamented. Another similar figure is Attis, who is a lover of the great mother goddess Kybele; see OH 27i. The worship of Adonis seems to have come first to Kypros and from there to have spread to Greece. Therefore, not only his nature but also his earlier sojourn to Kypros explains his special connection with Aphrodite (see OH 55i; for her similarity with Ishtar, see Burkert 1985, p. 155). However, it appears that the Greeks, as they often did with foreign imports, adapted Adonis and his worship to their own mythological and religious framework. His Eastern connection is made clear by the various genealogies given by Apollodoros (3.13.3–4): his father is either Phoinix, Kinyras (a refugee from the East who became king of Kypros), or Theias, king of Assyria. He is the product of an incestuous union between a father and his daughter, named Myrrh or Smyrna, who is transformed into a myrrh tree out of which Adonis is born (see also Antoninus Liberalis 34 and Ovid Metamorphoses 10.298–518; note that the story in Ovid is narrated by Orpheus). Endowed with exquisite beauty, he catches the eye of Aphrodite herself and becomes her paramour. In one account, Aphrodite is already in love with Adonis as an infant. She places him in a chest and hands him over to Persephone for safekeeping. Persephone also becomes enamored of the child and later refuses to give him back to Aphrodite. They appeal to Zeus for a resolution. He decrees that Adonis must spend one third of the year with Persephone, another third with Aphrodite, and the remaining third with the goddess of his choice; he opts to spend this third with Aphrodite. Thus Adonis, like Persephone, spends part of his time in the land of death and the other part in the land of living, and, insofar as he is a god of vegetation, this tale corroborates the dying of plant life in the sweltering heat of the summer (see also OH 53i). The story is also reminiscent of the dispute between Hermes and Apollon in the longer Homeric Hymn to Hermes (no. 4): the younger half-sibling appropriating the property of the older one, their squabble, and the appeal to their father, Zeus. As a young man, Adonis becomes quite fond of hunting, which eventually leads to his death at the tusks of a wild boar. This boar is sometimes said to have been sent by a jealous Ares (or is Ares himself disguised) or Artemis.

Adonis was worshipped by women throughout the Greek world, who would ritually lament his death every year. Our earliest reference to the practice comes from Sappho (fragment 140), but we know about it chiefly as it was practiced at Athens in the Classical period. In the summer, seeds were sown in broken pots and taken to the roofs of homes after the plants sprouted. There these “Gardens of Adonis” were left to wither and die. The women loudly and expressively mourned the death of the god. They then laid out figures representing Adonis in a symbolic burial and afterward disposed of the “body” and the pots into the sea. For references and details of this practice, see Burkert 1985, pp. 176–177, and Larson 2007, p. 124. Theokritos devotes an entire idyll to an elaborate festival at Alexandria (Idyll 15), and Lucian mentions the worship of Adonis at Byblos, where the women at first mourn the dead Adonis and then celebrate his rebirth (On the Syrian Goddess 6–7). The bucolic poet Bion (ca. 100 BC) wrote a Lament for Adonis that blends myth with ritual content.

Our hymn alludes to this practice of lamenting Adonis in lines 2 and 6, and many of the traditional features of the myth of Adonis are incorporated. He is a hunter (line 7), and splits his time between life and death (lines 5, 10–11). He is repeatedly connected with vegetation: his hair is emphasized (lines 2 and 7), he is an “unwithering bloom” (line 4), the “spirit of growth” (line 6), and a “sweet blossom” (line 8). The emphasis, though, is not on his death but on his rebirth (line 10–11), as it seems to have been at Byblos. The similarities between Adonis and Dionysos have led to the identification of the two gods in this hymn. Just like Dionysos, Adonis has the epithet “many-named”

(cf. OH 42.2, OH 45.2, OH 50.2+n, OH 52.1), is called Eubouleus (cf. OH 29.8, OH 30.6+n, OH 42.2, OH 52.4), is both male and female (cf. OH 30.2+n, OH 42.4), and wears horns (cf. OH 30.3+n). They are both conceived as vegetation (see OH 50i+5n and compare to lines 6 and 11 of this hymn). Furthermore, Dionysos is the “nursling” of the Nymphs and Aphrodite elsewhere in the collection (see OH 46.2–3+n), while Adonis in this hymn is the son of Aphrodite (see note to lines 8–9). He is also the son of Persephone, just as Dionysos is (cf. OH 30.6–7 and OH 30.2–3n), although Dionysos is also said to be reared by Persephone (see OH 46.6–7+n), just as Adonis is. This identification is also attested by Plutarch, who mentions that some people consider Adonis to be Dionysos (Quaestiones conviviales 671b).

4 you vanish and then shine again: Very similar phrasing is used of Sun at OH 8.15.

It is perhaps worth noting that Proclus in his hymn to Sun says that some people identified this divinity with Adonis (1.26, and see van den Berg 2001, pp. 173–174). Interestingly enough, Phaethon, who is usually the child of Sun, is made the son of Kephalos and Dawn by Hesiod and then is snatched away by Aphrodite to be an official in her temple (Theogony 986–991). Hesiod describes Phaethon as “a man of god-like beauty” and “still in the tender blossom of luxuriant youth,” and it is not hard to see how in later times the myths of Phaethon and Adonis might have blended. Indeed, Apollodoros lists Phaethon as the great-great-grandfather of Adonis, and the full patrilineal genealogy runs Kephalos, Tithonos, Phaethon, Astynous, Sandokos, Kinyras, and Adonis (3.14.3; granted, he cites Hesiod as a source that Phoinix is the father of Adonis). It is therefore possible that our poet (and Proclus) is alluding to an identification that was made in a work now lost to us.

6 spirit of growth: Asklepios is also described as such; see OH 67.5+n.

8–9: An interesting twist to the usual genealogy—one, however, that keeps the theme of incest, insofar as Eros is the son of Aphrodite (see OH 55.8). That Persephone is also the mother of Adonis is probably intended as a metaphor based on the return of Adonis from the underworld every year, as well as allowing Adonis to be equated with Dionysos.

57. To Chthonic Hermes

The first hymn to Hermes already hinted at the god’s connection with the dead (OH 28.2), but this function has apparently taken a life of its own and achieved the status of a (quasi-)separate divinity in this hymn. Much like Hades can be called Chthonic Zeus, so here Chthonic Hermes is distinguished from Hermes, even though the two divinities are not kept entirely independent of one another (cf. also OH 73i). The role of Hermes as psukhopompos (guide of the souls) is well attested in the earliest Greek literature and is punned in the Greek on line 6 (“psukhais pompos,” translated as “the souls you bring”). In the Odyssey, the god shepherds the souls of the dead suitors to the underworld (24.1–14), and in the Homeric Hymn to Hermes, guiding the dead is listed among the god’s various functions (4.572). Hermes can also, when occasion calls for it, lead out from the land of the dead, as he does Persephone in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter (2.375–386). Hermes was also psukhopompos in Orphism (Orphic fragment 339), but it is curious that he is hardly mentioned in the extant sources and does not appear at all on the Bacchic gold tablets. The silence might very well be because his role is simply assumed. Perhaps, though, at least in some cases such as the gold tablets, the middleman might have been purposely left out in favor of the initiate’s soul proactively (with the help of the instructions) taking matters into its own hands (thus further differentiating the initiate from the uninitiated). Outside of Orphic cult, we find Hermes worshiped as Chthonic Hermes in connection with pouring libations to the dead; for details, see Burkert 1985, pp. 157–158, and Larson 2007, pp. 149–150. The hymn seems oddly placed, but the explicit mention of Tartaros, Aphrodite, and Dionysos (merged with Adonis in the previous hymn) appear to have been sufficient grounds for its inclusion among the Aphrodite group.

1 the road of no return: This is normally true, but mythology is replete with heroic and divine exceptions, one being Adonis as seen in the previous hymn. The sentiment that one cannot return from Hades is a commonplace in Greek literature; see, e.g., Anakreon PMG 395.

1 Kokytos: One of the rivers of the underworld, and where Melinoe was born; see OH 71.2+n.

3–5: The genealogy given here is unique in literature and quite different from the conventional one as expressed at OH 28.1 (Zeus and Maia). It is also curious to find Dionysos in particular as the father of Chthonic Hermes, since in literature and art Hermes is at times depicted as bringing the newly-born infant Dionysos to the nymphs of Nysa and/or Silenos (e.g., Apollodoros 3.4.3, Boardman 1989, pl. 126). Hermes and Aphrodite are often linked in cult (see Burkert 1985, pp. 220–221), but not as mother and son. The source and significance of this parentage of Chthonic Hermes remains a puzzle. In any event, this makes Persephone, who gives him his “high office” (line 9–10), his grandmother.

4 Paphian maiden: Paphos, a city on the island of Kypros, had one of the oldest and most famous cult centers of Aphrodite.

6 destined harbor: Maybe a reference to Kharon, the one who conveys the dead across a river to the underworld proper, if not a general metaphor for the land of the dead.

7–8: The wand of Hermes is one of his most prominent attributes. Its ability to lull to sleep and to awaken are already mentioned in Homer; in particular note Odyssey 24.2–5, where, after describing the powers of this wand, the poet shows Hermes leading the souls of the dead with it. In our text the powers of sleep merge with the powers of death; for the close connection of the two concepts in Greek thought, see OH 85i. It is not clear what is intended in these lines. It may refer to the Orphic belief that souls are reborn. Another possibility is that they refer to the initiate's expectations in the afterlife—that it is in fact the prerogative of Chthonic Hermes, as the agent of Persephone, to “awaken” those souls who have been put to “sleep” so that they may find their way to their special place in the underworld, as the Bacchic gold tablets describe.

58. To Eros

Eros, better known under his Latin name Cupid, has become a familiar figure in the Western literary and iconographical tradition. He is the playful winged and cherubic child, flitting around with his little bow and arrows, capriciously shooting the unwitting and causing them to fall desperately in love—ofttimes, alas, with tragic effect. The fanciful juxtaposition of great power with the even greater irresponsibility of a child betrays a profound psychological insight in the experience of love that first takes root in the earliest of the lyric poets; see the references in the note to line 3. Our hymn elects not to ignore this poetic conceit but having paid sufficient homage to it, quickly passes over to the other side of Eros, the cosmic force of love and attraction that is essential to the chain of copulations that underlies the anthropomorphizing tales of creation. This Eros is among the oldest divinities in Hesiod, coming after Khaos and coeval with Earth and Tartaros (Theogony 116–122), and Sappho offers a similarly ancient pedigree by making him the son of Earth and Sky (fragment 198). In Orphism, Eros is identified with Protogonos, another primeval figure; see OH 6i+5–7n, and compare the mock theogony in Aristophanes' Birds, where Eros' role is analogous to that of Protogonos in Orphism (see OH 6.2n). It is perhaps a different Eros that becomes the companion to Aphrodite after her birth (Orphic fragment 261; compare Hesiod Theogony 201–202), and the father of Hygeia (with Persuasion her mother; see Orphic fragment 262 and further OH 68i). However, in more conventional genealogies he is the son of Aphrodite, as he is in our collection (OH 55.8), while the father is variously said to be Zeus, Hermes, or Ares (if a father is even mentioned, which often is not the case). Another account, attributed to the semi-legendary Olen, claims that Eros was the son of Eileithyia, the goddess of childbirth (see OH 2i). This is mentioned by Pausanias in his brief description of the worship of Eros at Thespiiai, and he notes a few other cult centers (9.27.1–4). There is perhaps an allusion to Orphic myth in Simias' (early third century ^{BC}) pattern poem Wings, where the winged child Eros is bearded and explains this anomaly by referring to his great antiquity, claiming to have been born in the earliest times when Necessity was in charge and denying to be the child of Aphrodite and Ares. Ether and Khaos are also mentioned, although textual corruption makes it difficult to know in what capacity. The poem ends with Eros describing his powers: he rules with gentleness (implicitly contrasting himself favorably to Necessity) and the earth, sea, and sky all yield to him. This assertion of wide-ranging power and the fusion of the cosmic with the literary are quite similar to what we find in this hymn.

2 who runs swiftly on a path of fire: The Greek word used here, “puridromos,” is also used of the Stars (OH 7.9), Sun (OH 8.11), and Astrapaioi Zeus (OH 20.2). It gives Eros a celestial coloring, anticipating the transition from the chubby archer boy to sublime cosmic power.

3 who plays together with gods and mortal men: The description of the power of love as “play” occurs in early Greek lyric; see for example Alkman PMGF 58 and Anakreon PMG 358. Anakreon PMG 357 is a mock prayer to Dionysos asking the god to be a “good counselor” to Kleoboulos (with a pun on this name, which means “famous for counsel”—and possibly also a play on Eubouleus, an alternate name of Dionysos; see OH 41.8n). In this poem, Dionysos is described as playing with Eros, nymphs, and Aphrodite. The poem was composed for a symposiastic setting, a situation where wine and love frequently mingled. The setting is the same for Plato's aptly named Symposium, where the nature of Eros is discussed (see also Plato's Phaedrus). A natural link between Eros and Dionysos is their ability to cause madness. Indeed, another fragment of Anakreon calls the dice of Eros “madness and battle” (PMG 398); the word “battle” is Homeric, and Anakreon is probably suggesting the Trojan War, whose immediate cause was passion. Apollonios of Rhodes portrays Eros cheating at dice against Ganymede (Argonautika 3.111–130).

4 two-natured: Other divinities in the collection are two-natured (which probably refers to their androgyny), the most relevant being Protogonos (OH 6.1+n), who is equated with (the cosmic) Eros in Orphism (see the introduction to this hymn). Antagoras of Rhodes (see the note to lines 5–7 below) employs a synonymous epithet. For other androgynous divinities in the collection, see OH 9.4n.

5–7: Compare the geographical extent with Aphrodite's at OH 55.4–7; for this theme elsewhere in the collection, see OH 10.14–16n. The reference to the underworld (“of all that lies in Tartaros”) perhaps is intended to recall Orpheus' charming of Hades and Persephone when he descended to their realm in order to bring back his beloved Eurydike; see OH 87.9n and cf. Ovid Metamorphoses 5.359–384 and 10.25–29. The “goddess of grass and grain” is probably either Demeter or Persephone—more likely the latter, if our poet had in mind Kleanthes’ play on the name Persephone as warm air (see OH 29.15–16n). The mention of winds is interesting. In Aristophanes’ account of the birth of Eros from an egg in the Birds, the egg is a wind-egg (line 695) and Eros is described as being like the swift whirlwinds (line 697). The choice of a wind-egg may just be a joke on Aristophanes’ part, playing off the incongruity of one thing being born out of another that is unproductive by nature. However, in at least one version of Orphic myth, the parents of Eros are Time and all the winds (Orphic fragment 360), and Sappho’s younger contemporary Alkaios said that Eros was the son of Iris (Rainbow) and Zephyros, the west wind (see OH 81i). A later poet, Antagoras of Rhodes (early third century ^{BC}) in a literary hymn to Eros frankly expresses his puzzlement as to the god’s parentage. He lists four possibilities: (1) Erebus and Night (alluding to Aristophanes’ comic account), (2) Aphrodite, (3) Earth, and (4) the winds. See further the discussion at West 1983, pp. 200–201.

59. To the Fates

The Fates (Greek Moirai) are three sisters who were thought to be responsible for certain immutable facts about the cosmos. Sometimes they are merged into the notion of a singular personified abstraction Fate. The word “moira” means “lot, portion.” When the early Greeks felt the need to explain why things happened to them the way they did, they cast their questions in terms of a personal “who is giving this” rather than an abstract “what is causing this,” and the Fates are an answer to the question of who is doing the giving; compare the concept of a daimōn (OH 73i). They thus represent what is allotted in life, the portion of life one receives. That this does not necessarily entail “preordained destiny” can be seen in the Iliad, where Akhilleus has a choice whether to return home, where he will live to a ripe old age but die unknown, or to return to battle, where he will die young but earn immortal glory (9.410–416). Euchenor, son of the seer Polyidos, had a somewhat similar choice: to stay home and die of sickness or to go to Troy and be killed by the Trojans (Iliad 13.663–670). In Plato’s “Myth of Er,” the souls about to be reborn are able to choose their next life, which is ratified by the Fates only after the choice is made (Republic 617d–621a). The idea that the Fates apportion destinies is a specific instance of the more general idea of apportioning limits on a cosmic level. The Fates also are the limits of the physical universe, and, since for the Greeks very often the physical structure of the world is also an ethical one, the Fates also delimit moral boundaries (see note to lines 8–10). In this connection, their role is sometimes expanded to being the protectors of these limits, punishing those who transgress the established boundaries, i.e., those who commit hubris. They are thus aligned with other divinities in our collection who are also concerned with maintenance of the cosmic order, such as Nemesis (OH 61), Justice (OH 63), Nomos (OH 64), and the Eumenides (OH 70). Most of all, though, they overlap with the Erinyes (OH 69), who in their hymn are actually called the Fates (translated “goddesses of fate” in line 16; see note).

In Hesiod, the Fates are the daughters of Zeus and Themis (Theogony 904–906), and this relationship symbolically marks them as part of the divine order, just as it does with their sisters, the Seasons (see OH 43i). Of course, the divine order existed before Themis became a wife of Zeus, and Hesiod gives the alternate account that Night bore the Fates parthenogenetically (Theogony 217–222; see also OH 61i). In this genealogy, the order they represent is an essential part of the development of the world. Orphic accounts also make the Fates the daughters of earlier generations. They are born from the “first gods” (Orphic fragment 176) or, along with the Hundred-Handers and the Kyklopes, are the children of Earth and Sky (Orphic fragment 82). The Kretan seer Epimenides makes them the daughters of Kronos and says their sisters are the Erinyes and Aphrodite (fragment 51). This last detail is interesting, not only because of the close relationship between the Erinyes and Fates already described but also in light of the fact that our hymn seems to be part of a grouping of divinities explicitly linked to Aphrodite (OH 55–60). We find the Fates and Aphrodite connected elsewhere. Pausanias reports an inscription he saw in Athens which claimed that Aphrodite was the oldest of the Fates (1.19.2).

Our composer seems to have followed the Hesiodic version making Night the mother of the Fates. However, elsewhere in the collection, Night is called Kypris, another name of Aphrodite (see OH 3.2+n). This would further explain why the hymn to the Fates has been included among other figures connected with this goddess (see also OH 55i). Moreover, the “necessity” in line 18 of this hymn could possibly be understood as a personification. In this case, Aphrodite as “mother of Necessity” (see OH 55.3+n) would then be the mother of the Fates, thus reinforcing the equivalence between herself and Night.

3–4: The imagery used here is obscure. Those who dwell in caves near bodies of water are usually beings with definite chthonic connections, as, for example, the Erinyes in OH 69.3–4. Furthermore, the Fates themselves, called “daughters of Night” in line 1, are explicitly given chthonic coloring in this hymn. Here, however, it is clear that the location is celestial (see also OH 7.9n). The lake and the cave may have been imagined to be on Mount Olympos. Another possibility, though, is that the Fates are here being connected with the moon. This would certainly resolve the apparent contradiction, for the moon, while clearly a celestial body, nevertheless had strong chthonic ties. It was associated with Persephone, and indeed was sometimes thought to be the Isle of the Blest (for example, by Pythagoras; see Iamblichus Life of Pythagoras 82) or where souls went after death (see Plutarch De facie quae in orbe lunae apparet 942d–945d). The stars, too, could also be linked with souls (see OH 7.9n). In the lost poem Peplos (Robe), attributed to Orpheus, our source says that the Fates were allegorized as parts of the moon (with a wordplay here on the meaning of “moira,” “portion”). Furthermore, the Fates are said to be “clothed in white” insofar as they are parts of the moon’s light (Orphic fragment 407). It should be noted that the word here translated as “frozen” (Greek “leukos”) literally means “white,” a color that is sometimes used to describe moonlight. In the magical papyri, Moon is identified with the threads of the Fates (PGM 4.2795) and the singular being Fate (PGM 4.2861). It is true that celestial bodies were often thought to be composed of fire, but the moon was sometimes considered to be a mixture of fire and air—a view held by, among others, the Stoics (Plutarch De facie quae in orbe lunae apparet 921f), who thought that air froze water (Plutarch De primo frigido 949b–c)—and for Empedokles the moon was frozen air that had been separated from fire (Plutarch De facie quae in orbe lunae apparet 922c). It is possible then that our poet is allusively conveying the notion that the Fates dwell on the moon, and perhaps there is an intentional playing on the idea found in “Peplos” that the Fates are the moon.

5–6: Similarly, Nomos is imagined as having descended from the heavens to bring laws to the human race (OH 64.5).

6–7: The idea being expressed here seems to be that even the best-laid plans are worthless if the Fates do not grant fulfillment. In Aeschylus’ Agamemnon, Cassandra’s last words before she goes offstage to her death are: “Ah, the fortunes of men. If all is going well,/a mere shadow may darken them all. But if they already fare poorly,/a wet sponge wipes the writing away,/and this I find to be the more pitiful” (1327–1330). The idea of personal destiny and personal fortune are closely related; see OH 72i.

8–10: These lines represent the idea that the Fates are antecedent to such abstractions as justice, hope, law, and order. These concepts are thus derivative of the physical and moral structure of the cosmos which the Fates embody and are thus responsible for maintaining (see also OH 8.16n and OH 64i). However, the Greek word “doxa,” here translated as “glory,” may also have the meaning “(fallible) opinion, fancy.” Under this reading, the word would have the connotation of self-delusion, with the chariot thus symbolizing the human drive to believe oneself capable of transgressing certain fixed limits (i.e., it would be symbolic of what the Greeks called “atē,” “blind infatuation, ruin,” which leads to hubris). The Fates’ “march toward men” in line 6 would then be with punitive intent, and the following lines would pick up the idea that unjust acts can never go unnoticed. See also OH 61.6–7+n. Of course, our composer could be playing on both meanings of the word.

11–14: For the eye of Zeus, see OH 62.1+n. The Fates, in addition to sometimes being the daughters of Zeus, are found together with him in cultic contexts. In Thebes, a sanctuary of the Fates was in close proximity to one of Zeus and another of Themis (Pausanias 9.25.4), thus recalling one of the Hesiodic genealogies. Zeus is sometimes worshipped as Moiragetes (Leader of Fates). He appears with the Fates in a relief on an altar to Persephone (Pausanias 8.37.1), and an altar probably belonging to him is near an altar to the Fates at Elis (Pausanias 5.15.5). The “Zeus’ mind [noos]” is comparable to the Stoic Khrysispos’ equation of the reason [logos] of Zeus with that which has been fated (Plutarch De Stoicorum repugnantiiis 1056c), and, according to the author of the Derveni Papyrus, Orpheus called Fate “phronēsis,” which might mean “thought” or “prudence” (see Betegh 2004, p. 39, for translation and pp. 200–202 for discussion).

16: These names are already in Hesiod (Theogony 905) and are standard in Greek myth. Klotho is the Spinner, Lakheis the Alotter, and Atropos the Irreversible. They reflect the notion that every life is like a thread that Klotho provides, Lakheis measures out (see also OH 61i), and Atropos cuts at the moment of death. This metaphor of the “thread of life” persisted throughout antiquity and indeed has continued into our own times.

17 airy, invisible: The Erinyes are also described this way (OH 69.9).

18 necessity: For the figure of Necessity in Orphic thought, see OH 55.3n. An important quality of the Fates is their inevitability (compare “inexorable” in line 17 and the meaning of the name Atropos), and thus they are often associated with Necessity who shares the same fixity. The Stoic Khrysispos equated Atropos with Peptomene (Destiny), Necessity, and Adrasteia (Plutarch De Stoicorum repugnantiiis 1056c). Adrasteia is sometimes identified with Necessity, and sometimes with Nemesis, a divinity who overlaps somewhat with the Fates (see OH 61i). In Plato’s “Myth of Er,” the Fates are daughters of Necessity, and they turn the spindle that Plato portrays as the framework of the cosmos (Republic 616c–617d).

In the manuscripts, the last line of this hymn reads: “This is the end of the song of the Fates, which Orpheus composed.” It is a dactylic hexameter line, the same meter used in all of the hymns in the collection. It is possible that it was part of the original composition, although it is difficult to see why only this hymn asserts its Orphic authorship. The explicit mention of Orpheus perhaps is meant to distinguish it from another hymn to the Fates, now lost to us, which was not by Orpheus (or even mistakenly attributed to him). On the other hand, it might be that this hymn was separate from the collection and was later added, due to its similarity to the other hymns; the line could have been part of the original and simply retained. Then again, it might simply be the work of a playful scribe engaging in a little poetic license. In this scenario, the line would have been a marginal note that eventually was misunderstood to have been part of the hymn and appended to its end. The word translated “composed” literally means “wove.” While the metaphor of weaving a song is very old in Greek literature (Bacchylides 5.9), it is perhaps more than a coincidence that it was chosen for a hymn dedicated to divinities who are also closely connected with the metaphor of weaving (see note to line 16).

60. To the Graces

The Graces (Greek Kharites) are a plurality of female divinities concerned with beauty, merriment, and good cheer. Aglaia is Splendor, Thalia Festivity, and Euphrosyne Joy, and their names are indicative of their function. They are frequently connected, and even confused, with the Seasons (see OH 43i). There is also some linguistic and conceptual overlap between this hymn and the one to the Seasons. Like the latter, the Graces are “ever-blooming,” the third one listed is “(thrice-)blessed,” flowers are used to describe their physical beauty, and both groups are called on to bring fertility. The affinity between these two groups is made even more concrete since the mother of the Graces is Eunomia, one of the Seasons. This differs from the Hesiodic account, where they are also daughters of Zeus, but their mother is Eurynome, one of the daughters of Okeanos (Theogony 907–911). The Orphic Rhapsodies, however, agree with our hymn (Orphic fragment 254). For other variations of their names and genealogy, see Pausanias 9.35.1–7. Of particular interest is his mention of mysteries that were performed near their statue at the entrance of the Athenian acropolis (9.35.3). Euripides recounts that they were sent by Zeus along with the Muses to mollify Kybele-Demeter, who was angry at the abduction of her daughter Persephone (Helen 1338–1345; see OH 27i). The Graces are especially associated with Aphrodite. In the Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.60–64 they are the goddess’ attendants. In the Iliad Diomedes pierces Aphrodite’s robe, which was the handiwork of the Graces (5.337–338). Zeus orders Aphrodite to “pour grace around [Pandora’s] head,” and in the actual decking out of Pandora, the Graces themselves with the goddess Persuasion hang golden necklaces around her neck, while the Seasons crown her with a garland of spring flowers (Hesiod Works and Days 65 and 73–75). According to Pausanias, there was a sanctuary of the Graces at Elea where there were images of the goddesses—one holding a rose, another a die, the third a sprig of myrtle—and a statue of Eros next to them (6.24.6–7). Pausanias interprets this group by noting the symbolism of the rose and myrtle for Aphrodite and pointing out that young people, who are not yet marred by the ugliness of age, often play at dice.

The Graces' close association with Aphrodite helps to explain why their hymn follows on the heels of hymns dedicated to this goddess (OH 55) and to those explicitly connected with her: Adonis, Chthonic Hermes, and Eros (OH 56–58). For the connection of the Fates with Aphrodite, see OH 59i. The Fates and the Graces are further bound together by way of their mother Eunomia, whose name means “law-abiding.” As her daughters, the Graces are part of that divine order in which their mother partakes (see OH 43i) and that is exemplified by the Fates (see OH 59i) and those goddesses to whom the subsequent hymns are dedicated: Nemesis, Dike (another Season, and so one of their aunts!), Justice, and Nomos (OH 61–64).

61. Hymn to Nemesis

Nemesis is another personified abstraction that became deified. Her name comes from the verb “nemō,” “I deal out, distribute.” She is the goddess of righteous indignation, who punishes those who transgress customs and laws. Hesiod makes her the daughter of Night (born from no father) and describes her as a “woe for mortals” (Theogony 223–234). A more positive portrayal of this goddess appears in the conclusion to his account of the Iron Race of men. There is so much wickedness in the world that Nemesis apparently gives the human race up and leaves with Aidos (Shame) to Olympos (Works and Days 197–201). Both indignation and shame were important forces in early society that helped prevent unjust deeds and consequently contributed to constructing a stable community. Hesiod subtly links Nemesis and Dike in the Works and Days, since Dike, too, leaves the earth in the face of wicked acts; she rushes to her father, Zeus, to demand punishment against those who have mistreated her (Works and Days 256–262; see also OH 62i and OH 69.9n).

Nemesis is connected with the Trojan War in an interesting variant. Zeus falls in love with her, but she flees his advances, out of shame and indignation (the words “aidos” and “nemesis” are used), since Zeus is her father. With the god in hot pursuit, she keeps changing herself into different animals, desperate to escape. Zeus catches up to her when she is in the form of a goose, and he mates with her in the form of a swan. Nemesis lays an egg, which is given to Leda, queen of Sparta, and out of the egg hatches Helen. The death and destruction that result in the war for her sake are thus connected with the righteous anger of Nemesis at the abuse of her father. For versions of this story, see Kypria fragment 7 (= Athenaios 8.334b–d), Apollodoros 3.10.7, and Pausanias 1.33.7; see also OH 79i. Other goddesses also become wrathful at such forced unions, e.g., Demeter at Poseidon (see OH 69i), and Persephone at Zeus (see OH 29i and OH 71.4–5+n).

This myth is reflected in the cult of Nemesis at Rhamnous, a town in Attika. Pausanias describes a statue by the famous sculptor Pheidias (modern scholars prefer to attribute it to his pupil Agorakritos) depicting Leda leading Helen to her mother Nemesis; also depicted is Leda's husband, Tyndareus, with their children, as well as Agamemnon, Menelaos, Neoptolemos and Hermione, the daughter of Helen (1.33.8). The statue was built from marble that the Persians had arrogantly brought with them in their invasion of Attika, with the intent to build a trophy for the victory they felt inevitable; thus the goddess became explicitly connected with their defeat (Pausanias 1.33.2). The statue held an apple branch in its left hand and a libation bowl in its right (engraved with Ethiopians); on its head was a deer and images of Nike. The symbolism of Nike is clearly connected with the defeat of the Persians. The apple branch suggests fertility connections, maybe even a connection with Aphrodite, while the deer perhaps hints at Artemis or some other similar ancient mistress of animals; see Larson 2007, pp. 179–180. Themis had a shrine in Nemesis' sanctuary (see OH 79i). Nemesis was also worshipped at Smyrna, where the abstraction becomes a plurality of three Nemeses (Pausanias 7.5.3).

It is interesting that the Fates are placed before Nemesis in Hesiod's list of Night's progeny and that they are the ones who he says look over the deeds of mortals and gods and punish transgressions (Theogony 220–222). This is normally the purview of Nemesis. However, for the Greeks the ideas of justice and fate were intertwined in the cosmic order, so it is not surprising that at times divinities concerned with one of these should be concerned with the other as well (see OH 59i). Nemesis was sometimes called Adrasteia (Ineluctable) and invoked apotropaically before one would say something that could be construed as boasting or otherwise overbold (see, e.g., Aeschylus Prometheus Bound 936 and Plato Republic 451a). Adrasteia can function like Fate, too, and later is equated with Necessity; see West 1983, pp. 194–196. Nemesis became associated also with Tyche; compare lines 7–8 of the second century AD hymn to Nemesis by Mesomedes: “Beneath your wheel that neither ceases nor remains on the beaten track/there rolls the bright Tyche of men” and OH 72. Mesomedes further develops the idea of Nemesis as Fate through the image of scales (line 1, “O Nemesis, winged scales of life,” and line 13, “with scales in hand”) and the symbolism of measuring (line 11, “you measure out livelihood”; cf. Lakheisis the “allotter” at OH 59.16+n). This close relation probably influenced the placement of this hymn near the one dedicated to the Fates, and, insofar as Aphrodite is called “mother of Necessity” (OH 55.3), Nemesis could very well have been imagined as part of the Aphrodite block of hymns. The intimate bond between justice and the indignation that arises against those who transgress it further explains the grouping of this hymn with the three that follow it. The importance of acting in accordance to justice is thus emphasized. The first and last of the four (OH 64, to Nomos) are marked by their lack of offering, and it is likely that the initiates paused in their sacrifices and merely sang to these divinities. There is further a possible male/female pairing implied between Nemesis and Nomos (see OH 14.8–9n), whose names, incidentally, are etymologically related. The other two hymns sandwiched in between address the closely related pair of Dike and Justice. The themes of the blessings of justice and the inevitable punishment of the unjust unite all four and connect these figures with similar deities, namely, the Fates (OH 59), the Erinyes (OH 69), and the Eumenides (OH 70).

2 all-seeing eye: Similarly in line 8. A number of addressees in the collection are described in this way. The most relevant parallel is Dike (OH 62.1); see further OH 8.1n.

4: This line does not mean that Nemesis is herself inconsistent, arbitrary, or fickle. It is the wickedness of men that is so varied, and this entails that the principle embodied by Nemesis must appear differently in her various concrete manifestations. Compare the story of her flight from Zeus, where she is a shapeshifter. The line also fits in with the theme of deities who are multiform and ever-changing.

5: Fear as a motivation to act justly was recognized early on by the Greeks. An astounding witness to the fact is the fragment from the late fifth-century tragedy (or satyr play) Sisyphos, sometimes attributed to Euripides. In the fragment, the lead character baldly states that gods were invented merely as a means to frighten people into behaving themselves; cf. OH 69.15n.

6–7 the arrogant soul, / the reckless one: Transgression is properly a going beyond the bounds of what is allowed and/or appropriate, and the Greeks were very concerned about respecting boundaries and maintaining proper limits; see OH 63.7n and cf. OH 30i. This idea lies at the heart of the concept of hubris, a word not used in our hymn but found in Mesomedes' (line 5: "hating destructive hubris of mortals"). See also OH 59.8–10+n.

8 you arbitrate all: Compare line 14 of Mesomedes' hymn, where Nemesis is invoked as a judge, and the idea of Nemesis as Fate as noted in the introduction to this hymn.

62. To Dike

Dike (Right) is not really different from Justice in the next hymn, whose name in Greek (Dikaiousunē) is derived from Dike's (see OH 63i). For Hesiod, she is one of the three Seasons and a daughter of Zeus and Themis (Theogony 901–903). She receives special attention in the Works and Days where she is represented as a maiden who takes vengeance on the unjust, particularly in juridical matters, whether she takes punishment into her own hands (220–224) or complains to her father, Zeus (256–262; see also OH 61i and OH 69.9n). Note that the word “dikē” in Greek can also mean “punishment.” Orphism adopts the Hesiodic genealogy (Orphic fragment 252) but adds a second one, making Dike the daughter of Nomos (Law; to whom OH 64 is addressed) and Eusebeia (Piety); see also OH 63i. Mesomedes in his hymn to Nemesis makes her the daughter of Dike; here genealogy reflects function. Finally, Dike is equated with Moon in the magical papyri (PGM 4.2785 and 2860), in the same context as the Fates and the Erinyes, both of whom also have as their function the punishment of malefactors; see also OH 69.15n.

1 all-seeing eye: So, too, Nemesis in the previous hymn (OH 61.2). The idea of the “eye of Dike” goes as far back at least to Sophokles (fragment 12). The imagery occurs in our collection again at OH 69.15, where the Erinyes are said to “gaze as the eye of Dike.” Two gods who are traditionally watchers in the sky are also so described in the collection. Sun is addressed as the “eternal eye that sees all” (OH 8.1+n), as well as Apollon in his identity as the sun god (OH 34.8). Sometimes, the eye of the sun is limited to just the physical entity, though, as at OH 11.17. Zeus, too, possesses an all-seeing eye. In the hymn to the Fates, the poet says that they alone of the gods watch over mortals “except for Zeus’ perfect eye” (OH 59.13). In the Works and Days, Zeus has an eye that sees all (267); this comes shortly after Hesiod describes how Dike runs to tell him of the injustice of the world. Note, too, that in an Orphic hymn to Zeus, the sun and moon are said to be his eyes (Orphic fragment 243.16). The imagery of a celestial sky god who perceives all is very ancient and its appearance in Greek poetry seems to have roots in its Indo-European heritage (see West 1978, pp. 223–224). Dike, too, can be construed as a celestial goddess. Aratos tells us that the constellation known as the Maiden is either the daughter of Astraios or is Dike herself. He then relates the story of how Dike had dwelt among men during the innocence of the Golden Age and urged them to righteousness; in the Silver Age, disgusted with the wickedness she found in the people, she retreated from society and warned men of their evil ways; and finally in the Bronze Age she could no longer bear to remain on the earth, so she retired to the sky where she became a constellation (Phainomena 96–136). This story appears to have been influenced by Hesiod’s account of Dike leaving the earth to complain to her father.

2: For the concept of Dike sharing the throne of Zeus, compare Hesiod Works and Days 256–262, Sophokles Oedipus at Kolonos 1382, and the introduction to the translation. She is described as a companion and follower of Zeus in Orphic literature (Orphic fragment 32–33, 233, and 247–248). Her daughter Nemesis is said to sit by her in Mesomedes' hymn to Nemesis (line 18).

6–7: The concern for verdicts is reminiscent of the Hesiod passages in the Works and Days, cited in the introduction to this hymn. The word “dikē” can also have the sense of “judgment, trial, suit.”

9: Depicted on the chest of Kypselos, as described by Pausanias (5.18.2), is Dike, in the form of a beautiful woman, both choking and whacking with a staff an ugly woman, who is Adikia (Wrong). The idea that Dike is nice to her friends and nasty to her enemies reflects an ethic that goes back to Archaic times. A similar sentiment is found in OH 10.15, right after Physis is identified with Dike; cf. also OH 63.10.

63. To Justice

Justice (Dikaioṣunē) was one of the most important, if not the most important, virtues in Greek ethical thought, often discussed by poets and philosophers. There is a certain amount of overlap between this word and “dikē,” and the two words may function as synonyms. One distinction between Dike and Justice in their portrayals here is that the former has a somewhat more concrete personalization while the latter is presented more as an abstract entity (but cf. OH 8.18, where Sun is called the “eye of justice,” and OH 62.1n). Justice also seems to be more broadly construed; see note to lines 14–15. We do find Justice personified and worshipped, although it is rare. Euripides is our earliest source for the personification. He mentions the “golden countenance of Justice” in his lost play Melanippe (fragment 486). An inscription on Delos from 115/114 BC identifies Isis with Justice as well as Tyche, Protogoneia (a feminine form of Protogonos, First-Born), Thalia (the name of one of the Graces that means “joy”), and Aphrodite the Righteous. Another inscription from Epidauros in the second century AD confirms that Justice received worship there. In Orphic theogony, Nomos (Law) and Eusebeia (Piety) are said to have given birth to Justice (Orphic fragment 248), and it is therefore notable that in the opening address to Mousaios both Justice and Piety are mentioned together (OH O.14). However, Hermias, the source for this genealogy, in the same work also says it is Dike who is their daughter. Whether he thought they were two distinct entities or he is using the names interchangeably is hard to determine. To make matters more complicated, Hermias again in the same work says that there are three Nights in Orphic mythology and that the third one gave birth to Justice (Orphic fragment 246). And another source says that, for Orpheus, Dike was a daughter of Zeus and Themis and that she was one of the Seasons (see OH 43i). These might represent different variants that developed independently over time and that are being indiscriminately used by later authors. However, as the multiple Nights show, it is possible that a single entity could be duplicated in Orphic mythopoetics. Clearly the notion of justice was as important to the Orphics as it was to the wider Greek world.

7 the balance of your mighty scales: Balance, equality, and fairness are important themes in this hymn; they also recur in the other three of the group. An important component in the Greek view of justice was that each person receives what they deserve; injustice occurs when the undeserving take more than their fair share (a form of hubris) and the deserving are short-changed. In section 29 of The Theology of Arithmetic (see OH 12.3n), the author says that the Pythagoreans considered the tetrad (i.e., the number four) to be Justice, because a square that had sides the length of four would have its area (length times width: $4 \times 4 = 16$) and its perimeter (four sides of $4 = 16$) equal (Waterfield 1988, p. 63). In the Pythagorean saying “Do not step over the beam,” the “beam” was sometimes construed as the beam of a balance, and the dictum was interpreted as meaning that one should not transgress against justice (see Iamblichus Life of Pythagoras 186 and The Theology of Arithmetic 40 in Waterfield 1988, p. 72).

8 a lover of revel: This would seem to refer to Dionysian ecstatic worship and to suggest that it receives Justice’s stamp of approval.

14–15: It is interesting that the hymn now includes living creatures in addition to human beings. Hitherto this hymn, as well as the previous two, has been exclusively concerned with human conduct; see further OH 64i. It is perhaps relevant to recall in this context that Hesiod tells Perses to “obey the voice of Dike and always refrain from violence” and then continues, “This is the law [nomos] Zeus laid down for men,/but fish and wild beasts and winged birds/know not of justice [dikē] and so eat one another./Justice [dikē], the best thing there is, he gave to men” (Works and Days 276–279).

15 sea-dwelling Zeus: A circumlocution for Poseidon; compare Hades being called “Chthonic Zeus” (see OH 18.3+n).

64. Hymn to Nomos

This ends a sequence of four tightly integrated hymns. As with OH 61, there is no indication of incense, which suggests this was perhaps sung without being accompanied by any other ritual activity; together they mark the beginning and end of the series. A crescendo effect is achieved by the scope of each hymn. The first two, the hymns to Nemesis and Dike, are limited to the various races of men (cf. OH 61.2 and OH 62.3). The third hymn to Justice also is concerned with human justice, but at the very end expands to include all living creatures (OH 63.14–15+n). All three divinities are female, and their concern is with things that are alive. In this hymn, the male Nomos (Law) has been raised to a cosmic principle that sees to it that both the inanimate elements of nature and the creatures that live among them keep to their proper limits. This connects the hymn conceptually to the previous three, as respecting boundaries is a core component of Greek ethical thought (see OH 61.6–7n and OH 63.7n). The hymn is structured to reflect the cosmos-human duality. The first part expresses Nomos as the physical order of the universe (lines 1–4). A transitional bridge brings Nomos down to earth—literally (lines 5–6). The focus is then on Nomos as a foundational ethical force for living beings in general and the individual in particular (lines 7–11). This notion that the underlying structure of the cosmos is as ethical as it is physical and that this universal ethic is connected to moral action in the human sphere returns to a theme found in the earlier hymns (see OH 8.16n) and appears again near the end (see OH 86i); see also OH 59.8–10n and OH 69.15n.

The earliest evidence for the personification of Nomos is Pindar fragment 169a.1–4, which is cited by Plato (Gorgias 484b). Nomos as a divinity seems to have been appealing to the philosophers. A fragment of Herakleitos says that “all human laws [nomoi] are nourished by the one that is divine” (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 250), which might imply that for him Nomos was a divinity. The Stoics, who were influenced greatly by Herakleitos, do explicitly recognize him as such. Philodemus tells us that the Stoic philosopher Khrysisippos recognized “the sun, the moon, and the other stars as gods ... as well as law (nomos)” (On Piety 11); compare lines 2–4 of this hymn. Philodemus also tells us that Khrysisippos said Zeus was Nomos (On Piety 14). Kleanthes, an earlier Stoic philosopher, in his hymn to Zeus describes him as “steering everything with Nomos” (line 2); the same metaphor (albeit with different wording) is found in line 8 of this hymn. In Orphic thought, Nomos was also considered a god. He is the father to Dike and/or Justice (Orphic fragment 248; see OH 63i), and he sits next to the enthroned Zeus, who has Dike as a companion (Orphic fragment 247). This last idea is very similar to that expressed by Kleanthes.

1 holy lord of men and gods: This is very similar to the opening of Pindar fragment 169a: “Nomos, the king of all men and gods” (lines 1–2).

2–4: Compare this to Pan, who is conceived as the force that keeps the four elements separate (OH 11.13–18); see also OH 10.14–16n.

4 nature’s balance: The sense of balance here has the connotation of stability; cf. OH 63.7+n and 9.

6 he drives out malicious envy: We find the same phrasing in Mesomedes’ hymn to Nemesis (line 6).

65. To Ares

Ares, the god of war, is the son of Hera and Zeus (Hesiod Theogony 921–923). Although Athene is also concerned with war (see OH 32i), she represents the strategic, intellectual side, while Ares portrays the blood-and-guts aspect. In literature, the two are sometimes brought together in sharp contrast. They fight against each other in epic poetry, whether directly (Iliad 21.391–414) or through a heroic proxy. Athene gives direct assistance to Diomedes when he attacks Ares (Iliad 5.755–863), and she helps Herakles in his battle against Kyknos (the son of Ares) and Ares himself (Hesiod Shield 433–466). Athene employs reason in trying to restrain Ares’ anger at the death of one of his mortal sons on two occasions, further emphasizing the gulf between intelligence and pure battle rage (Iliad 15.100–142 and Hesiod Shield 446–449). The ancient Greeks in general had a strong distaste for the violence of war, and the negative treatment of Ares in myth is a reflection of this. The sons of Aloeus, Otos and Ephialtes, capture him, place him in chains, and keep him in a cauldron for thirteen months; Hermes eventually has to rescue him (Iliad 5.385–391). Zeus himself harshly rebukes him when he returns to Olympus fresh after being wounded by Diomedes (Iliad 5.888–898). Ares is often associated with aggressive figures who are threats to civilization, such as the Amazons. However, there is a positive side to Ares as well. In the Iliad, being called a “servant of Ares” (2.110), a “scion of Ares” (2.540), and the like is a mark of approval and praise. Ares is also a figure of masculine beauty; for example, Sappho praises a bridegroom as being as handsome as Ares (fragment 111). When the gods sing and dance, Ares also takes part (Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.186–206). The ambiguity of his position in the Greek pantheon may be seen symbolically in his children with Aphrodite (Hesiod Theogony 933–937). Their two sons are Fear and Panic. They are often portrayed as driving the chariot of their father, and they rescue him from Herakles after Kyknos is slain. Their daughter, on the other hand, is Harmonia, the embodiment of civil concord (see also OH 55i). The legendary foundation of Thebes also reflects Ares’ ambiguity. Kadmos slays a dragon who is either an offspring or favorite of Ares. The teeth of the dragon are sown, and immediately armed warriors sprout out of the earth and commence fighting. Only five survive the savage fray, and these five become the forefathers of the five noble houses of Thebes. After this, though, Kadmos marries Ares’ daughter Harmonia, and the city is founded. Cults involving Ares are few; see Larson 2007, pp. 156–157, for details. Another war god, Enyalios, who interestingly had a female counterpart named Enyo, was eventually merged with Ares, although traces of independent cult still survived; see OH 76i.

As Ares is a god who controls war, he also can perforce control peace in the sense that he can prevent war from breaking out in the world (compare line 6). Our hymn is divided into two parts that clearly play on these two sides. The violent and bloody nature of the god is given adequate expression in the first five lines; the hymn does not shirk from admitting this aspect of the god. Yet he is asked to transform himself into an agent of peace in the final four lines. This follows the pattern found in many of the other hymns in the collection: a divinity who has the potential to wreak great harm is asked propitiously to manifest themselves in their beneficial guise. This hymn should be read in conjunction with the Homeric Hymn to Ares, which most likely dates from the Hellenistic period or later, possibly even composed by Proclus; see West 1970. For the placement of this hymn with the following one to Hephaistos, compare line 10 of the address to Mousaios. After the digression from the hymn to Aphrodite to four abstractions concerned with order and law (OH 61–64), we return to two major Olympian deities who are both sons of Zeus and who both have associations with Aphrodite. The relationship between peace and justice connects this particular hymn with the previous four and eases the transition.

5 rude clash: The word for rude, “amouson,” literally means “without the Muses.” The activities of these goddesses are intricately bound up with peace (see OH 76i), although Ares, as mentioned in the introduction to this hymn, is not unfamiliar with their charms. The opposition between war and the arts is powerfully portrayed by Homer when he shows us the great warrior Akhilleus, who in anger has withdrawn from the fighting at Troy, in his tent, singing the deeds of the great men of the past (Iliad 9.185–194). In the Greek text, this word significantly is the last one before the composer asks Ares to leave off from his war-like nature in the following line.

7 Kypris: Another name for Aphrodite (see OH 22.7+n). Ares is often portrayed as a lover of Aphrodite, as in the somewhat risqué story of how Hephaistos captures the adulterous pair in flagrante, sung by the bard Demodokos as part of the entertainment for Odysseus at Scheria; see OH 66i. There seems to have been an Orphic version of their relationship in which Ares rapes Aphrodite (Orphic fragment 275). In one fragment from the Shorter Krater, a work attributed to Orpheus, the gods are interpreted allegorically, and Ares, who is equivalent to war, is explicitly contrasted with Aphrodite, who is made equivalent to peace (Orphic fragment 413.4).

7 Lyaaios: Another name for Dionysos; it means the “one who loosens/sets free” (see OH 50i). For the connection of music and peace, see note to line 5. The ecstatic worship of Dionysos represents a kind of madness that is kindred to the battle rage of Ares; compare the martial prowess of the possessed Bacchantes in Euripides Bacchae 714–768. It should be noted that, like Ares, Dionysos and Orpheus are said to have come from Thrace. Athene and Pan also are associated with madness and battle (see OH 32.6n).

8–9: Agricultural works often suffer in times of war, both due to the fact that the farmer leaves his homestead to fight and that marauding armies might ravage the land as they pass through. As with music and celebration, agriculture is a mark of civilization and thus incompatible with the savagery of war. Peace nurtures the young for obvious reasons. It is illustrative to compare Tyrtaios' admonition to the young that it is noble to die on the front lines (fragment 10) with the words of the defeated Kroisos to Kyros, the king of Persia: "No one is so foolish as to choose war over peace; for in peace sons bury their fathers, but in war fathers bury their sons" (Herodotos 1.87.4). See also OH 40.2n.

66. To Hephaistos

Hephaistos, the famed blacksmith of the gods, is the son of Zeus and Hera or in some accounts just Hera, who bore him apart from Zeus in retaliation for the latter's fathering of Athene without (direct) feminine aid (Hesiod Theogony 927–929). According to Homer, Hephaistos was cast down out of Olympos on two occasions. Once Zeus threw him out when he tried to take up the cause of his mother. All day he hurtled through the sky until he landed at the island Lemnos near sundown, where the Sinties succored the god (Iliad 1.590–594). Another time was at his very birth by Hera because she despised the fact that her son was born lame; Thetis and Eurynome kept him safe and cared for him in secret (Iliad 18.394–405 and Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.311–325). Hephaistos eventually joins the Olympians. He takes vengeance on his mother by artfully constructing a chair that binds her fast when she sits on it. Hephaistos then conveniently skips town and thereafter refuses to return when entreated by the gods. In one version, Ares tries to free his mother but is frightened off by fires. Dionysos is dispatched. He gets the dour Hephaistos drunk, brings the wayward son home, and a reconciliation is finally reached (cf. Alkaios fragment 349, Pausanias 1.20.3, and Hyginus 166). Thus two outsiders are integrated into the society of the gods. The story was very popular in Archaic times as evidenced by the numerous vase paintings depicting the return. Perhaps the most famous one, found on the François vase, comically shows Hephaistos riding a mule amid reveling satyrs and nymphs as Dionysos leads the party to the seated Olympian gods (Boardman 1991, pl. 46.7). A tale with a somewhat similar pattern appears in Homer. In the Odyssey, the bard Demodokos sings of the adulterous affair between Ares and Aphrodite, Hephaistos' wife. Sun acts as informant, and Hephaistos forges a net with strands so fine, that they are practically invisible. The net entraps Ares and Aphrodite the next time they make love. Hephaistos bursts on the scene and calls the gods to witness; the goddesses, we are told, stay home out of modesty. Here it is Poseidon, not Dionysos, who barely mollifies the enraged god (Odyssey 8.266–366; see also OH 65.7n). Although Aphrodite is Hephaistos' wife in the Odyssey, it is Kharis, one of the Graces, in the Iliad and Aglaia, another one of the Graces, in Hesiod (Theogony 945–946) and an Orphic account (Orphic fragment 272). In all of these cases, there is an intended contrast, perhaps humorous, between beauty and ugliness. Even in antiquity, sometimes the geek gets the girl.

A characteristic emphasized in the literature is the cleverness and inventiveness of Hephaistos. As a divine artisan, he creates wondrous things, e.g., exquisite jewelry, self-moving tripods, self-blowing bellows, android women of gold, watchdogs made of gold and silver (Iliad 18.372–377, 417–421, 470–473; Odyssey 7.91–94). He forges weapons and armor for Herakles (Hesiod Shield 122–140) and Akhilleus (Iliad 18.478–614); in both cases, the poet focuses on the elaborate imagery Hephaistos puts on the shield. Along with Athene, Aphrodite, and others, he fashions Pandora (Hesiod Works and Days 59–82). The mirror that the Titans use to lure Dionysos is also a product of Hephaistos (Orphic fragment 309). In the Homeric Hymn to Hephaistos he is praised as a teacher of fine crafts and skills to man, whom he thereby elevated from savagery to civilization. In this, he is similar to other trickster gods associated with fire, such as Prometheus (cf. Aeschylus Prometheus Bound 436–506) and Loki in Norse mythology; see further OH 40.8–9n. Indeed, Hephaistos was so closely associated with fire, his very name could be used as a metonymy for the element, as already in Homer (Iliad 2.426); note, too, that he is addressed as “unwearying fire” in our hymn (line 1). He is invoked by Hera to fight off the river Skamandros from Akhilleus, a battle of the elements fire and water (Iliad 21.328–382). Hephaistos also has similarities with the clever, inventive, and magical blacksmith figures in myth: the Telkhines, Idaian Dactyls, and Kabeiroi (see OH O.20–22). These last are sometimes considered to be the sons or grandsons of Hephaistos at Lemnos (cf. Herodotos 3.37).

It is on this island that Hephaistos had significant cultic importance. Lemnos had an ancient non-Greek population. The name Hephaistos is not of Greek origin, and it is a non-Greek people, the Sinties, who Homer claimed were hospitable to the god when he fell from Olympos. We do not know much about his worship there. Philostratus, who was from Lemnos, gives a description of one ritual (Heroicus 53.5–7). It seems that every year, the hearths—and especially the smiths' forges—were rekindled with fire brought from Delos. For nine days all fires were extinguished on the island and offerings to the dead were made, during which the ship from Delos could not land. The new fires are expressly said to start the new life of the community. The only other place in antiquity where Hephaistos had significant worship was at Athens, where the god was closely connected with that other divinity of skills and crafts—Athene; for details, see Plato Critias 109c–d and 112b, Burkert 1985, pp. 167–168, 220, and Larson 2007, pp. 159–160. These two divinities are joined outside Athenian cult as well, e.g., in Odyssey 6.233, Plato Protagoras 321d–322a, and Laws 920d. In one of the poems ascribed to Orpheus, it is said that the (cosmic) Kyklopes were the first artisans and they were the ones who taught Hephaistos and Athene the arts (Orphic fragment 269).

4–5: The element fire is one of the four basic elements postulated by Empedokles, a thesis accepted by many later philosophers (see OH 5.4n and OH 15i). Fire appears to have had a central role in Herakleitos’ philosophy (cf. Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, nos. 217–220). The Stoics, influenced by Herakleitos, held that fire was the basic substance in the world and thought that the universe periodically returned to its original state in a great conflagration (see Long and Sedley 1987, pp. 274–279; see also the “ever-living fire” of Zeus’ thunderbolt in Kleantes’ Hymn To Zeus 9–13). Ovid hints at this in passing only to playfully give an idea of what such conflagration might be like in his description of Phaethon’s failure to control the chariot of Sun (Metamorphoses 1.253–261, 2.161–313; cf. Hesiod Theogony 687–710 and 853–868). The belief that the world would end in fire is of course not limited to the Greeks; compare Ragnarök in Norse mythology and, to a more limited extent, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah in Genesis 18:20ff. The author of the Derveni papyrus also seems to consider fire to be a constitutive element of the original state of the cosmos, and, according to him, the initial separation of fire into the sun is what precipitates the creation of the universe. Elsewhere in the collection, Ether, conceived as fire, is called the “best cosmic element” (OH 5.4).

6–7: In describing the shield of Akhilleus, Homer mentions first and foremost that it is bounded by the ocean and that in its center are the sun, moon, and stars. Hephaistos forged the heaven in some Orphic accounts (Orphic fragment 274), and there might be some connection between this and the Homeric shield. The Demiurge who creates the world in Plato’s Timaeus is also an artisan and perhaps ultimately lurks behind this characterization of Hephaistos. The Greek word “dēmiourgos” literally means “worker for the people” (formed from “dēmos,” “people,” and “ergon,” “work”). It does not appear in this poem, but it could not, since the word cannot be fitted into the hexameter rhythm; the closely related word “ergastēr,” “worker,” does appear in line 4, however. There may be Stoic influence in these lines as well. The fire that was the base substance of the world was referred to them as a “designing fire” (“tekhnikon pur”), which is what initiated and sustained creation as a rational whole, as opposed to “undesigning fire” (“atekhnnon pur”), which had no such generative potential (see Long and Sedley 1987, fragments 46A–D, G, and 47A, C, F, and pp. 277–278). Naturally, the ether, stars, sun, and moon, believed to be composed of the fiery element, have such associations in their respective hymns (OH 5, 7, 8, 9; and note the different order in this hymn, probably again due to metrical considerations).

8: This line probably is referring to the central role of fire in civilization; see the introduction to this hymn. Fire was exceedingly important for everyday life; e.g., it provided light and was used in cooking and sacrifices. Compare also the hymn to Hestia, where the goddess is addressed as “mistress of ever-burning fire” (OH 84.2).

9 you dwell in human bodies: The hymn moves in a top-down fashion: cosmic fire, cultural fire, and now individual fire. There was a belief in antiquity that the soul was composed of fire, or at least a hot element. The Stoics, for example, equated the soul with fire, and thus composed out of the same element as the cosmos. In light of lines 12–13, however, a more biological fire might be meant. Fire, heat, and warmth play a role in ancient theories of life. Among the Stoics, Kleanthes argued by analogy from the fire that constituted the life of a living being to the fire that sustained the entire cosmos, which was conceived as a living being; Khrysippos opted for the term “pneuma,” here meaning something like “hot air” (see Long and Sedley 1987 fragments 46B, G, J, 47C, O, 53X, Y, and pp. 286–287, 319). In both cases, that which constitutes celestial phenomena and the individual life is the same element, merely differing in scope. It is perhaps worth remembering in this context that human beings in the Orphic cosmogony are created from the Titans who were incinerated by Zeus’ lightning bolt (see OH 37i), and Dionysos, too, can be said to have been “conceived in fire” (OH 45.1, OH 52.2). Fire and heat also are used by poets to describe emotional effects: love can burn or melt, and Sappho’s famous catalogue of the physical effects of jealousy include a “subtle fire [coursing] under the skin” (fragment 31). See also OH 5.3, OH 10.27+n, and OH 18.9n.

12: Fire brings many benefits to man, yet it is also destructive (cf. “all-eating” in line 5), as in the case of the thunderbolt that kills Semele but leads to Dionysos’ birth. Hephaistos, too, has two sides to his personality. He can play the role of jester, as when he hobbles around to excite laughter from the gods and defuse a tense situation between Zeus and Hera (Iliad 1.595–600); on the other hand, as mentioned in the introduction to this hymn, he is also susceptible to anger. As often in the collection, an ambiguous deity is asked to come in his beneficial guise while putting aside his deleterious nature.

67. To Asklepios

Asklepios seems to have originally been a hero-physician from Thessaly. He is first mentioned in Homer as the father of the “good doctors” Makhaon and Podaleirios (Iliad 2.731–732). In myth, he is usually the son of Koronis and Apollon (see Homeric Hymn to Asklepios 16.2–3). Before he was born, though, Koronis marries or has an affair with a mortal. Apollon learns about this and sends his sister Artemis to kill the pregnant

Koronis. However, when the corpse of Koronis is on the pyre, Apollon takes pity on his unborn son and rescues him. The boy is entrusted to the wise centaur Kheiron, who instructs him in the arts of medicine. Asklepios becomes the world's greatest physician, but he runs afoul of Zeus by bringing a dead man back to life. Zeus punishes this transgression by kerblasting Asklepios with a lightning bolt. For the story, see Pindar Pythian Odes 3, Ovid Metamorphoses 2.600–634, and Apollodoros 3.10.3. Apollodoros lists a number of individuals claimed by various sources to be the person Asklepios resurrects, including Hymenaios by the “Orphics” (see further Orphic fragment 365).

Asklepios later came to be regarded as divine, and he might originally have been a god who was “demoted” to a hero by the time of Homer. He had important cults at Epidauros and Kos, and people would come to his temples for healing. One notable (though not exclusive) feature of Asklepiian cult is incubation. Here the worshippers would spend the night in the god's temple in the hopes of receiving a dream vision that would be accompanied by healing (see also OH 86i). Examples in literature include Aristophanes' comedy Wealth, where the eponymous figure is cured of his proverbial blindness by undergoing such a ritual, and the fourth mimiambus of Herodas. The last words of Sokrates are to Kriton, asking him to offer a rooster to Asklepios, a fitting gesture for one who cheerfully looked on death as a release of the soul from the prison of the body (Plato Phaedo 118a). The tragic poet Sophokles is said to have played a role in bringing Asklepios' cult from Epidauros to Athens (ca. 420 BC). For more on the cult of Asklepios, see Burkert 1985, pp. 267–268, and Larson 2007, pp. 192–195. See also OH 9i.

Our hymn has very little connection with the mythological account or traditional cultic worship. Instead, it focuses on the soteriological aspect of the one who brings healing in a world filled with pain and suffering. Health is one of the material benefits that are a recurring concern in the collection (see OH 68i). For the placement of this hymn in the collection, see OH 69i.

1 Paian: For this name/title of Apollon, see OH 34.1n. The alternate form Paion is used of Herakles, who is also portrayed as a healer in his hymn (see OH 12.10+n). It is possible that just as Herakles' divine portion in myth is transferred to Olympos upon the immolation of his physical body and then deified (see OH 12i), so, too, perhaps there was an account now lost to us where Asklepios, immolated by Zeus' lightning, undergoes a similar process. Semele, the mother of Dionysos, was also deified after being struck by Zeus' lightning (see OH 44i). See also note to line 5.

2 charm away the pains: Asklepios is similarly described in his Homeric hymn (16.4) and in Pindar Pythian Odes 3.51–52. Musical incantations were used in healing (see West 1992, pp. 32–33), and it is a commonplace in Greek literature that music brings temporary relief to cares and worries (e.g., Hesiod Theogony 55). It might be that Apollon's role as musician led to his being associated with the healing arts; see OH 34i.

4: For the collocation of sickness and the inevitability of death, see Sophokles Antigone 361–364 (“for death alone/he [man] will not find an escape,/but escapes from invincible diseases/he has contrived”); also see Euripides Alkestis 963–972, which mentions the inability of Orpheus (or his poetry) and the “sons of Asklepios” (i.e., the Hippocratics) to ward off Necessity (i.e., death). One could interpret this line in a provisional sense; insofar as Asklepios can heal fatal diseases, he consequently “puts an end to death,” albeit temporarily. Another possibility is to understand “harsh” as being emphasized. The end of this hymn asks the divinity to “bring life to a good end,” which might be construed as requesting a painless one at a ripe old age (cf. OH 87.12+n); a similar idea is to be found in the following hymn (OH 68.9+n). Thus, the “harsh fate of death” would refer to death by disease. Given the last line of the hymn, it probably does not allude to the rewards in the afterlife the initiates might have expected to receive.

5 spirit of ... growth: The Greek word translated here is used elsewhere of Earth (OH 26.3), Eleusinian Demeter (OH 40.10), and, most notably, Adonis (OH 56.6), who also is killed and reborn (albeit as a flower). Dionysos, too, is closely tied to vegetation; see OH 30i and OH 50.5n. Indeed, there is some overlap in the stories of his and Asklepios' birth. Both have a mother killed by a jealous divinity, both are pulled out of fire by their father before being born, and both are given to wise hybrid creatures to be raised (Kheiron the centaur in the case of Asklepios, Silenos in the case of Dionysos; see OH 54.1+n). This affinity further enhances Asklepios' soteriological appeal. See also note to line 1 and OH 68.1n.

6 son of Phoibos Apollon: This accords with the accounts of Asklepios, and it is the only explicit mythical detail in this brief hymn. On the other hand, there are a number of instances in this hymn where a word is reminiscent of a cult epithet of Apollon in his capacity as healer. First, Asklepios is called Paian (line 1) and “savior” (line 8), as is the Apollon of cult. The phrase “you ward off evil” (line 5) is a translation of a single word, “apalexikakos,” which is a compound form of the word “alexikakos,” another cult epithet of Apollon. Similarly, “helper” (“epikouros”) at line 5 is closely related to the cult title “epikourios.” Both of these words appear only here in the collection.

68. To Hygeia

Hygieia, also spelled Hygieia (e.g., OH 67.7), is the Greek word for “health,” and, as with many other abstractions, has been vaguely personified as a goddess. She is usually conceived as the daughter of Asklepios, but she exceptionally is said to be his wife in the previous hymn. In Orphic fragment 262, she is the child of Eros (Love) and Persuasion; both of these deities are usually connected with Aphrodite (see OH 55.9n), and it is possible that the placement of the Asklepios/Hygieia pair of hymns was due to this association (see OH 69i; note, too, the overlap between Asklepios and Adonis, for which see OH 67.5n). We have the opening of a poem by Likymnios, a late fifth-century poet, addressing her as “glistening-eyed mother most high, / desired queen of the august seats of Apollon, / soft-smiling Hygieia” (PMG 769). Her worship was closely tied to that of Asklepios, but she was not always subordinate to him; at Sikyon (Pausanias 2.11.6), for example, women dedicated their hair and scraps of clothing to her cult statue. It is notable that a native of Sikyon, the poet Aripbron (late fifth or early fourth century ^{bc}), wrote a paian to Hygieia (PMG 813); he calls her the “most revered of the blessed ones” and avers that all human happiness requires her. Asklepios does not appear in it, although it is possible that the poem as we have it is only a fragment. In Athens, Hygieia could be invoked along with Zeus and Agathos Daimon (Good Divinity; see OH 73i) in libations poured after the washing of the hands and before the drinking in the symposium. Athene was also worshipped as Health at Athens (see OH 32.16n). In the Hippocratic oath, her name follows that of Asklepios. It is also possible that the placement of this hymn intentionally echoes the Hippocratic order, but more likely it just follows the usual practice of our composer to place hymns to subordinate divinities (here a male/female pair) after the more important member (see further OH 14.8–9n).

1 blooming: Health is naturally described as blooming, and her gift is described in similar terms (cf. “every house blossoms” in line 4). The bulk of Aripbron’s fragment cited in the introduction is a conditional sentence that runs as follows: if there is any pleasure for men, “then with you, blessed Hygieia, it is in full bloom and shines with the gentle talk of the Graces.” The theme of vegetation is found in the previous hymn, where Asklepios is called a “blessed spirit of joyful growth” (OH 67.5+n). It appears in Persephone’s hymn (OH 29.18–19), and it is a prominent motif in the hymns to Dionysos (see OH 50i+5n).

2 mother of all: Compare the Likymnios fragment, cited in the introduction to this hymn, and see also OH 10.1n.

6 loathed by Hades: Hygieia, in her capacity as a healer of disease and consequently a goddess who keeps living things alive, perforce delays Hades from increasing his kingdom.

7 apart from you: The same sentiment is found in Ariphon's poem; see note to line 1.

8 wealth: Some combination of wealth, riches, and prosperity are desired along with health throughout the collection; see OH 15.10–11n.

9 the many pains of old age: The idea here is not that Hygieia keeps young men healthy so that they survive to experience the suffering connected with old age. Rather, the wish is to reach old age without pains, i.e., in good health; cf. OH 29.19, OH 67.4n and OH 87.12+n.

69. To the Erinyes

The Erinyes (often translated as “Furies,” after the Latin Furiae, but the etymology is uncertain) are a group of female divinities who take vengeance for criminal acts; they are particularly concerned with the slaughtering of kin and the breaking of one's oath. We find different origins in the mythological record. Hesiod tells us that they were born from the blood that fecundated Earth after Kronos castrated his father Sky (Theogony 183–187). Although the violent Giants were also born from this act, it is especially appropriate for the Erinyes in light of their role as instruments of vengeance. Later in the poem (469–473), Rhea asks her parents Earth and Sky “to contrive such a plan that the birth of her dear child [Zeus]/would go unnoticed and her father's Erinys would take revenge.” Sometimes, though, the Erinyes are said to be daughters of Night (e.g., Aeschylus Eumenides 321–323). In either case, their origin is from a primeval, chthonic entity. Sophokles ingeniously combines both traditions by describing the Eumenides (who here are equivalent to the Erinyes; see below) as “daughters of Earth and Darkness” (Oedipus at Kolonos 40). Darkness is a male figure (Greek Skotos) and thus an appropriate masculine analogue to the feminine Night.

The Erinyes also have fertility associations, and this might have been their original domain. This connection with fertility is suggested by the fact that Earth is sometimes their mother. It is also evidenced by their close relation with the Eumenides. The two groups were originally distinct but later were usually identified with one another—the Erinyes representing the negative, punitive aspect of transgressing boundaries and the Eumenides the positive, beneficial result of maintaining such. A process of transformation is described in Aeschylus' Eumenides, where he connects the mythical Erinyes, who form the chorus to this play, with the cult of the Eumenides (called Semnai Theai, the August Goddesses, at Athens). At the end of the play, the Erinyes, having been denied their prerogative to mete out punishment to Orestes for his matricide, threaten to afflict Athens with disease that would make the land “leafless” and “childless”; after Athene assuages their anger by offering them honors in Athens, the Erinyes in turn promise benedictions for a prosperous land. This ability to destroy or nurture life hints at their powers of fertility. Furthermore, we find Demeter worshipped as Demeter Erinys (sometimes called just Erinys). According to Pausanias (8.25.4–10), Demeter, while searching for Persephone, turns herself into a horse in order to escape the unwanted attentions of Poseidon. Upon recognizing the ruse, he transforms himself into a horse as well. The result of their union is a mysterious daughter (whose name is not given) and the wonder horse Areion, who is sometimes said to have Earth as his mother. Demeter was given the name Erinys due to her initial anger over the encounter; compare the anger of Nemesis (OH 61i) and Melinoe (OH 71.4–5+n). The name Erinys is also found among other divinities in a Linear B tablet from Knossos, but nothing about this goddess is known. It may be that she was a completely independent fertility goddess who eventually became identified with Demeter, and, in a separate development, was expanded into a plurality representing different aspects of the original goddess, whatever they were (cf. note to line 1).

In cult, the Erinyes do not appear to have been directly worshipped. Aside from the cult of Demeter Erinys, who might not be connected with the group, there was a temple to the Erinyes of Laios and Oedipus in Sparta and its colony Thera (Herodotos 4.149.2); it is interesting to note that we have evidence for the close proximity between a tomb of Oedipus and the Eumenides' cult both in Athens and the Attic deme Kolonos. The Spartan cult, though, was founded by a particular clan in an effort to ward off continued infanticide (compare the threats made by the Erinyes in the Eumenides, which are another sign of their connection with fertility), but the nature of worship is unclear. In general, however, it is likely that in many cases the cults to the Eumenides are, in fact, to the Erinyes, albeit in their capacity to bring blessings. One approaches divinities for favors, and the invocation of the deity by means of a euphemistic name was felt to increase the chance that the divinity would appear in its friendlier guise. To call on the Erinyes by this name would increase the risk that the goddesses would appear in their unpleasant aspect (cf. OH O.12+n and OH 71.11n). By the same token, it is the Erinyes (alongside other chthonic powers)—and not the Eumenides—who are invoked in curse tablets, where their violent and deadly powers are deliberately sought for deleterious effect. For a similar reason, they also at times appear in magical spells, e.g., to help bring back a lover or catch a thief. The Erinyes are sometimes portrayed in the literature as physical manifestations of curses, and in fact are called Curses (Greek Arai) from time to time. They can also be found rationalized as a perpetrator's guilty conscience. Both the Erinyes and Eumenides are mentioned in the first few columns of the Derveni papyrus; see further OH 70i. Very little of the text can be read, let alone understood, and addressing the various possible interpretations is beyond the scope of this commentary; see Betegh 2004, pp. 74–91, 218–219.

The close connection between the Erinyes and Eumenides is maintained in our collection. The hymns to these goddesses form a contiguous pair (cf. OH 14.8–9n), and there are many correspondences in language and imagery. Some of these are pointed out in the notes below, as well as in the following hymn. Yet, despite these similarities, the two groups are not identified with one another but rather are kept distinct. The Eumenides are given a genealogy, for example. Even more surprising, in view of the tradition, is that they are described in demonic terms—more so than the Erinyes. Further differences are that each group is summoned for somewhat different reasons and given different offerings. Since the Hymns were composed for a specific, pragmatic purpose, such a material distinction implies a conceptual one. The negative/positive polarity of the Erinyes/Eumenides found in earlier times has been effaced; instead we have two very similar sets of divinities, invoked in a slightly different, but related, manner. This allows for a certain consistency with the often conflicting literary and religious traditions. A similar explanation applies to the close relationship of the Erinyes with the Fates (see OH 59i) and Nemesis (see OH 61i).

This hymn begins a series (OH 69–77) whose placement within the collection is curious. The other hymns show evidence of having been deliberately positioned (see in particular OH 15i, OH 30i, OH 55i, OH 61i, OH 79i, and OH 87i), but these hymns seem out of place, a mere listing of pairs (except for the hymn to Melinoe, which is nevertheless closely related to the Erinyes/Eumenides pair and clearly belongs with them; see OH 71i). Now, it may very well be that our composer did not know how to integrate these entities and so just tossed them together in a sort of random miscellany near the end of the collection. On the other hand, one thread that ties them together is that all of the addressees are much more bound up with cult worship than with literary mythology. The exception to this proves the rule: both the Muses and Mnemosyne are explicitly connected with cult practice in their hymns (OH 76.7 and OH 77.9–10), and note that memory plays an important role in the eschatology of some of the Bacchic gold tablets. Here, though, Mnemosyne is invoked right before Dawn to help the initiates, who have probably been worshipping the entire night, to remember the rest of the hymns and the ritual (see OH 77i). The block of OH 69–77 may further be connected with the Dionysian hymns (OH 45–54) through their cultic, mythological, and linguistic associations (e.g., the maenadic imagery in OH 69, Leukothea the addressee of OH 72, the Muses and Mnemosyne as founders of mystic rites). There might also be ring composition with the final group of hymns, as they end with death (literally) and the OH 69–77 group begins with death figures (Erinyes, Eumenides, and Melinoe).

1 Tisiphone, Allekto, noble Megaira: We have only sparse attestations for the names, one of which is Apollodoros (1.1.4), whose source seems ultimately to have been derived from an Orphic theogony (West 1983, pp. 121–126). Therefore, it is possible that they are Orphic in origin. The names are significant. “Tisiphone” means “vengeance for murder,” Allekto (sometimes Alekto) “unceasing,” and Megaira “grudge.” Taken together, they represent in particular the Erinyes’ role as punishers of murderers. The dead victim bears a “grudge” that requires “vengeance for the murder,” and this grudge is “unceasing” until the murderer is punished. The same exact line appears in the Orphic Argonautika (968), and these are the only places where all three Erinyes are named together in extant poetry. Persephone appears in place of Tisiphone in a prayer to Moon found in a magical handbook, but it is possible that this was a lapse by the writer; Persephone’s name appears again a few lines later in the text; see note to line 16.

2 Bacchic cries: Throughout this hymn, the Erinyes are described through Dionysian and particularly maenadic imagery (see OH 1.3n and OH 52i). Like the maenads, they raise Bacchic cries, they are active at night (line 3), they are rabid (line 6), they howl (line 6), they wear animal skins (line 7), and snakes adorn their hair (line 16; see note below). This association already appears in Greek tragedy; for references and an interpretation, see Johnston 1999, pp. 253–256. For loud noise in Dionysian worship, see OH 30.1n.

4 Styx: A river in the underworld. Its name means “hate.” The Olympian gods, when making an oath, swear by its waters (Hesiod Theogony 775–806). Hesiod tells us that the Erinyes assisted in the birth of Oath, whose mother was Strife (Works and Days 803–804). The water of the Styx is described as splendid in Orpheus’ address to Mousaios (OH O.29), and this is the only other mention of the river in our collection. Styx is a daughter of Okeanos; see OH 83.3n.

9 phantoms airy, invisible: Two closely related passages in Hesiod seem relevant to this description. First, Dike, whenever wronged in a court of law, visits ruin on the city clothed in airy mist (Works and Days 222–224). A little later in the same poem, Hesiod addresses the kings and reminds them that “upon this earth that nurtures many Zeus can levy/thirty thousand deathless guardians of mortal men, / who keep a watchful eye over verdicts and cruel acts/as they rove the whole earth, clothed in mist” (252–255). Thereupon Dike is represented as a girl who runs to daddy Zeus whenever men make false charges in order that vengeance be taken on them (the verb used, “apoteisei” (260), is cognate with the “tisi” in Tisiphone; see note to line 1). See also OH 61i and OH 62i. The Erinyes as described in our hymn have a similar function, and it is very suggestive that a fragment attributed to Orpheus (Orphic fragment 851) implies that the Erinyes are the agents of Zeus’ indignation at those who do not respect the ordinances of their “ancestors.” A forged letter attributed to Herakleitos explicitly connects the Erinyes with the Hesiodic guardians: “Many are the Erinyes of justice [dike], the watchers of moral failings. Hesiod lied when he said there were thirty thousand. They are few and not sufficient for the evil in the world. There is much wickedness” (9.3.1). For the Erinyes’ connection with Dike, see note to line 15 below. Homer twice uses the epithet “mist-roving” (Iliad 9.571, 19.87) to describe an Erinyes; the same word is used to describe Moon (OH 9.2), but there the word does not have the connotation of invisibility. Words denoting “air(y)” or “mist(y)” appear with some frequency in the Hymns. Usually they merely refer to the element “air” and are not used descriptively of a phantasmal appearance. Both ideas, however, are combined, when Zephyros is called “airy, ... invisible” (OH 81.6), just as the Erinyes are here. For more information on airy phantoms, see OH 71i.

15 you gaze as the eye of Dike: For the eye of Dike, see OH 62.1+n. The Erinyes are often connected with Dike in literature. The chorus of Erinyes in Aeschylus’ Eumenides declare that fear of their punishment makes a man obey Dike (490–565); compare the Sisyphos fragment mentioned in OH 61.5n. Their role in the social order of man also finds curious reflection in a fragment of the Pre-Socratic philosopher Herakleitos (Kirk, Raven, and Schofield 1983, no. 226), which happens also to be cited in the Derveni papyrus. Herakleitos says that the sun will not overstep its proper measure; otherwise the Erinyes, “assistants of Dike,” will find him out (see also note to line 9). A similar portrayal of the Erinyes is found in an enigmatic saying attributed to Pythagoras by Hippolytos: “If you travel abroad from your own [land?], do not turn back; otherwise the Erinyes, helpers of Dike, will come after you” (Refutation of All Heresies 6.26.1). Perhaps the mention of the “speedy flames of the sun and the moon’s glow” (line 10) is a remnant of such philosophical speculation. Our hymn certainly portrays the Erinyes as part of divine order: they “howl over Necessity’s dictates” (line 6) and are called “goddesses of fate” (line 16; see note below). Their connection with Dike reinforces the idea that not only is there order in the world but that it also possesses an ethical dimension; see further OH 64i.

16 snake-haired: A traditional characteristic in literature and art. Aeschylus is the first extant writer to describe the Erinyes thus (Libation Bearers 1048–1050), and, if Pausanias (1.28.6) is to be believed, he was the first one to do so. The same word appears in line 10 of the next hymn in the same metrical position (and see OH 70.9–10+n).

16 many-shaped goddesses of fate: Compare “of the thousand faces” (line 8; the two words both end in “-morph,” “shape”). Their connection with “Necessity’s dictates” (line 6) is consistent with their equivalence to the Fates. In Vergil’s Aeneid, the Erinyes Allekto is described as having “a thousand [= many, countless] names” (7.337), and Servius in his comment on this line reports that Euripides in one of his tragedies (now lost) has Allekto claim that she was not born to fulfill a single function (implied are her traditional roles, as described above) but that she is Fortune (probably Tyche in the original), Nemesis, Fate, and Necessity (fragment 1022). This probably is what Herakleitos and Pythagoras had in mind (see note to line 15), and, indeed, Euripides might have been directly influenced by one or both of them. A prayer to Moon in a magical handbook also calls the Erinyes “many-shaped.” Even more pertinent, at the beginning of this prayer Moon is equated with them (they are named here, with Persephone in place of Tisiphone; see note to line 1), Dike, and the Fates, while at the end she is equated with Necessity, Fate, Erinys, and Dike (PGM 4.2795–2799; 2858–2860; see also note to line 9). This shows how easily the Erinyes could be seen as a different manifestation of similar divinities, not just of the Eumenides. Usually, though, the Fates and Erinyes are kept separate. Both are, in some accounts, daughters of Night, and so could be considered sisters (see the introduction to this hymn). Agamemnon blames Zeus, Fate, and the Erinys for his ruinous dispute with Akhilleus (Iliad 19.86–90). In the Eumenides, Fate is said to have conferred on the Erinyes their prerogatives (334–339). In our collection the two groups are kept distinct, despite the number of verbal and conceptual correspondences between their hymns (as with the Eumenides; see OH 70i). They are both concerned with the moral order of the cosmos (see OH 59i), albeit from different perspectives. The Fates work from above—while still maintaining chthonic associations (see OH 59.3–4n)—and the Erinyes from below, with us hapless mortals caught in between.

70. To the Eumenides

The Eumenides, the “kindly-disposed ones,” are a group of female divinities similar to, and usually identified with, the Erinyes. In Athens, they were called the August Goddesses (Semnai Theai). In Oedipus at Kolonos 461–492, Sophokles gives a literary description of a rite of atonement to the Eumenides, and their worship has a significant role in this play. For more information about the Eumenides, and their relation to the Erinyes, see the introduction and notes to the previous hymn. They are usually considered beneficial goddesses, as their name would suggest. Unlike the Erinyes, they are not invoked in spells or curses. In our hymn, however, they are given a more Stygian and infernal character that is usually reserved for the Erinyes. The Eumenides were in fact originally fertility goddesses with definite chthonic associations. This can be seen in Aeschylus Eumenides 903–967, where the transformed Erinyes promise first and foremost bountiful production. The Orphic tradition seems to have recognized their primeval function as well, for in Orphic fragment 293, they are called “flower-producers.” See also the note to lines 2–3. The Derveni papyrus enigmatically equates the Eumenides with souls.

2–3: Chthonic Zeus is another name for Hades; see OH 18.3+n. Persephone is also called the mother of the Erinyes at OH 29.6. The parentage given in the Hymns differs from the one found in the mainstream tradition (see OH 69i). However, two fragments ascribed to Orpheus (Orphic fragment 292–293) also present Hades and Persephone as the parents of “the Eumenides under the earth.” This chthonic connection is not exclusively Orphic; for example, the Athenian Semnai Theai dwelt in a cave beneath the earth (cf. Aeschylus Eumenides 1004ff.; also OH 69.3–4 and 8). Orpheus is also supposed to have written that Demeter prophesied to her daughter that she would “mount the blooming bed of Apollon/and give birth to splendid children, their faces burning with fire” (Orphic fragment 284). These children are the Eumenides, who are also described as “bright-faced” in Orphic fragment 293. It would seem, then, that the Orphic tradition had two different fathers for the Eumenides. However, the name Apollon was often connected with the verb “apollumi,” “I destroy,” and it is possible that Apollon here is used as an oracular periphrasis for Hades, “the destroyer” (just as he is called “Chthonic Zeus” in our hymn); another possibility is that the different fathers represent two alternate versions that were considered Orphic in antiquity. These two interpretations are discussed by West 1983, pp. 95–98, 243–244.

4–5: The Erinyes also watch over human beings “as the eye of Dike, ever in charge of justice” (OH 69.15), and they “howl over Necessity’s dictates” (OH 69.6). Both groups are described by the adjective “timōroi” (translated “retribution” at OH 69.7 and “punish” here), which is used in the same metrical position. These goddesses, then, are described as having more or less the same function. One interesting difference, though, is that the Eumenides are said to be concerned with “impious mortals,” whereas the Erinyes, like the Fates, watch over all mortals, just and unjust alike.

6 black-skinned queens: The color black is often associated with the underworld and its denizens. The Eumenides are also “nocturnal” (line 9) and “of the night” (line 10, and see note to line 10). The word translated as “black-skinned” is also used of Sky (OH 4.7, there translated “dark blue”), and Aphrodite is called on to join the company of the “dark-faced nymphs” (OH 55.22). The Eumenides are similarly called “sable-skinned” at Euripides Orestes 321.

6–7 your awesome eyes ... / ... darts of light: Compare the description of the Eumenides mentioned in Orphic fragment 284 and 293, cited in the note to lines 2–3. In a hymn to Moon found in the magical papyri, she is called “flesh devourer”

(PGM 4.2866) in a context where she is equated with the Erinyes and others (see OH 69.16n “many-shaped”), and there are a number of close verbal correspondences between this passage and our hymn (see further note to line 10). Moon is also said to be seen eating human flesh in other parts of the same spell book. A curse spell calls on “the flesh-devouring gods,” among others, for its fulfillment.

8 frightful: The same word recurs at line 10, where it is rendered “terrible.” It is a noun in ancient Greek, and its adjectival form is used once of the monster Ekhidna (Orphic fragment 81.2) and once of Ares (Oracula Sibyllina 13.78). These are the only appearances of the word and its cognates in ancient Greek. A closely related adjective is used of the Erinyes at OH 69.8 (“dreaded maidens”).

9 paralyzing the limbs with madness: Insanity is typical of how the Erinyes lay low their victims, as they themselves mention in their binding spell over Orestes at Aeschylus Eumenides 329–330 and 342–343. It is again notable that the Eumenides are attributed with a negative function normally associated with the Erinyes. Deliverance from madness or frenzy appears elsewhere in the Hymns: see OH 71.11n.

10 snake-haired, terrible maidens of the night: The Erinyes are also described as “snake-haired” (OH 69.16; same metrical position), and there are only two other appearances of this word in ancient Greek. It is again used of the Eumenides by the first-century AD philosopher Annaeus Cornutus, and it is one of the many epithets lavished upon Moon in her hymn in the magical papyri (PGM 4.2863). This hymn bears many striking verbal similarities to ours: in addition to this word, both goddesses are dark (line 6 ~ 4.2863), eat flesh (see note to lines 6–7), inflict madness (line 8 ~ 4.2868; see also OH 71i), and are “nocturnal” (line 9 ~ 4.2855). The Eumenides’ connection with the night is established in this line as well, and the word translated here as “of the night” is the same one translated as “nocturnal” in the hymn to the Erinyes in the same metrical position (OH 69.3); for other close similarities between these two hymns, see the notes to lines 4–5 and 8.

71. To Melinoe

Melinoe is an obscure figure. This hymn is the sole literary testimony of her existence, and the only other appearance of her name is found inscribed on a magical device, which was presumably used for divination (see Morand 2001, pp. 185–88). On this device, the name appears with others (including Persephone) in an invocation to Hekate. An affinity of Melinoe to Hekate is found in the Hymns. Both are “saffron-cloaked” (line 1 ~ OH 1.2), called “nymph” (line 1 ~ OH 1.8), and are invoked to come in good spirits. They also are active at night (line 9 ~ OH 1.5). Hekate is elsewhere associated with driving mortals mad (see note to line 11 and OH 1i). However, the two are not quite the same in the collection, as they do not share the same father. Melinoe is represented more as an infernal, psychic force—a spectral embodiment of Persephone’s anger that irrationally lashes out at mortals—and hence the need to appease her. Hekate, too, was commonly believed to be capable of inflicting insanity by means of such spooks. Melinoe’s ability to cause madness or insanity here is reminiscent of the Eumenides’ similar capability described in the previous hymn. There are other explicit connections between the two, which explains why the hymn to Melinoe follows that of the Eumenides (see OH 69i). It is particularly significant that they are born from Persephone, especially since she is not the traditional mother of the Eumenides. Melinoe is asked to “show to the initiates a kindly ... face” (line 12), and the word for “kindly” (“eumenes”) is the root from which the name Eumenides is derived. Moreover, the name Melinoe might provide a further clue. One possible meaning of this word is “gentle-minded,” which would be quite analogous to the euphemistic name Eumenides (see OH 70i). However, the name may also be derived from a Greek word meaning “yellow” and thus be a euphemism for Hekate in her role as a moon goddess (see Ricciardelli 2000, p. 495). Moon is described as “amber-colored” (OH 9.6), and both goddesses receive the same offering (aromatic herbs). Madness was also associated with the moon in antiquity, as can be seen in the etymology of the English word “lunatic,” which is derived from Latin “luna” (“moon”); see also OH 1i and OH 70.10n. Nevertheless, given the lack of evidence, we should probably not pedantically press for a meaning. The name Melinoe could very well have had both connotations, the color and the mood, for the initiates, however her name was generally understood. In any event, Melinoe should be considered to belong to the cluster of goddesses that include Hekate, Moon, Artemis, and Persephone, here assimilated to a degree (by genealogy and function) to the Erinyes/Eumenides pair.

1 saffron-cloaked: The epithet occurs in the same metrical position in Hekate’s hymn as well as in Hesiod's description of Enyo (one of the Graiai) and the Okeanid Telesto (Theogony 273 and 358, respectively). Homer uses it of Dawn, and Alkman of the Muses (PMGF 46). "Saffron-cloaked" here might just be a decorative epithet, or it could be a play on the color implied by Melinoë's name (see the introduction to this hymn). If Melinoë is another name for Hekate in her capacity as moon goddess, then the choice of the word might be a conscious play on Homeric usage, connecting diurnal and nocturnal light.

1 nymph: This does not designate Melinoë as a member of a group of lesser divinities, but rather a young woman of marriageable age; see OH 51i. The singular is also used of Hekate (OH 1.8) and Tethys (OH 22.1; here it means "bride").

2–3: Very similar phrasing is found in the hymn to Adonis (OH 56.9), who is also born from Persephone.

2 Kokytos: A river in the underworld; its name means "wailing." It is mentioned once more in the collection as the location of the dwelling of Chthonic Hermes (OH 57.1), just as the Styx marks the home of the Erinyes (OH 69.4) and Acheron is the throne of Hades (OH 18.10). According to Orphic fragment 340, the souls of those who committed injustices in their lives come to Tartaros by way of Kokytos (see OH 18.2n).

3 Kronion: A common epithet of Zeus, meaning "son of Kronos."

4–5: The story is obscure, and interpretation is made more difficult by the fact that the original Greek is problematic, perhaps corrupt. The "wily plots" are necessary since Persephone is probably already the bride of Hades. Most likely they indicate that Zeus had disguised himself, as he often does in his amorous pursuits. In Orphic mythology, he took the form of a snake when he fathered Dionysos by Persephone. Since Dionysos has the same parentage in the Hymns (OH 30.6–7), it is possible that this act was understood by the initiates to have also produced Melinoë; see OH 29i. The snake, as symbol of chthonic powers, would be an appropriate form to produce such an infernal creature, and both Dionysos and Melinoë are connected with madness. Compare Odyssey 11.633–635, where Odysseus is afraid that Persephone might send a ghost or a monster after him during his stay in the land of the dead.

8–9 shining in darkness— / ... gloom of night: Melinoë's activity at night belies her chthonic nature. Line 8 has been interpreted to allude to different phases of the moon (Ricciardelli 2000, p. 498). Compared with the rest of the hymn, though, it seems more likely that the various stages of visibility are more naturally understood as a concrete extension of how Melinoë vexes mortals. Shining (or gleaming) in darkness is found also in the hymn to Night, describing both her (OH 3.7) and the fears she is asked to disperse (OH 3.14).

10 O queen of those below: Almost the same exact phrase is used of Melinoë's mother, Persephone, in OH 29.6 ("queen of the netherworld").

11: A very similar request is made of Pan (OH 11.23+7n). For the madness caused by Pan ("panic"), see OH 11i. It is typical that a divinity has the power to cure what lies in its power to cause. Dionysos is able to remove madness as well as bring it (see OH 53i). Rituals to cure madness are attested for the Korybantes, Kybele, and, possibly, Hekate; see Dodds 1951, pp. 75–80 (particularly pp. 77–78.). Rhea is often identified with Kybele, and so it is not surprising to find that she, like Melinoë, has a connection to madness in the Hymns (see OH 14.3+n), although she is invoked at the end of her hymn to banish "death and the filth of pollution," not madness. The Korybantes were connected with Rhea-Kybele, and it might be the case that their rituals to alleviate madness were not distinct from but rather part of Kybele's. Their namesake Korybas bears some affinity to Melinoë in this regard; he is summoned to avert fantasies (the Greek word is related to that of "apparitions" in line 6) from the soul (OH 39.4 and 10), as well as fear (OH 39.3) and anger (OH 39.9). The collection's concern with madness is probably to be understood in light of the overall strategy in summoning divinities. Encountering the divine is always a risky endeavor; one can never be certain how one stands in the eyes of such beings. Contact with the more-than-human carries with it the danger of losing one's speech, one's senses, even one's sanity. This concern is reflected throughout the collection in that many of the hymns either explicitly ask that madness be driven away or implicitly do so by requesting the divinity addressed to come with a peaceful disposition; see OH 30i and OH 69i and further Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 146–148, 155–156. Comparable is the petition at the end of the hymn to Dream that requests "do not through weird apparitions show me evil signs" (see OH 86.18+n); note that the shapes of Melinoë are also described as "weird" (line 7).

72. To Tyche

Tyche, which is the Greek word for "fortune" or "chance," is the personification of a concept that became very prominent in Hellenistic and especially in Roman times. She is not found in Homer but Hesiod counts her among the Okeanids (Theogony 360). Similarly, we find a Tyche among the nymphs who were picking flowers with Persephone before she was abducted by Hades (Homeric Hymn to Demeter 2.420; see also Orphic fragment 387, from a similarly themed poem attributed to Orpheus). It is not clear whether they were conceived as individual personifications of the concept tychē or if the name is merely a “speaking name.” We do find Tyche personified outside of epic. Alkman calls her the daughter of Forethought and sister of Eunomia and Persuasion (PMGF 64). Pindar addresses her as “Tyche the Savior” at Olympian Odes 12.2 and elsewhere numbers her among the Fates as their mightiest member (fragment 41, preserved by Pausanias 7.26.8; see also below). The tragedians of the fifth century occasionally mention a personified Tyche. In Euripides’ Kyklops, Odysseus utters a short prayer to Hephaistos and Sleep for help in blinding the Kyklops, and at the end of the prayer he claims that if the gods fail to heed his request, it will be necessary to regard “tychē” as a “divinity” and one more powerful than the gods (606–607). The concept, even in its personified aspect, has been tenacious and one that still survives in Greece.

Tyche as an actual goddess instead of a mere personification of an abstract idea does not seem to occur until the fourth century BC, when what we might call a folk religious attitude emerges, as is evidenced by the picture gleaned from the orators and the poets of New Comedy. Tyche becomes a sort of “Lady Luck,” who may bring unexpected fortune (or disaster) to enterprises. A parallel development is the concept of a personal Tyche that attends an individual from birth and is “responsible” for that person’s fortunes in life. This is a concept akin to the Fates “weaving” each person’s destiny; see OH 59.15n, and compare the stars’ role in personal destiny (OH 7i). Pindar, as mentioned above, included Tyche among the Fates and the plural Tychai are personified and mentioned alongside the Fates in the magical papyri. Mesomedes identified both Tyche and Fate with Nemesis in his hymn to that goddess (see OH 61i). For a brief summary of this transformation of Tyche in the fourth century, see Mikalson 1998, pp. 62–63. In terms of cult, there is no evidence of any before the fourth century BC, unless Pausanias’ description of a statue of Tyche in Smyrna carved by Boupalos, who was active in the sixth century BC, was used as a cult figure (4.30.6). According to Pausanias, this was the first depiction of Tyche with a heavenly sphere above her head and of her holding in one hand the horn of Amaltheia (later known as the cornucopia, or “horn of plenty”), the wonder-goat who suckled the infant Zeus (see also Pausanias 7.26.8). The horn is common in the iconography of Tyche in later times. Pausanias also mentions a statue of Tyche holding the infant Wealth in her hands in her sanctuary at Thebes from the early fourth century (9.16.1–2). Tyche became particularly associated with the protection and foundation of cities, and it is interesting to note that already Pindar, according to Pausanias, is said to have called her “pherepolis” (“she who supports the city”; Pausanias 4.30.6 = Pindar fragment 39).

An anonymous poetic fragment in hymnic style addressed to Tyche is preserved by Stobaeus (1.6.13 = PMG 1019). This fragment emphasizes the blessings she may bring, and notable is the light imagery that, as often in Greek poetry, is symbolic of deliverance from ills (compare the Pindar Olympian Odes 12). In our hymn, Tyche is just as capable of granting wealth as poverty. Furthermore, as is appropriate for this collection, she takes on a more chthonic coloring than elsewhere (except, perhaps, in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter and the related lost Orphic work). She has been ostensibly integrated into the Dionysian-Orphic scheme. For the position of this hymn and the next in the collection, see OH 69i.

2 goddess of the roads: Hekate is normally associated with roads, particularly intersections (see OH 1.1). It seems that Tyche is here being assimilated to Hekate (see OH 36.2), and it is perhaps not a coincidence that this hymn follows after the one to Melinoe, who also has similar associations (see OH 71i). In Hesiod's Theogony, Hekate is similarly represented as being capable of granting numerous kinds of blessings to those she favors but also of withholding such gifts when she so chooses (see OH 1i, and compare with lines 6–8 in this hymn). The identification with “Artemis the guide” in the following line reinforces this supposition, as Artemis is but another aspect of Hekate (see OH 36i). We also find mention of Moon in this connection, and it is interesting to note that Tyche is invoked as another name for Moon in the magical papyri—in fact, right after the name “Selene” (PGM 4.2665). Tyche is not one of the divinities mentioned in Orpheus' address to Mousaios, which perhaps speaks for her identification with Hekate-Artemis-Moon in the collection.

4 Eubouleus: In our hymns, this is another name for Dionysos, Zeus, and Adonis. In Orphic cosmogony, it is also another name of Protogonos (see OH 6i). Here it seems to be used of Zeus, who is the father of Artemis. See OH 41.8n.

73. To Daimon

In Greek, the word “daimōn” denotes a vague appellation of divine force, sometimes personified, but more often not. All divinities can be called a daimōn, and so can human beings after they have died. The Golden Race in Hesiod's myth of the five races become such figures after their extinction (Works and Days 121–126); in later times, it was common to refer to the deceased as a daimōn in grave inscriptions. The modern idea of a demon, that is, a malevolent supernatural entity, is first attested for Xenokrates, one of Plato's students. For the overlap and distinction between daimōn and god, see Burkert 1985, pp. 179–181. The ancient Greeks did not like unexplained phenomena and often cast about for something to firmly ground their understanding of the source of their experiences (see also OH 59i). Desire in early Greek poets, for example, is not an emotion welling from within, but an external force that emanates from the eyes of the beloved. Sokrates attributed the premonition he felt before engaging in an action to be somehow “daimōn-like.” Indeed, in speaking of divine activity, the ancient Greeks often took such careful precautions. An unknown cause of an event can be expressed by saying “a god” or “some god” willed it to be thus, and the efficacy of divine power might be qualified by, e.g., statements that the gods “somehow” or “in some way” accomplish such and such. The concept of daimōn coheres to a large extent with this sentiment and provided a sort of a blank check, as it were, for causal explanations. It was particularly linked to individual fortunes, both good and bad.

It is specifically in this capacity that we find daimōn worshipped as a household god, where the concept is personified to a degree and the entity so produced called Agathos Daimon (Good Daimon). Libations poured before the drinking of wine could be accompanied with an invocation to this divinity, and at symposia he would be invoked along with Zeus Soter (the “savior”) and Hygieia (see OH 68i). The connection with personal fortune brings Agathos Daimon in contact with (Agathe) Tyche (Good Fortune), and they are often found together. In Isidoros’ hymns (first century ^{BC}) Isis is associated with Agathe Tyche and another Egyptian goddess, Renenutet, who was connected with individual fortunes. This figure has a male consort, Sokonopis, who corresponds to Renenutet’s consort Shay and whom Isidoros identifies with Agathos Daimon (see Vanderlip 1972, p. 6). (Agathe) Tyche and (Agathos) Daimon are also sometimes invoked together in the magical papyri.

Our author seems to be intentionally incorporating elements of Agathos Daimon in this hymn, particularly the concern for material blessings and his connection with Tyche (subtly expressed thematically and linguistically). That the addressee is twice called Zeus, however, indicates something more. The wealth discussed in this hymn primarily refers to agricultural wealth (cf. “livelihood” in line 2). It is not surprising, then, that there are a number of points of contact between this hymn and others in the collection addressed to chthonic deities connected with agriculture, particularly Hades. This god is sometimes addressed as “Chthonic Zeus,” as we find in the hymn to Plouton (see OH 18.3+n). Thus Daimon might represent a particular aspect of Hades. However, it is much more likely that it is Zeus himself that is being addressed. Despite being a celestial god, Zeus was also intimately involved in fertility. Rain is necessary for the crops to grow, and, as the god who sends the rain, Zeus may legitimately be called the one “who gives livelihood to mortals” (line 2). Moreover, worship of Zeus had a chthonic aspect as well, particularly as a tutelary household god. In this, he bears a close affinity to Agathos Daimon, and it would be quite natural to refer to Zeus as Daimon. Two particular incarnations of Zeus that seem relevant to this hymn are Zeus Ktesios (Zeus of Wealth) and Zeus Meilikhios (Zeus the Gentle); see the notes to lines 2 and 4. It should also be mentioned that the other hymns addressed to Zeus focus on the celestial side of this god, particularly as the great weather god (OH 15 and OH 19–20). It would be very strange if the chthonic side, one that was quite prevalent in actual religious practice and that is particularly germane to our cult, would be neglected in the collection. Comparable, perhaps, is the separate treatment of Hermes and Chthonic

Hermes (see OH 57i). When calling on the gods, the Greeks preferred to err on the side of inclusiveness.

Three different daimōn figures are mentioned in Orpheus' address to Mousaios. There we find a bifurcation into a "holy" daimōn opposed to a daimōn responsible for the ills that befall mortal men (line 31); the holy daimōn is presumably responsible for the beneficial events and might actually have been considered to be Agathos Daimon by the cult. The next line speaks of divinities (daimones) who inhabit every nook and cranny of the cosmos. Consistency might be imagined by postulating a hierarchy of daimones: a Zeus-daimōn at the head, followed by a personification of two aspects of Daimon—one good, one bad—and finally an acknowledgment of the plurality of daimones that are connected with the various individual fortunes. But perhaps we should not overly press for a systematic theology; the notion of a daimōn is very fluid, encompassing many senses and fulfilling different functions. The hymns capture both the idea of a race of guardian spirits, already found in Hesiod (see OH 69.9n) and the personified abstraction of such an idea, as seen in the person of the Agathos Daimon. The hymn to Tyche would naturally suggest one for an individualized daimōn, a female-male pairing that is repeated in the subsequent hymns to Leukothea and Palaimon as well as throughout the collection (see OH 14.8–9n). The identification of Daimon with Zeus in his chthonic aspect is natural and another example of the complex web of associations that form the tissue of our collection.

2 gentle: This same adjective is used of Tyche in the same exact place in the previous hymn. The daimones mentioned by Orpheus in his opening address are included among divinities referred to as "gentle." The Greek word, "meilikhios," is also a cult title of Zeus. Under this name, he was worshipped both as a household and polis divinity. The power to grant good or bad fortune was his, and sacrifices were made as a way to stay in this god's good graces. An overview of Zeus Meilikhios (and other similar incarnations) may be found in Larson 2007, pp. 21–23.

2 who gives birth to all: Zeus is often considered the father of gods and men, and the epithet "who gives birth to all" is also used in the hymn of Astrapaio Zeus (OH 20.5, translated there as "begetter of all"). See also OH 15.3–5+n. A very similar epithet is used of the sky gods Sky (OH 4.1) and Kronos (OH 13.5), as well as Zeus' son Herakles (OH 12.6). This also speaks against interpreting Daimon as Hades in this hymn.

4 giver of wealth: Cognates of the epithet translated here as "giver of wealth" ("ploutodotēn") are used to describe Demeter ("giver of all," OH 40.3) and Hades ("you give the wealth of the year's fruits," OH 18.5). We also find it used to characterize one of the functions the Golden Race possesses after they die out and become daimones (Hesiod Works and Days 126). Isidoros applies this epithet to both Isis-Renenutet-Tyche (1.1) and Sokonopis-Agathos Daimon (2.10). At the end of a spell in the magical papyri that details the construction of a phylactery to bring success, the god addressed is invoked as Aion, giver of wealth, and Agathos Daimon (PGM 4.3165–3166; for Aion, see OH O.28–29n). Zeus Ktesios (Zeus of Wealth) is also called “ploutodotēs.” This is another aspect of Zeus, similar in function to that of Zeus Meilikhios (see Larson 2007, p. 21). Very relevant for our hymn is that Zeus Ktesios is found with Tyche and Asklepios as a trinity of household divinities capping a list of gods in a late dedicatory inscription found in Stratonicea (Asia Minor). Pausanias reports that Zeus Plousios (Zeus of Wealth) had a temple in Sparta (3.19.7).

74. To Leukothea

Leukothea, the “white goddess,” is represented in literature as a sea divinity. Her first appearance is in the Odyssey, where she attempts to aid the foundering Odysseus (5.333–353). She was once the mortal named Ino, one of the daughters of Kadmos and a sister of Semele, Dionysos’ mother (Hesiod Theogony 975–976). Both names are mentioned together at OH O.34. Ino became the nurse of Dionysos after Semele had been incinerated by Zeus’ magnificence (see OH 44i). A jealous Hera drives Ino’s husband, Athamas, insane, and he kills their older son, Learchos. A terrified Ino scoops up the younger son, Melikertes, and is chased by the raving Athamas until she reaches a precipice overlooking the sea. Cornered, she plunges herself and her son into the sea. The sea divinities take pity on her and transform her into one of their own. She receives a new name, Leukothea. Melikertes, too, is transformed and becomes the god Palaimon (see further OH 75i). See Ovid’s Metamorphoses 4.416–542, and for a somewhat different account, Apollodoros 3.4.3. In other versions of the myth, Ino kills or attempts to kill the children of a previous wife of Athamas, Nephele (Apollodoros 1.9.1), or of a later one, Themisto (Hyginus Fabula 4, based on the lost Ino of Euripides; cf. Fabula 1 for a different account). The significance of the name White Goddess is obscure. The white may refer to the foam of the sea and/or the complexion of her skin; compare the names of the sea-nymphs Galatea (“gala” = “milk”) and Tyro (“turos” = “cheese”).

Leukothea played an important role in cult. Aristotle reports that the Eleans asked Xenophanes (later sixth century BC) whether they should sacrifice and sing dirges to Leukothea; he answered that if they thought she was a goddess, they should sacrifice but not lament, but if they thought she was human, then they should lament but not sacrifice (Rhetoric 1400b5–8). Cicero, writing in the first century BC, mentions that Leukothea was worshipped throughout Greece (De natura deorum 3.15). The Megarians believed that the corpse of Ino had washed up on their land, and they claimed that they were the first to call her Leukothea (Pausanias 1.42.7); they also thought the rock from which she jumped was in their territory (Pausanias 1.44.8). Ino was worshipped in a few places in Lakonia. At Epidauros Limera, people would throw barley cakes into a lake. If the cake sunk, it was a sign of the goddess' acceptance; if it floated, it indicated her rejection (Pausanias 3.23.8). There was also a dream oracle on the road to Thalamai; the sanctuary had bronze statues of Sun and Pasiphae, who Pausanias claims was not a native goddess and whose name was a title for Moon (3.26.1). For more on dream oracles, see OH 86i. Leukothea is invoked along with Hermes, Hekate, Ploutos, Persephone, Artemis, Demeter, and anonymous heroes to protect a grave in an inscription found in Pantikapaion (modern day Kerch); all of the deities have the epithet "chthonian." A cultic connection with Dionysos is perhaps to be read in an inscription on an altar found in Syria. It reads "the vineyard of the goddess Leukothea and Melikertes. Asklas, son of Thaddaios, dedicated the altar at his own expense out of piety" (Sartre 1993, p. 52). The context is unclear, but in the mention of a vineyard belonging to Leukothea and Melikertes it is tempting to read a Dionysian association, perhaps in a cultic context (also see the collection of inscriptions in Sartre's article for more Leukothea inscriptions from Syria). Pausanias reports that in Lakonian Brasiai the inhabitants claimed that the wandering Ino arrived and consented to be nurse to Dionysos, who had washed up on shore (cf. Melikertes); he also saw the grotto where she brought up the infant, and he learned that the plain was called the Garden of Dionysos (3.24.3–4). The grotto might have housed a cult, but Pausanias gives no indication of one. The theme of a wandering goddess bereft of her child and nursing another's as a surrogate is found in the story of Demeter, who after the abduction of her daughter Persephone wanders the world in disguise and eventually becomes a nurse to the infant Demophoön at Eleusis (see OH 41i).

The connections with Dionysos and indications of chthonian character make it unsurprising to find her addressed in our collection. In addition, the rebirth of a mortal into a god (cf. the question of the Eleans to Xenophanes) is consonant with the hopes of initiates in such cults, as the Bacchic gold tablets attest. Furthermore, another inscription found in Syria (also in Sartre's article) mentions the apotheosis of the dedicatee's son in a cauldron used in a ritual for Leukothea of Segeira. It begins with the Greek version of the Latin formula "for the welfare of the Emperor," and the emperor mentioned is Trajan (98–117 AD). What exactly is meant by "apotheosis" (literally or figuratively understood?) is unclear, but there is perhaps some relation to the versions of the myth where Ino places Melikertes in a cauldron (e.g., Apollodoros 3.4.3) and might be trying to revive her son, as suggested by Farnell 1921, pp. 43–44.

It is interesting, though, that this hymn focuses almost exclusively on the maritime associations, particularly the soteriological aspect already found in the Odyssey. Only the brief mention of Dionysos in line 2 serves to connect her with the mythological record. The placement of this hymn and the following hymn to her son is also puzzling. One would expect, perhaps, a contiguous location to the second one addressed to the Kouretes, who, in their connection with Samothrace and the Dioskouroi, are associated with the sea and succoring sailors (see OH 38i). Indeed, an epigrammatic parody of dedications by Loukillios (first century ^{AD}) connects Leukothea and Palaimon (under their mortal names!) with the Samothracian gods: “To Glaukos and Nereus and Ino and Melikertes/and to Zeus of the Depths [= Poseidon] and the Samothracian gods/I Loukillios, for being saved from the sea, have shorn/the hairs of my head—for I possess nothing else!” Both this hymn and that to the Kouretes look toward the deities to provide beneficial weather, and, as a nurse of Dionysos, Leukothea would fit with the series of addressees involved in the life of the infant Dionysos (OH 31–39). However, Leukothea seems to be considered chiefly as a cult figure and thus is included in the more congenial group (see OH 69i). For the female/male pair of Leukothea/Palaimon, see OH 14.8–9n.

75. To Palaimon

For the story of how Melikertes, the son of Leukothea, is transformed into the sea-god Palaimon, see the introduction to the previous hymn. The mortal remains of the boy are usually described as being conveyed to Corinth on a dolphin. Games were then instituted in his honor (sometimes by the hero Sisyphos), and these became later known as the Isthmian Games (see Pausanias 1.44.8, 2.1.8), which, alongside the Olympic Games, were one of the four main national contests in ancient Greece. The games, though, are sometimes attributed to Theseus (Plutarch Theseus 25.5). The name Palaimon means “wrestler,” and this name is generally assumed to be due to Palaimon’s association with athletic competitions, since the baby Melikertes could hardly be labeled a wrestler; it is possible that Palaimon was a separate entity, a divine youth, who later became merged with Melikertes. Be that as it may, Pausanias reports that the body was kept in an underground cave (2.2.1), which suggests chthonian rites. In describing a painting of the reception of Melikertes, Philostratus mentions mysteries (orgia) for Palaimon instituted by Sisyphos (Imagines 2.16); earlier Aristides (a contemporary of Pausanias), at the end of his prose hymn to Poseidon (Orations 46.40), similarly alludes to rites (teletai) and mysteries (orgiasmoi). An inscription containing the laws of a Dionysian cult at Athens (inscribed before 178 ^{AD}) mentions Palaimon (Dittenberger 1920, no. 1109), along with Dionysos, Kore (= Persephone), Aphrodite, and Proteurhythmos, after a series of priestly offices in the context of a sacrifice.

Palaimon, like his mother Leukothea, has connections with Dionysos. They are relatives (see note to line 1), and in myth their stories are sometimes connected (e.g., Apollodoros 3.4.3). As already mentioned, Melikertes/Palaimon seems to have had chthonic associations and his own mystery cults, and it is also possible he was part of a Dionysian one at Athens in the time of the Roman Empire. Furthermore, the “rebirth” of Melikertes as Palaimon, along with the transformation of Ino, his mother, into the sea goddess Leukothea, bears some affinity to the dual birth of Dionysos, and such a transformation is a typical concern of Dionysian and Orphic mystery cults. See further Seelinger 1998. The focus of this hymn, however, just as in his mother’s, is almost exclusively on the nautical, soteriological element, and there is no explicit mention of the mythological trappings and cultic associations found elsewhere in Greek literature regarding this figure.

1 comrade of joyous Dionysos: Dionysos is technically a cousin to Melikertes, as their mothers were sisters. Moreover, Ino is often portrayed as the nurse of Dionysos, as in our collection (OH 74.2+i), and so it is not that much of a stretch to imagine a closer relation between the two aside from the mere fact of blood relation. In our hymn, Palaimon is explicitly made part of the Dionysian thiasos, as are others in the collection; see OH 1.3n and OH 54i. The Nereids are said to “revel in the waves” (see OH 24.2–3).

6–8: For Palaimon as a savior of sailors, see Euripides Iphigenia at Tauris 270–271: “O child of lady Leukothea, you who watch over ships, / master Palaimon, be gracious to us.” The prayer is somewhat humorous, in that the god in his role of saving sailors is invoked in very different circumstances. Here a barbarian herdsman, someone tied to the land, calls on Palaimon at the sight of two men on land (Orestes and Pylades) mistakenly assumed to be gods; the incongruity is further emphasized when the herdsman asks : “whether in fact these two are the Dioskouroi who sit atop mountain peaks/or the delights of Nereus, he who the well-born/chorus of fifty Nereids sired.” The Dioskouroi are Kastor and Polydeukes, who are usually the ones associated with the protection of seamen in literature. The Hymns mention them in connection with the Kouretes (see OH 38.21+i).

76. To the Muses

One of the most enduring and endearing creations of Hellenic imagination, the Muses are the goddesses of artistic and intellectual inspiration. In the epic tradition, they are represented as the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne (Odyssey 24.60, Hesiod Theogony 53–62), and their holy voices, often accompanied by Apollon’s lyre, delight the assembled gods and set various young divinities dancing (e.g., Iliad 1.601–604, Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.186–206, Homeric Hymn to Hermes 4.450–452). For the Greeks, the activities the Muses inspire were intimately bound up with religious festivity and peace. The embassy sent by Agamemnon to attempt a reconciliation with Akhilleus finds the great hero, this man of violent passions, singing of the famed deeds of the heroes of old (Iliad 9.185–194). His attention to the peacetime activity of epic poetry dramatically underscores his refusal to participate in the Trojan War. The dichotomy of music and battle is expressed in the first fragment of Arkhilokhos: “I am the servant of Lord Enyalios [= Ares] / and the Muses, knowing their lovely gift.” See also OH 65.5n+i. Early poets often began their song with an appeal to the Muses. It is not clear whether the “goddess” Homer addresses at the beginning of the Iliad is a Muse, but he explicitly addresses one at the beginning of the Odyssey (see also OH 77i). Hesiod begins his Works and Days with the Muses, and in the Theogony we find a more expansive address in what amounts to a “Hymn to the Muses” (1–114). The convention is not just limited to the opening of a poem; before launching into the imposing “Catalog of Ships,” Homer calls on them for their aid (Iliad 2.484–493). Orphic fragment 361 mentions that “not even in any way do mortals forget the Muses. For they are/the rulers for whom the dance and lovely festivities are a concern.” West speculates this fragment (and perhaps Orphic fragment 362, cited below in the note to lines 8–10, which comes from the same source) might have been part of a hymn to the Muses, which perhaps in turn was the opening part of a larger composition, possibly a theogony (West 1983, pp. 265–266).

This earliest picture of the Muses as graceful and benevolent deities who inspire artists and especially poets and who frequently sing as Apollon plays the lyre is the one that became standard and that was developed in the succeeding centuries. However, there are alternate traditions. For one thing, their number and names are not entirely fixed. Pausanias 9.29.2 reports that there was an account of three Muses, named Melete (Practice), Mneme (Memory), and Aoide (Song). Pausanias subsequently mentions that the Archaic poet Mimnermos had distinguished between two generations of Muses: an older one, daughters of Sky, and a younger one, daughters of Zeus (9.29.4). Similarly, Alkman records two different genealogies in different poems, with one group descended from Earth and Sky (Diodorus Siculus 4.7.1 = PMGF 67). Mousaios is also supposed to have mentioned two generations, an older one born in the time of Kronos, and a younger one born of Zeus and Mnemosyne. What we seem to have here is myth’s propensity for doublets, as in the succession myths involving Sky/Kronos and Kronos/Zeus or the two wars known as the Titanomachy and Gigantomachy.

The Muses were worshipped privately and in public cult. Hesiod’s astounding encounter with the Muses while tending his flocks at the foothills of Mount Helikon (Theogony 22–34) led him to dedicate a tripod he had won in a poetic contest (Works and Days 654–659). The special connection between poet and Muse is affirmed by Homer in the person of the bard Demodokos (Odyssey 8.62–73 and 486–500) and, negatively, in the story of Thamyris, who boasted that he could outdo the Muses in song (Iliad 2.594–600). A legend of the poet Arkhilokhos has him meeting the Muses, disguised as mortal women on the way back from work, in the early morning hours as he was leading a cow to the market. They asked if the cow was for sale, and when he replied that it was, they promised him a good price for it. Thereupon women and cow disappeared, and a lyre lay at the feet of the awestruck future poet.

The most important cult site was probably in the Vale of the Muses at Helikon. The cult might have already been in existence in Hesiod's time. However, there is scant evidence for it until the beginning of the fourth century ^{BC}, when the town Thespiai was in control of the cult and strove to increase its importance from a restricted, local affair. In this the town was successful. During its history, the cult attracted the support from Greek cities and organizations and in particular from rulers of Pergamon, Egypt, and Rome. Numerous dedications are described by Pausanias (9.29.1–31.3). The place evidently became a popular tourist destination. Connected with the site was a festival called the Mouseia that comprised both musical (at first primarily theatrical it seems) and athletic events. There are cults to the Muses sprinkled throughout Greece, notably at Delphi (in connection with Apollon) and Athens. In addition to such traditional religious expressions, worship of the Muses became connected with private institutions of learning. Perhaps the most famous is the Mouseion at Alexandria, where the scholars were supported by the kings of Egypt. (The word "Mouseion" means "place of the Muses," and, via Latin, is the source of our "museum.") Almost a century before Alexandria, however, Plato established a Mouseion and a private cult to the Muses in the district of Akademos (whence English "academy"), where his school was located. Aristotle's Lyceum had one as well, and the phenomenon of dedicating an institution of higher learning to the Muses and calling it a Mouseion was widespread.

Orpheus as a poet is naturally connected to the Muses through his avocation. The relationship might have been deeper. Plato suggests that some claimed he was directly descended from the Muses (Republic 364e), and Pausanias mentions his descent from Kalliope as one of the falsehoods believed by the Greeks (9.30.4). See also Orphic fragment 896, 898, 902–906, and OH 24.9–11n; for other Muses, see Orphic fragment 907–908. Orpheus was from Thrace, and the Muses as well at times are connected with this country and its people. Strabo reports that the Macedonians in his time inhabited places once occupied by the Thracians where the Muses were especially worshipped and that the Thracians were the ones to bring the Muses to Helikon (9.2.25, 10.3.17; cf. Pausanias 9.29.3). Thamyris was Thracian, and in the tragedy Rhesos attributed to Euripides, the title character, a Thracian, is made the son of a Muse and river god.

This hymn forms a pair with the following one dedicated to Mnemosyne (cf. OH 14.8–9n). For their position in the Hymns, see OH 69i.

1: Our hymn follows the more widespread tradition of the Muses' genealogy, and there seems to be no sign of the older generation mentioned by some Archaic poets.

2 Pierian Muses: Pieria is a mountain to the north of Mount Olympos in Macedonia, and it is the traditional birth place of the Muses. Of course, the Muses come to live on Olympos, where they entertain the gods. As mentioned in the introduction to this hymn, they are also associated with Helikon, and they are sometimes referred to as the "Helikonian Muses" (e.g., Hesiod Theogony 1).

4 in every discipline: The Muses are the catalysts of all artistic and intellectual activity. The association of one specific Muse with one particular branch of art (e.g., Kalliope with epic poetry) is a later development. See also Murray 2004.

7: The Muses are usually not directly linked with mystic rites. However, the widespread pedagogical function of the Muses in addition to the role music and dance played in mystery cults makes it quite easy to attribute to them the revelation of such matters. The role of their mother, Mnemosyne, in Orphic cult (see OH 77i), as well as the fact that one of their number, Kalliope, is sometimes claimed to be Orpheus' mother, also facilitate such a connection; see further OH 24.9–11+n, where the Nereids are said to have been the first to establish Bacchic rites. It might be suggested in these lines that the Muses were the source of the rite Orpheus teaches to Mousaios in the beginning of the collection (see OH Oi); compare the revelatory nature of the Muses and their epiphany to the poet Hesiod (Theogony 22, 26–28). See Hardie 2004 for further discussion. In addition to the Nereids, we find elsewhere in the collection that the Kouretes are credited with being the "first to set up sacred rites for mortals" (OH 38.6+n), the Dionysian thiasos is said to reveal "torch-lit rites" (OH 54.10+n), and Themis is suggested to be the one who introduced maenadism (OH 79.7–10n). See also OH 40i. Diodorus Siculus gives a euhemerized account of Dionysos' thiasos, among whom are a group of extraordinarily talented and educated women called the Muses who provide entertainment (4.4.3, 4.5.4).

8–10: Lines 8–9 are probably quoted directly from Hesiod Theogony 77–79, who may have been the first to name these divinities. Our poet deviates from Hesiod's words in his elaboration on Kalliope, who nevertheless was the preeminent Muse for Hesiod as well. "Mother" might refer to the tradition that she was Orpheus' mother (see the introduction to this hymn), and this might further explain the pride of place given to her. Since the opening address to Mousaios tells us there are nine Muses (OH O.17–18), Hagne (meaning "holy") here would either be another name for Kalliope (as we have translated it) or refer to some other goddess, perhaps Mnemosyne. The Greek word “hagnos” is used of the Muses in Orpheus’ opening address. According to Pausanias, Persephone was called Hagne in Messene, where there was a sacred grove containing her statue along with one of Apollon and Hermes carrying a ram; he then piously declines to discuss the mysteries practiced there in honor of Hagne and Demeter, which he considers second in rank to Eleusis (4.33.4–5). It is interesting to note that a river close by is linked to the blinding of Thamyras (4.33.3). The names of the Muses are significant in that they are in some way connected with their musical endeavors. The one exception is Ourania (Heavenly); her name might be a remnant of the older generation descended from Sky, as discussed in the introduction to this hymn. The meanings of the names of the others are as follows: Kleio, “celebrator”; Euterpe, “well-pleasing”; Thaleia, “abundance”; Melpomene, “singer”; Terpsichore, “joy in dance”; Erato, “lovely”; Polymnia, “many hymns”; Kalliope, “pretty voice.” Orphic fragment 362 is from a scholiast to Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika (3.1–5c), who discusses a scholarly debate over the mention of Erato in that poem; one side claimed that, according to the “Orphics,” she was traditionally the inventor of dancing.

12 glory and emulation: This might have the connotation of rivalry, albeit the positive sort that pushes one to reach or surpass the level that another has attained. Compare the use of the related verb by Hesiod to describe the effects of Good Strife: “One neighbor emulates the other/who hastens to wealth” (Works and Days 23–24). There may be an allusion to the “learned contests” mentioned at the end of the hymn to the Stars (see OH 7.12–13n and OH 33i).

12 lovely and sung by many: The Muses’ mother Mnemosyne is also described as “lovely” in OH O.17, and this word is a play on the name Erato. Likewise, “sung by many” (Greek “poluumnon”) is a play on the name Polymnia.

77. To Mnemosyne

Traditionally, Mnemosyne was one of Zeus’ lovers and gave birth to the Muses (Hesiod Theogony 53–54 and 915–917). This seems to be the extent of her importance in traditional myth. According to Hesiod, she herself is the daughter of Sky and Earth (Theogony 135; cf. Orphic fragment 179) and so one of the original Titans. Her name means “memory,” and this is a quality that is of utmost importance in an oral culture and especially for the oral poet. Of course, it continued to be important even as the Greeks increasingly became a literate society, just as it is still considered advantageous for someone to possess in our day and age. As mentioned in OH 76i, one tradition claimed there were only three Muses, one of whom was called Mneme (Memory).

Plutarch tells us that the Muses were also known as Mneiai, i.e., the Memories (Quaestiones convivales 743d). Poets traditionally start with the Muses or at least invoke them before embarking on a difficult stretch, and Plato, about to recount to Kritos a conversation in which he recently engaged, somewhat ironically states “as for the rest of it, Kritos, how might I properly relate it to you? For it is no small matter to be able to recover through narrating such incredible wisdom as I heard. So that I for my part, just like the poets, need to call upon the Muses and Mnemosyne at the beginning of my narration” (Euthydemus 275c–d). Hermes in his eponymous Homeric hymn calls upon Mnemosyne at the start of his song (4.429–430). See further OH 76i. It is quite possible that the goddess of Iliad 1.1 and the Muse of Odyssey 1.1 is none other than Mnemosyne herself; the same might be said of the Muse invoked at the beginning of the Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite (no. 5).

There is very little evidence of cult activity for Mnemosyne. One of the lives of Aesop reports that he set up a temple to the Muses and placed Mnemosyne among them instead of Apollon, which incensed the god. In his visit to Athens, Pausanias describes a private home where Dionysos was worshipped (1.2.5). The god was called Melpomenos (Singer, and cf. the name of the Muse Melpomene), and Pausanias reports that he found a statue or picture of Mnemosyne along with Athene, Zeus, and the Muses. It is unclear if the goddess was worshipped here. However, two writers on Athenian history, Philokhoros (fourth/third century BC) and Polemon (third/second century BC), mention that wineless libations were poured to Mnemosyne at Athens, as well as to Dawn, Sun, Moon, the nymphs, and Aphrodite Ourania. The Erinyes also received such libations (Sophokles Oedipus at Kolonos 100), and the practice implies chthonian rites.

In Orphic eschatology Mnemosyne—or rather her lake—played a significant role. A number of the Bacchic gold tablets mention this geographical feature in the instructions that are intended to remind the soul of the initiate what to do once in the underworld. Indeed, the first line of the first one states “this is the work of Mnemosyne,” and near the beginning of the eighth it seems that the initiate is called “hero who remembers” (but the text is somewhat corrupt). While there are some divergences in detail, the general procedure has the initiate’s thirsty soul avoiding the first body of water it perceives in the gloom, marked by a white cypress tree. All the other souls take their drink from there, but the initiate’s soul is directed to go further along to the Lake of Mnemosyne (nos. 1, 2, 8, 25). This lake is guarded (by whom or what, we are not told), and the guards ask the purpose of the soul’s visit. The answer to be given is to state that one is dying of thirst, to ask for a drink and to claim descent from Earth and starry Sky. The guards then grant a drink, and the soul, after drinking, proceeds to some special blessed area in the underworld reserved for initiates and/or that holds special distinction among the dead. For Johnston’s identification of the dangerous waters to avoid as the Spring of Forgetfulness, see OH 85.8n. Our hymn, too, shows a concern for combating oblivion. The first reference speaks to this in general terms (line 3); at the end, the prayer is particularized to the “sacred rite.” It might refer to some aspect of the ritual in which these hymns were presumably employed, perhaps the “learned contests” found in the hymn to the Stars (see OH 7.12–13n and OH 76.12n). In any case, as the ritual was drawing to a close, our initiates would certainly have need to invoke memory to remember the last remaining hymns and ritual acts (see van den Berg 2001, p. 215, and Graf/Johnston 2007, p. 155). If they had been active the entire night, they were probably growing weary as dawn approached (see further OH 78i). The contrast between remembering and forgetting also appears in Orphic fragment 415, from the Little Krater ascribed to Orpheus. In this fragment the “harmony of the Muses” and all human endeavors granted by Mnemosyne are said to have been hidden through forgetfulness by time (perhaps Time?) and are preserved for humans by memory. Finally, of interest, though not directly connected with our hymn, is that Pausanias explains that before one goes to consult the oracle of the hero Trophonios, he is first required to drink from the fountain of Lethe (Oblivion) to clear his mind of all things before encountering the god and then from the fountain of Mnemosyne to remember what the oracle states (9.39.8); after the oracle is given, the person is put on the seat of Mnemosyne and asked what he learned from the god (9.39.13). This use of liquid to induce psychological states is reminiscent of the transformation the consumption of wine effects; see OH 50i.

78. To Dawn

Dawn (Greek Eos) is the lovely goddess on whom Homer lavishes some of his most beautiful epithets (e.g., “rosy-fingered,” “saffron-cloaked”). We find variants in her genealogy. Hesiod makes her the daughter of the Titans Hyperion and Theia and the sister of Sun and Moon, two other divinities with a notable connection to light (Theogony 371–374); she then gives birth with the obscure Astraios to the winds Zephyros, Boreas, and Notos, as well as to the Morning Star (Eosphoros, “dawn-bringer”) and all the stars (Theogony 378–382; see also OH 7.3n). In myth, Dawn is primarily portrayed as a goddess with a fondness for plucking mortal men off the face of the earth to be her lover, usually with unhappy results. Most famous of all is perhaps Tithonos. She loved him so much that she asked Zeus to grant him immortality, forgetting to ask for eternal youth as well. Eventually she tosses the aged Tithonos into a closet, where he withers away to a mere plaintive voice and eventually is turned into a cicada. See Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.218–238. They had two sons, Emathion, who was killed by Herakles during this hero’s western wanderings, and Memnon, king of the Ethiopians, who was killed by Akhilleus at Troy. Ovid tells in detail the story of her abduction of Kephalos and his eventual rejection of the goddess in favor of his true love, the mortal Prokris (Metamorphoses 7.690–862). The hunter Orion was also an interest of Dawn's, and according to Homer he was killed by Artemis for this relationship (Odyssey 5.121–124). Homer also briefly mentions a fourth lover, Kleitos (Odyssey 15.250–251). This pattern of behavior was noticed in antiquity, and one reason offered for it was that Aphrodite had cursed Dawn for having an affair with Ares (Apollodoros 1.4.4). Our hymn takes no notice of such charming tales.

Dawn seems to have had no role in cult practice, although there is a brief hint in Ovid that she was worshipped somewhere (Metamorphoses 13.588: “For I possess the scantiest amount of temples throughout the wide world.”); however, this might just be an understated way of saying that there were no temples to Dawn. It is possible that the goddess is addressed as Orthria and Aotis in Alkman PMGF 1. This is hotly debated, but, if true, it would indicate worship of Dawn at Sparta in the Archaic period. The placement of this hymn in the collection might seem odd at first glance; one would expect it to be grouped with the hymn to Night (OH 3). However, if the hymns were intended to be performed in the order transmitted and if the proceedings took place at night, then the position of this hymn might indicate that it was sung right before or at the break of dawn (as opposed to the hymn to Night, who is requested to come to the initiates in the hymn dedicated to her, which is positioned right at the beginning of the collection; see OH 3i and OH 77i, and cf. OH 54.5+n). While many hymns describe a divinity in terms of light, this is the only hymn that calls on an entity to provide light to the initiates. Comparable, perhaps, might be Alkman PMGF 1.60–63, which has been interpreted to refer to the closing of a nightly ritual at the approach of dawn (see also OH 7.12–13n). This functional interpretation would also explain our hymn's emphasis on Dawn in her capacity as harbinger of the day as well as the complete lack of mythological dressing, with even genealogical details lacking. Note, too, the close proximity of the hymns to the three winds (OH 80–82), the same ones Hesiod designates as Dawn's progeny (see also OH 80.5–6n). Cynical minds recalling the story of Tithonos will find significance in the fact that it follows the hymn to Mnemosyne.

3 the illustrious Titan: A reference to Sun, son of the Titan Hyperion; see OH 8.2+n and OH 34.3+n.

4–5: Compare Theogony 744–761, where Hesiod tells us of the house of Night and Day located in the underworld; see OH 3i. The one greets the other on the threshold after discharging her daily obligation, and the house is always occupied by one and not the other.

6–10: Dawn and her light sending men and beasts off to work is a literary trope, first attested in Hesiod Works and Days 578–581: “The dawn claims the third portion of a day's work, / the dawn gives a headstart for journeys and jobs, / the dawn's arrival sends many men on their way/and puts the yoke on the necks of many oxen." Alkman might have expressed similar sentiments in the poem from which the fragment cited in the following note derives. Ovid Amores 1.13 is a witty "anti-hymn" to Dawn, in which Dawn is criticized for causing men and beasts to work. The speaker in Ovid's poem harangues the goddess for, among other things, her spurring the traveler to resume his journey, for the various activities her light heralds (agricultural, domestic, military, judicial, and scholastic), and especially for her ending of the sweet nocturnal trysts of lovers. Sappho fragment 104 is largely corrupt in the second line but also seems to view the coming of Dawn in a negative light: "Evening, you who bring all that light-giving Dawn disperses, / †you bring the lamb, you bring the kid, you bring away to its† mother the child."

11–12: The comprehensive listing of creatures of the sky, sea, and earth to denote the powers of a divinity is also a literary device. For this, compare the Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite 5.2–6, particularly 3–5, where this goddess "subdues the races of mortal men as well as/the birds that swoop from the sky and all the beasts/that are nurtured in their multitudes on both land and sea," and the one to Earth, Mother of All (30.34) whose "beauty nurtures all creatures that walk upon the land, / and all that move in the deep of fly in the air." In a similar vein, the Titans are the ancestors of "the brood of the sea and of the land, then the brood of the birds" at OH 37.5. It is a variation on the technique of listing domains to indicate the wide-spread power of a divinity; see OH 10.14–16n. Alkman PMGF 89.3–5 gives a splendid picture of quietude in a mountain landscape; the whole world sleeps, including "all creeping things the black earth nourishes/and beasts bred in the mountains and the race of bees/and the creatures in the depths of the deep blue sea; / there sleep the tribes of long-winged birds." It is possible that the original poem contrasted this restfulness with the hustle and bustle of human activity (another literary trope) that the light of dawn awakens (see previous note). It has also been suggested that this fragment might be referring to religious silence and so have been originally performed at a nocturnal ritual. If this is true, it is certainly possible that the light of dawn, which would signal the end of the proceedings, was mentioned elsewhere in the original, thus corresponding to our hymn's possible function, and was perhaps related to the ritual during which the first fragment of Alkman was performed (see the introduction to this hymn).

14 more sacred light: The light here probably has multiple layers of meaning. In the first instance, as mentioned in the introduction to this hymn, it could refer to the light of the coming dawn that would signal the end of the nocturnal ritual context in which these hymns were originally performed. The qualification "more" perhaps refers to the torches that would still have been in use for illumination and possibly in ritual acts. “Light” here might also have soteriological connotations.

79. To Themis

The name Themis means “established custom or law.” She belongs to that class of deities who are personified abstractions. In myth, she is usually one of the original Titans, a daughter of Earth and Sky (Hesiod Theogony 135), as in our hymn; sometimes she is identified with Earth herself (Aeschylus Prometheus Bound 209–210). Hesiod makes her the second wife of Zeus (after Metis) and says that she bore to him the Seasons as well as the Fates (Theogony 901–906). Orphic theogony seems to have agreed with this progeny (Orphic fragment 252–253). In the Hymns, Themis and Zeus are again the parents of the Seasons (OH 43.1), but Night is the mother of the Fates (OH 59.1). It should also be noted that there might have been two sets of Fates in Orphic teaching (Orphic fragment 176), which would perhaps correspond to the duality found in Hesiod, who makes the Fates daughters of Night earlier in the Theogony (217–222; see OH 59i). Themis’ children reflect her function as an embodiment of the established cosmic order, and this explains the possible identification of Themis with Necessity in Orphism (Orphic fragment 250). We also find Themis associated with prophecy and oracles, particularly as Apollon’s predecessor at Delphi; see note to lines 3–6. Pindar makes it Themis who warns Zeus (and Poseidon) about the danger in pursuing Thetis, who was destined to give birth to a son who would overthrow his father (Isthmian Odes 8.31–45a). This story is taken up by Aeschylus in Prometheus Bound, where he also has Themis tell Prometheus (here her son) that the coming war between the Titans and gods would be won by trickery (201–218). In the lost epic Kypria, Themis and Zeus plot the Trojan War in order to reduce the population of the earth (fragment 1); see also OH 61i. Themis might have been involved in this plan as a daughter of Earth, and it should be noted that Pindar has Themis counsel that Thetis be married off to Peleus—a subject treated in the Kypria and that eventually leads to the Trojan War. Despite Themis’ connections with Delphi, however, it seems that she played no role in cult there. Indeed, there is scant evidence for her worship in the ancient world. At Rhamnous in Attika, she was worshipped in conjunction with Nemesis (see OH 61i). Pausanias also reports a temple to Themis near the acropolis at Athens (1.22). For more on her cult, see Larson 2007, p. 179.

This hymn starts a group that seems to recall the ordering according to elements found in OH 15–29 (see OH 15i). Themis, as daughter of Earth, would represent the element earth; the next hymns to the winds, air; the one to Okeanos, water; and the one to Hestia, fire. This would make for a ring composition that would signal that the ritual was coming to a close. Perhaps reinforcing this notion is that the sequence at OH 15–29, repeated twice, starts each time with fire and ends with earth, while here it begins with earth and ends with fire. Given the association between earth and night (chthonic) and light and day (celestial), this might also reflect the coming day that heralded the end of the ritual.

3–6: Apollon is associated with the Delphic oracle, but there are a number of instances where he is the last of a line of divinities connected with this institution and Themis often appears in this group. Aeschylus says that the Delphic oracle originally belonged to Earth, who then gave it to her daughter Themis, who in turn passed it to the Titaness Phoibe, and finally Apollon received it as a birthday gift (Eumenides 1–8). Similarly, Pausanias relates that Earth and Poseidon shared the oracle then Earth passed her share on to her daughter Themis, who then ceded it to Apollon as a gift, and finally Apollon bartered for Poseidon’s share (10.5.6). This peaceful relationship between Themis and Apollon might also have its origins in the goddess’ having provided the infant Apollon with nectar and ambrosia at his birth (Homeric Hymn to Apollon 3.124–125). The transference of the oracle is not always so civilized, however. Euripides tells a version in which the oracle originally belonged to Earth, who wished her daughter Themis to possess it, but had it taken from her after Apollon slew the dragon Python; Earth then took vengeance on the young usurper, who appealed to his father, Zeus (Iphigeneia in Tauris 1234–1283). See also OH 86i. In the Homeric Hymn to Apollon (no. 3), it is the god himself who establishes the oracle.

4–6 as prophetess ... the art of giving laws: Both of these phrases are translations of Greek words that pun on the name Themis (“themisteuousa” and “themistosunas,” respectively).

4 Delphic hideaway: A reference to the chamber where the Pythia was supposed to have inhaled the vapors that brought her to a state of ecstasy. Modern doubt as to the veracity of the ancient tradition has been challenged; see Spiller, Hale, and de Boer 2002, along with their bibliography.

5 Pythian... Python: A similar close mention of location and figure is found at OH 34.3–4. For the story of Apollon slaying the dragon Python, see OH 34.3n. There are a number of variants of this myth, and sometimes the dragon is made into a human brigand (see Fontenrose 1959, pp. 13–27). The reference here to Python as king suggests he is conceived as human as well.

7–10: Just as Themis is represented as the first to institute oracles, so here she is represented as the inventor of Bacchic rites (cf. OH 76.7+n), particularly maenadism

(see OH 52i). Other goddesses are also integrated into Dionysian rites (see OH 1.3n). This also further links Dionysian worship and Delphi; see OH 46i.

80–82. To Boreas, To Zephyros, To Notos

The winds in the ancient world, like other natural phenomena, were objects of worship and veneration. Tied to the seasons and often associated with specific meteorological conditions, they were important for agricultural and nautical activities. Already in bronze-age Knossos there was a “priestess of the winds.” The winds could be viewed as an aggregate—winds in general, bad winds, etc.—or distinguished by the direction from which they originated and thus individualized and personified. The two notions can be found in the same author. Homer speaks of the winds feasting in the home of Zephyros, the west wind (Iliad 23.198–201), but also has the winds controlled by the mortal Aiolos (see OH 23.5–7n). Hesiod says that three winds, Boreas (north), Notos (south), and Zephyros (west), were born from Astraios and Dawn (Theogony 378–382), along with the stars (see OH 78i); the other, “evil” winds arose from Zeus’ defeat of Typhon, who seems to have originally been a wind daimōn (Theogony 869–880; see further OH 15i). A similar dichotomy is found in actual worship. Pausanias tells of an altar for the winds at Titane, where one night out of the year sacrifice is made; of interest to us is that Pausanias also reports that mystery rites were performed over four pits (one for each wind?) and that spells supposedly from Medeia were incanted (2.12.1). Akhilleus prays to Boreas and Zephyros to keep Patroklos’ pyre burning all night long; he performs libations, and at dawn the winds return to Thrace (Iliad 23.194–230). The summoning of favorable winds and the banning of unfavorable ones is often accomplished by magic, and Herodotos reports that the Persian Magi used spells to quell stormy winds (7.191; cf. 7.189, where the Athenians call on Boreas to blow against the Persians). The individual winds also received worship (e.g., for Boreas, see Pausanias 8.36.6; for Zephyros, see Pausanias 1.37.2). They, too, are called on to provide or hold back their force. The request for Boreas, Zephyros, and Notos to be beneficial in their respective hymns here is a reflex of this old tradition.

There are other personified winds from other directions. Homer knows of the personified east wind, Euros (Odyssey 5.295), for whom there survives a fragment of a paian composed at Sparta by an anonymous poet (PMG 858, where he is addressed as “savior” at the end, an epithet that frequently occurs in the Hymns). At Methana, to stay the Lips, a southwest wind, from ruining vine blossoms, a white rooster was cut in half; each half was carried by a man, who would run around the vines in opposite directions, and, when they returned to the starting place, the pieces were buried (Pausanias 2.34.2–3). However, aside from the mention of all the winds in the opening address to Mousaios (OH O.37), only Boreas, Zephyros, and Notos merit attention from our author. Note, however, that the second hymn addressed to the Kouretes (OH 38), where they are identified as both the Samothracian gods and Dioskouroi, portrays them as winds in general. This seems to reflect Hesiod's influence. For the position of these three hymns in this collection, see the OH 79i and 83i. They were probably intentionally arranged in alphabetical order (Greek "zeta" precedes "nu").

80. To Boreas

Boreas is the north wind, traditionally associated with cold and winter. He is a blustery sort and is represented as powerful and violent. Vivid descriptions of his frosty might may be found in Hesiod Works and Days 504–558 and Ibykos PMGF 286.8–13 (see also note to line 2). In myth, he is perhaps most famous for his abduction of the Athenian princess Oreithyia; their children, Kalais and Zetes, participated in Jason's quest for the Golden Fleece (see Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 1.211ff. and Ovid Metamorphoses 6.675–721). It is in this role as "son-in-law" that the Athenians called on him to harass the Persian fleet during the battle of Artemision, and for his help they later built him an altar by the river Ilissos (Herodotos 7.189, and compare 7.178 and 7.191; see also Plato Phaedrus 229c). The sons of Boreas had winged feet that conferred on them the power of flight; see also OH 81.6. Pausanias claims that he read in a poem (now lost to us) that Mousaios was given the ability to fly by Boreas; the poem seems to have been attributed to Mousaios himself, a claim Pausanias disputes (1.22.7).

2 come from snowy Thrace: Boreas is imagined as originating from Thrace, and thus is Orpheus' countryman. The Greeks in general considered the Thracians a wild and uncouth people, and the personified Boreas often takes on the same rude characteristics. In Aesop's eighteenth fable, Boreas and Sun try to determine who is more powerful by seeing who can force a man to take off his cloak. Boreas huffs and puffs with all his might, which only makes the man wrap himself tighter; Sun merely turns up the heat which forces the man to disrobe. The moral of the story is that persuasion is better than force. Ovid seems to be playfully alluding to this tale by having his Boreas first ask nicely for the hand of Oreithyia and resorting to violence only when he is rebuked. It is interesting that Homer at times considers Zephyros a similarly wild wind from Thrace as well (Iliad 9.4–7).

3–4: Compare Lucian True History 2.14, where on the Isle of the Blest the clouds draw up moisture from rivers of myrrh and then gently release that moisture on the symposiasts after being squeezed by the winds. For clouds as the carriers of rain, see

5–6: Since Boreas can bring rough weather, he can perforce bring fair weather (cf. OH 38.14–25). The breaking up of the storm clouds leads to the appearance of the sun. These lines perhaps indicate the coming dawn and the imminent end of the ritual during which the Hymns were performed (see OH 78i). See also OH 5.6+n.

81. To Zephyros

Zephyros, originally any westerly wind, came to be thought of as the west wind proper. He is regarded as a warm, gentle breeze (see, e.g., Hesiod Works and Days 594). Homer sometimes represents him as a storm wind from Thrace (see OH 80.2n), but Zephyros also appears as the pleasant wind sent by Okeanos to refresh the dead heroes in the Elysian Fields (Odyssey 4.561–569). Akhilleus' horses are Zephyros' sons by way of the harpy Podarge (Iliad 16.148–151); this is not as strange as a union as it may appear, since the Harpies (Snatchers) were originally storm daimones. Their sister is Iris, and she also had relations with Zephyros, begetting none other than Eros (Alkaios fragment 327). Note that Orphic fragment 360 gives another genealogy for Eros, saying that this god was produced by Time and all the winds; see further OH 58.5–7n. Some versions of the myth of Apollon and Hyakinthos portray Zephyros as a rival to Apollon for the lad. In this case, the discus that kills Hyakinthos is blown off course by the wind as opposed to accidentally hitting him (Pausanias 3.19.5). A later epigram attributed to Bacchylides describes the dedication of a temple to Zephyros by one Eudemos of Rhodes in thanks for the god's assistance in winnowing (AP 6.53); the altar to Zephyros in Attika, found near a shrine to Demeter and Persephone on the way to Eleusis, may also have had agricultural significance (Pausanias 1.37.2).

3–4 loved by harbors / ... gentle passage: In the Odyssey, Aiolos ties up all the winds except the west wind in a magic bag so that Odysseus may have safe passage home. The premature release of the winds blows the ship back to the island of Aiolos (10.19–55; see also OH 23.5–7n). Zephyros, however, is not the only wind associated with aiding ships; see OH 82i.

6 O light-winged ones: Winds are conventionally represented as winged; compare OH 82.2 and the winged feet of Boreas' sons (see OH 80i). The wings are indicative of the winds' speed.

82. To Notos

Notos is the south wind and as such opposite to Boreas; compare Bacchylides 13.124–132, an extended metaphor where Boreas rages throughout the night until dawn while during the day Notos safely guides the ship to dry land (cf. OH 81.3–4).

4: The Clouds’ hymn has the same last line as this one (OH 21.7). Both hymns are followed by ones addressed to water deities, namely, Tethys (OH 22) and Okeanos (OH 83). It is a natural placement, since rain was thought to come from the moisture drawn up by the clouds from bodies of water; Herodotos explicitly says this about Notos (2.25.2). For philosophical speculation on such meteorological phenomena, see OH 21i and OH 22.7n. The Clouds are “filled with water” (OH 21.3) and wear “dewy cloaks” (OH 21.6), and Tethys is said to be the “mother of dark [= rain] clouds” (OH 22.7).

83. To Okeanos

Okeanos was conceived in myth as a fresh-water river flowing counterclockwise (i.e., from west to east; see Mimnermos fragment 12 and Stesikhoros PMGF S17) around the land masses of the world. His wife is Tethys (OH 22.1), and their daughters are the Okeanids (OH 51.1+n). There are different accounts of his place in the divine hierarchy. Hesiod considers him to be one of the original Titans, a son of Sky and Earth (Theogony 133). Homer, on the other hand, has Sleep call Okeanos the “begetter of all” (Iliad 14.246); it is unclear whether Homer thought him to be the oldest god or the first god to initiate procreation; see also OH 3i. This hymn reflects Homeric belief. We find similar variations in different Orphic theogonies, with Okeanos being counted in the generation of Titans (Orphic fragment 179) and either among an earlier generation or as the progenitor of all (Orphic fragment 21–22; cf. West 1983, pp. 117–121; 183–190). Okeanos might have been rationalized as the sea in the theogony sung by Orpheus in Apollonios of Rhodes Argonautika 1.495–512; his daughter Eurynome is paired with Ophion, and they are called the first rulers of Olympos. Water divinities as the first existing beings are found in Sumerian (Nammu), Babylonian (Apsu and Tiamat), and Egyptian (Nun, the Ogdoad) traditions, among others. It seems quite likely that such stories influenced the Greeks. It is also notable that Thales, the earliest Pre-Socratic philosopher and one who came from Asia Minor, theorized that water was the first principle, and already in antiquity he was thought to have been influenced by the ancient tradition; see Aristotle Metaphysics 983b27–984a3, who also mentions that the earliest theologians (including Orpheus?) thought Okeanos and Tethys were the “parents of begetting.” In our collection Proteus, another sea god, is endowed with demiurgic powers; see OH 25.2–3+i. Okeanos played no role in cult. For the placement of this hymn, see OH 79i. An explanation for why Okeanos would have been chosen to represent water in this group of hymns as opposed to some other water deity might be his connection with death (see note to line 3 and OH 87i). Just as this hymn follows those addressed to the winds, so too does the hymn to Sea (OH 22) follow the one to the airy Clouds (see also OH 82.4n). The author of the Derveni papyrus equates Zeus, Okeanos, and air, but this is introduced as an interpretation that goes against what the “multitude” believe (see Betegh 2004, pp. 193–200), and nothing in our hymn suggests any awareness of this doctrine.

3 boundaries of the earth: See OH 11.15. Hephaistos makes Okeanos the outer rim on the shields of Akhilleus (Iliad 18.607–608) and of Herakles (Hesiod Shield 314–315). It is not, however, the absolute limits of the world, at least not the world of the living. Odysseus must cross Okeanos to reach Hades (Odyssey 10.508–512), and Hesiod places a number of monsters beyond its stream such as the Hesperides, the Gorgons, and Geryon (Theogony 215, 274–275, 289–292). All of these creatures are thus death figures. The Isles of the Blest are located near Okeanos (Hesiod Works and Days 171; cf. Odyssey 4.561–569). Okeanos’ association with death is strengthened by the fact that the river Styx is his eldest daughter (see OH 69.4n). It might be that the placement of this hymn, coming near the end of the collection and shortly before the hymn to Death, is supposed to symbolize the crossing of Okeanos for the initiate (cf. OH 87.12n). The stars are sometimes described as rising from and setting into Okeanos.

4–5: Okeanos is naturally seen as the source of all other watery bodies (see also Iliad 21.195–197; line 196 is exactly the same as line 4 in this hymn). This is expressed genealogically by Hesiod, who reports that Okeanos and Tethys are the parents of three thousand daughters and an equal number of (male) rivers (Theogony 363–368). However, Hesiod does not make him the father of the salty seas, as there are older water deities for this poet to represent them (e.g., Pontos).

8: Okeanos appears as a laid-back individual in myth. He does not fight with Kronos against their father Sky (Orphic fragment 186) nor does he battle against Zeus in the Titanomachy (Hesiod Theogony 398; compare the role of his daughter Styx at 389–403). According to Homer, he and his wife protect Hera during this war (Iliad 14.200–204, and cf. Thetis and Eurynome, an Okeanid, taking in Hephaistos after he had been thrown out of Olympos by Hera at Iliad 18.394–405 and also Thetis succoring Dionysos in his flight from Lykourgos at Iliad 6.135–137). In the Prometheus Bound, Aeschylus portrays Okeanos as sympathetic to the plight of the rebel Prometheus, although unwilling to challenge Zeus.

84. To Hestia

Hestia, meaning “hearth,” is, unsurprisingly, the goddess of the hearth. Despite being a full-blooded Olympian divinity, she never really becomes fully anthropomorphized. Consequently, she rarely makes an appearance in literature and art. Homer does not mention her at all. She was the first child born to Kronos and Rhea, and, because she was the oldest, she was the first to be swallowed by Kronos and the last to be disgorged (Hesiod Theogony 454, 497). While Orphism seems to have had a similar genealogy (see Orphic fragment 202), the author of the Derveni papyrus appears to cite from a poem where Orpheus equated her with Demeter, Deio, Rhea, Earth, and Mother (see OH 14i). The hymn to the Mother of the Gods in our collection says that this goddess is also known as Hestia (OH 27.9+n). There are two short Homeric hymns to her (nos. 24 and 29) that briefly touch on her capacity as household goddess (the latter hymn also invokes Hermes in this role), and they seem to have been composed for the occasion of the consecration of a new house. She also makes an appearance in the Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite where she spurns the courting of Poseidon and Apollon; she swears that she will remain a virgin, and in place of marriage she receives the honor of being the goddess of homes, including temples (5.21–32). This turned out to be quite an honor indeed. As goddess of every private domicile’s hearth, much of domestic piety was lavished on her. She received daily offerings, and she was also invoked on special occasions, e.g., the introduction of new members into the household. Since the temple of a god was considered a “home” for that god, it is not surprising to find Hestia worshipped there as well, e.g., Apollon’s temple at Delphi (see Homeric Hymn to Hestia no. 24). As the hearth was a central point unifying the household and temple, so, too, did communities have a public hearth that promoted the polity’s well-being, and thus Hestia also received state cult honors. The cult of her famous counterpart in Rome, Vesta, included a college of women whose function was to keep the sacred flame of the city’s hearth continually burning. We find similar instances of the maintenance of an eternal, pure flame in Greek civic hearths. She was the first and the last deity to whom libations were poured at a public feast (see Homeric Hymn to Hestia 29.3–6). That she was the first to be swallowed and the last to be disgorged by Kronos is perhaps a mythological reflection of this; our hymn’s position near the end of the collection might also have been influenced by this practice (see further OH 79i). In general, though, it was customary to give her offerings before other gods. Sokrates, about to embark on a discussion on the etymology of gods’ names, asks his interlocutor if they should start with Hestia, as is the custom, and later notes that Hestia is the first divinity invoked at sacrifices (Plato Cratylus 401b2 and d1–2). It is not hyperbole to state that she was the most worshipped divinity in the ancient world as well as the most important divinity in the daily lives of the majority of people. For more information on the cult of Hestia, see Larson 2007, pp. 160–62.

2 center of the house: This probably originated in the plan of the bronze-age megaron, which had its hearth in the center; early temples, too, seemed to have been planned around a hearth. The hearth by its nature is a central element in any house, regardless of its exact physical location.

4 purity: Fire is an element that by its very nature is pure, and this concept of purity was extended to the hearth fire and, naturally, to the conception of Hestia herself. She was a virgin goddess, and the women who tended Vesta's flame in Rome were virgins on pain of death. Hesiod admonishes his brother "not [to] sit by the hearth/with your genitals exposed and bespattered with semen" (Works and Days 733–734). For the role of purity in cult, see OH 30.4n.

5 home of the blessed gods: So, too, Sky (OH 4.4); see also OH 5.1n.

8 prosperity ... health: Hestia was imagined to be both benefactress and protectress of the home; compare the end of the Homeric Hymn to Hestia 29 as well as OH 27.9+n.

85. To Sleep

Sleep, along with the race of Dreams and Death, is a child of Night, who bore this brood alone (Hesiod Theogony 211–212; cf. OH 3.5, 7). Thus, the last three hymns in the collection form a natural triplet. In the Homeric epic, too, he is the personified brother of Death, and Hera enlists his services to put Zeus to sleep (Iliad 14.224–279). The Greeks felt a close affinity between sleep and death, probably inferring it from the close resemblance between a body asleep and a body dead. Hesiod says that for the Golden Race of men, "a sleeplike death subdued them" (Works and Days 116) instead of death, and both Sleep and Death do honor to Sarpedon, a son of Zeus, by carrying his corpse from the field of battle to his home in Lykia for a proper burial (Iliad 16.671–673 and 681–883). Pausanias reports that on the chest of Kypselos, Night holds two infants, one white, who is Sleep, the other black, who is Death (5.18.1). Hesiod describes a similar scene, although Night only holds Sleep; the poet further contrasts the gentle nature of Sleep with the hated figure of Death (Theogony 755–766). This fraternal relationship between Sleep and Death is emphasized in our collection, as can be seen in a number of conceptual and linguistic parallels in their hymns: they hold power over all mortals (OH 85.1–3 OH 87.1–2), they have a liberating function (OH 85.5 OH 87.3–4), and sleep is a kind of practice death (OH 85.7), while death is a kind of permanent sleep (OH 87.3, 5). Sleep played a negligible role in cult. However, according to Pausanias, the people of Troizen sacrificed on an ancient altar dedicated to the Muses and Sleep, claiming that the latter was most cherished by the former (2.31.3). This probably is a reflection of both divinities' ability to release, albeit temporarily, the minds of men from the worries and cares of their dreary daily existence (see note to line 8).

1–4: The idea that Sleep binds all is found in the epic epithet “pandamatōr” (“all-subduer, all-binder”), which occurs in Homer and Orphic fragment 223; in the latter it appears in the context of Zeus' overthrowing of his father, Kronos. The beginning of book 24 of the Iliad is a beautiful illustration of what happens to those whom this “all-taming lord” does not visit—the oldest description of the torments of insomnia (24.1–21).

8 Death and Oblivion ... a true brother: For this relationship to Death, see the introduction to this hymn. The relationship with Oblivion requires some explanation. Hesiod makes Oblivion a granddaughter of Night and so a niece of Death and Sleep (Theogony 227). Oblivion (Greek Lethe) has close connections with Death. It is one of the rivers in the underworld, whose waters cause the drinker to forget their previous life. Johnston has argued that in the eschatology found on some of the Bacchic gold tablets, the body of water the soul of the initiate is instructed to avoid is the Spring of Forgetfulness (Graf/Johnston 2007, pp. 94–136, passim, especially pp. 116–120; this is opposed to the Lake of Mnemosyne, whither the soul is directed; see OH 77i). It may be that Oblivion is mentioned here because of Death, and the relation to Sleep is merely a function of his relation to Death. However, forgetfulness also has relevance to the living. In the hymn to Mnemosyne, “evil oblivion” is said to be “alien to her” (OH 77.3), and the goddess is asked to “ward off oblivion” so that the rite might not be forgotten (OH 77.9–10). On the other hand, oblivion may have positive connotations. In the hymn to Night, the goddess is said to “free us from cares” (see OH 3.6), which is a translation of a Greek word that literally means “causing to forget cares.” This is comparable to the “free us of cares” in line 5 (a more literal translation of a different Greek word), and it is notable that the “sweet respite from toil” in this line is almost exactly parallel to the “you offer us welcome respite from toil” in the hymn to Night (OH 3.6). The sacrifice to the Muses and Sleep mentioned in the introductory note is also relevant here. Sleep is probably therefore imagined here as “a true brother” of Oblivion based on this affinity of function. (Presumably Oblivion is considered the daughter of Night, contra the Hesiodic genealogy, thus inheriting some of the powers of her mother.) Ovid portrays Sleep dwelling in a cave whence the river Lethe originates (Metamorphoses 11.602–604).

9–10: If the hymns were sung in order at an all-night ritual (see OH 3i and OH 78i), the position of this one dedicated to Sleep is quite understandable. The initiates would literally be calling on the god, of whose favor they would acutely feel the need; see further OH 54.5+n.

86. To Dream

For the genealogy of the race of Dreams, see Hesiod Theogony 211–212 and OH 85i. Ovid makes Dreams the sons of Sleep, and furthermore “modernizes” them by distinguishing certain specialists who, however, only appear to distinguished persons: Morpheus can take on any human form, Phobetor (aka Ikelos) any animal, and Phantasos any natural object (Metamorphoses 11.633–643). We find a personified Dream in the second book of the Iliad, where Zeus wishes to deceive Agamemnon and so dispatches “baneful Dream” (cf. line 1 of this hymn) to suggest that Troy will fall if promptly attacked, when in reality Zeus is planning woes for the Greeks (2.1–40). Homer compares Akhilleus’ chasing of Hektor around the walls of Troy to a dream where the pursuer never catches the pursued, who nevertheless cannot wholly escape the pursuer (Iliad 22.199–201). In the Odyssey, Penelope tells her disguised husband that there are dreams that issue forth from one of two gates; false ones come through gates of ivory, while true ones through gates of horn (19.559–567; cf. Vergil Aeneid 6.893–896, where Aeneas returns from the underworld through the gates of ivory). This dichotomy between true and false revelation is paralleled in Hesiod’s epiphany of the Muses, where the goddesses claim “we know how to tell many lies that pass for truth, / and when we wish, we know to tell the truth itself” (Theogony 27–28). Euripides gives an interesting etiology of dreams in his play Iphigeneia at Tauris. Earth, in anger at Apollon for his taking over the oracle at Delphi from her daughter Themis, sends prophetic dreams to men as they lie on the ground; the young Apollon complains to daddy Zeus about the competition, and Zeus simply causes the dreams to stop (1259–1282; see also OH 79.3–6n). The interpretation of dreams must be one of the oldest forms of divination; both in cult and literature, there were numerous dream oracles (for an example, see OH 74i) and more informal dream visions (see, e.g., OH 12.10; note, too, that the title character of Iphigeneia at Tauris misinterprets one at the beginning of the play, 42–58). Akhilleus, worn out from dragging Hektor’s corpse, falls asleep on the shore and is visited by the dream-image of Patroklos, who, among other things, briefly foretells Akhilleus’ death at Troy (Iliad 23.54–107). Over two thousand years before Freud, we find books written to explain the significance of dreams; unfortunately, all but one, the Oneirokritika of Artemidoros (middle to late second century ^{AD}), survives. We also possess the Sacred Tales (= Orations 47–52) of Aristides (middle second century ^{AD}) that records revelatory dreams sent to him by Asklepios, whose worship had a connection with dreams through the visions that arose through incubation (see OH 67i).

Our hymn is particularly concerned with dream divinations, but it introduces an ethical criterion on the basis of which one may receive dreams that signify the future. Similar ethical criteria are found in the fate of the soul in Orphic eschatology (see OH 13i) and as a constitutive underpinning of the cosmos' structure (see OH 64i). With physical sleep probably imminent for the initiates, assuming an all-night ritual (see OH 3i), sweet dreams would naturally be a concern.

18 weird apparitions: Similarly described are the “weird shapes” by which Melinoe appears to mortals (see OH 71.6–9+11n). And, as is also the case with Melinoe and other threatening powers, “baneful Dream” is asked to come in his beneficial, not harmful, guise.

87. To Death

For the genealogy of the personified figure of Death (Greek Thanatos), see OH 85i. Death is to be distinguished from Hades, although Euripides imaginatively calls Death a “winged Hades” in his tragicomedy Alkestis 252. Thanatos appears on stage in this play which treats the story of Herakles wrestling Death for the soul of Alkestis (837–860, 1140). We are told by Pherekydes of Athens that Sisypheos kept Death tied up, until he was freed by Ares, who consequently served up Sisypheos to him. For obvious reasons Death and the boatman of the dead, Kharon, sometimes confused even in antiquity, have totally merged in the modern Greek figure of Charos with whom Digenes and other epic figures wrestle in “the marble threshing floors” of folk poetry. The personification of Death is rather weak in this hymn. Its appearance at the end of the collection is symbolic, forming a ring composition with the theme of birth that occurs at the beginning with the hymns to Hekate and Prothyraia (see OH 2i, and cf. OH 15i); birth and rebirth are motifs in the central Dionysian section as well (see OH 44i).

3–4: The idea that the body is a kind of prison for the soul is found in Plato Cratylus 400b–c, where Sokrates discusses three different etymologies for the Greek word for body, “sōma.” Two of them involve a play on the Greek word “sēma”: the body is the “tomb” (“sēma”) of the soul or the body is the “marker” or “token” (“sēma”) of the soul. A third possibility, the one which Sokrates claims seems the best to him, he attributes to the “Orphics,” who assert that the body is a prison for the soul that keeps it safe until it “pays the penalty” (“sōma” being derived in this context from the verb “sōizo,” “I keep safe, preserve”; compare also Plato Phaedo 62b). Plato does not mention what the penalty is, but presumably he has in mind the Orphic conception that human beings participate in the Titans' guilt for slaying Dionysos (see further OH 37i). Mention of retribution for a crime is found on two of the Bacchic gold tablets (nos. 6 and 7). See also the introduction to the translation.

- 8: There are a number of mythological figures who take on the role of judge of the dead, such as Minos, Rhadamanthys, and Aiakos; see OH 18.16+n. The punishments of such luminaries as Tantalos and Sisypheos imply such a judging. Here, however, the end of life itself is presented as a juridical sentence, a case of an ethical viewpoint being grafted onto a natural process (see OH 86i). It is “common to all” (see also lines 1 and 6), because all human beings share in the blood guilt of the Titans (see previous note).
- 9: There are, however, exceptions, most notably Orpheus himself, who descends to the underworld after his wife Eurydike has died. He charms Hades and Persephone with his music, and they allow him to bring Eurydike back to the land of the living, provided he does not look back at her until they reach the light. Tragically, Orpheus is unable to comply and thus loses Eurydike for good. See Vergil Georgics 4.453–506 and Ovid Metamorphoses 10.1–71; for a possible allusion to this story elsewhere in the Hymns, see OH 58.5–7n. Sisypheos, too, is said to have convinced Persephone to allow him to return to life (Theognis 701–712). The descent to and return from the land of the dead (called a katabasis, “descent”), either literally or figuratively, is one of the crowning achievements for heroes in mythology (e.g., Herakles, Theseus, Odysseus, Aineias), as well as for modern figures (e.g., Dante, Faust), and even for gods (e.g., Dionysos, Demeter, Persephone, Adonis, Hermes). In Aristophanes Frogs 1392, Aeschylus quotes a line from his Niobe (not extant) that “alone of the gods, Death does not desire gifts.”
- 12 old age: There is a play on words involving “old age” (“gēras”) and “prize” (“geras”). The notion of a prize is very interesting in light of the intimations of competition elsewhere in the collection (see OH 7.12–13n). One of the Bacchic gold tablets (Graf/Johnston 2007, no. 5) speaks of the initiate “reaching the desired garland by [her] swift feet.” The imagery of winning a foot race is used metaphorically to describe the final prize sought by the initiate through participation in the cult, namely, remaining in the underworld with the heroes or becoming a god (see OH 20i, OH 29i, OH 33i, and OH 41.8n). This idea might be present in the hymn to the Stars, too. Athletics and struggle were closely connected in the minds of the ancients. Indeed, the Greek word “athlētēs” (whence English “athlete”) literally means “the one who struggles/contends for the prize” and is particularly used for athletic contests; the Greek word “agōn” may denote a place for athletic competitions, the competition itself, or any struggle (cf. English “agony”). Just like an athlete, so, too, must the initiate struggle and practice discipline in performing the lengthy ritual. Toil and relief from toil are found elsewhere in the collection (cf., e.g., OH 3.6, OH 85.5+8n), and these are probably not mere literary arabesques but reflect to some degree the attitude of the initiates to their practices, especially if they shared the view found among the Bacchic gold tablets that life was an atonement for the crimes of the Titans (see OH 37i). This might lead one to expect a pessimistic and dismissive attitude to the world of the living, and there is much precedence for such in the annals of Greek literature. For example, Theognis says that “of all things, it is best for earth-bound men not to be born, / nor even to gaze upon the piercing rays of the sun/but if one is born, then it is best to reach the gates of Hades as quickly as possible/and to lie under a mass of dirt piled high” (425–28). This is a species of Greek pessimism in general, but the attitude was not universal. The shade of Akhilleus could say that he would prefer to be a slave to a poor farmer on earth rather than a king among the dead (Odyssey 11.489–491), and the Athenian lawgiver Solon has kind things to say about old age in his poems (fragments 18, 20, 27). The Hymns evince a positive valuation of life, too (see, e.g., OH 40i+18–20 and OH 68.9+n). They unabashedly focus on the material blessings of the here and now, e.g., health, prosperity, peace, and show, interestingly enough, no interest in the fate of the soul, at least explicitly. Whatever the eschatological views of the initiates, and whatever the rest of the ritual involved, the performance of the Hymns functions in a way similar to the story that Akhilleus tells Priam in order to console him (Iliad 24.525–533). Zeus possesses two jars, one filled with good things, the other with evils. For a human life, Zeus apportions either a little from each jar or all from the one of evils. It is thus our fate to suffer, and all one can do is cope. The Hymns are likewise a coping mechanism. They present a world full of uncanny powers that have the potential to threaten and benefit, and they give the initiate a means of taking an active role to secure the latter. The means to do so—the performance of the Hymns (and whatever “contests” the ritual involved)—were perceived as arduous. Like Herakles performing his Labors, the initiates struggle and suffer. And when they finish the hymn to Death, which could very well have coincided with the morning light, they, like Herakles, in a sense have overcome death. The references to sailing and favorable winds in the collection might be understood metaphorically in this sense (see OH 83.3n). The experience would have been felt to have changed their lives, and the new day as symbolic of the transformation. The Hymns offer much for those interested in various aspects of antiquity: mystery cults and Orphism, mythology and folklore, literature and literary reception, philosophical and cosmological speculation. It is easy to lose sight that they were performed by real people, with real hopes and real fears. While their means of addressing these concerns might seem strange, even bizarre, to the modern reader, the goal is something with which anyone can readily sympathize. The Orphic Hymns speak to human fundamentals. And therein lies our ultimate fascination with them, and antiquity in general.

INDEX NOMINUM

Redundant references (e.g., the occurrence of “Hekate” in the hymn to Hekate) are generally not included. Geographical and ethnic designations are combined under one heading where both occur in the notes (e.g., Egyptians under Egypt). If an author is indirectly cited or not given a reference in the notes, the author’s name appears in this list, not the Index Locorum. Numbers in parentheses after a deity’s name indicate the number of the hymn that is dedicated to that deity, and the entry is in bold font. Individuals belonging to a group are referred to that group, unless they are significant independent figures in their own right (e.g., Styx is listed separately from the Okeanids) and/or the sources offer contradictory accounts (e.g., Dione).

Preface to the Prometheus Trust edition

The addition of Professor Ruth Majercik's Chaldean Oracles to the Prometheus Trust's Platonic Texts and Translations Series immediately after the publication of Dr Robert Petty's Fragments of Numenius in the Series seems highly appropriate: not only did both works originate from the same University's doctorate programme within a few years of each other, but, more significantly, they both address aspects of an important development in the Platonic Tradition in the region of Apamea around the middle of the second century of our era. The exact nature of the relationship between Numenius and the authors of the Oracles remains a matter of scholarly debate, but there can be little doubt that between them, they gave a renewed impetus to the tradition.

Since its publication in 1989 this presentation of the fragments of the Chaldean Oracles with Ruth Majercik's detailed notes and analysis has established itself as the modern baseline for scholarly work upon the Oracles.

The Prometheus Trust is particularly pleased to offer a republication of the original edition since Thomas Taylor, with whom the Trust is especially associated, was the first to publish (in 1797) an English translation and serious study of the Oracles. The Thomas Taylor Series' seventh volume (Oracles and Mysteries) republished his last (1817) version of this study and with this, the publication of the eighth volume of the Platonic Texts and Translations Series, we have come full circle.

No amendments have been made to the 1989 edition, which the following pages present in facsimile form.

PREFACE

An earlier version of this work was presented as a Ph.D. Dissertation at the University of California at Santa Barbara in 1982. The present version (slightly revised) has benefited from consulting recent publications; e.g., Glenn Morrow's and John Dillon's translation of Proclus' Commentary on Plato's Parmenides (Princeton, 1987), Carlos Steel's second volume of Moerbeke's Latin translation of Proclus' Parmenides (Louvain, 1985), and recent scholarship (through 1988) on the Oracles, Neoplatonism, and related material. Regretfully, volume five of Saffrey-Westerink's Budé edition of Proclus' Platonic Theology was not available to me when this manuscript went to press.

My thanks go to Birger Pearson, my thesis advisor, who first suggested this project to me and skillfully guided the original thesis to completion and who has remained a valued friend and colleague; to Joseph Margon and Alva Bennett, who also served on my doctoral committee and were instrumental in developing my early interest in Greek and Latin; to Gregory Shaw, for his insightful comments and stimulating conversation over the past several years; to Randi Glick and Marilyn McCarty, who carefully typed the original manuscript; to Randall Smith, whose expertise in both classical languages and computer technology made it possible (and pleasant) for me to convert this manuscript to Nota Bene. I also wish to thank H. S. Versnel and F. T. van Straten for accepting this work in their SGRR series and Julian Deahl, Brill religion editor, for his advice and patience. Mr. Theo Joppe is to be acknowledged for his skill and speed in bringing this book to completion.

Personal thanks of love and appreciation go to my family; my daughter, Andrea, and my sons, Christopher and Geoffrey and their families. Most of all, I wish to thank my husband, Richard Comstock, for his unfailing good humor, patience, and support. It is to him that this book is lovingly dedicated.

INTRODUCTION

The Chaldean Oracles are a collection of abstruse, hexameter verses purported to have been “handed down by the gods” (θεοπαράδοτα) to a certain Julian the Chaldean and/or his son, Julian the Theurgist, who flourished during the late second century C.E. Although the term “Chaldean” is generally understood in a metaphoric sense to designate Julian’s “spiritual” affinity with the wisdom of the East, it has also been argued that Chaldea was the actual homeland of Julian pater, who may have migrated to Rome following Trajan’s military campaigns in the East.¹ Another possibility recently suggested by H.-D. Saffrey is that the Juliani may have been of Syrian origin.² This suggestion is supported in part by the occurrence of the names “Ad” and “Adad” (the latter a corruption of the Syrian Hadad) in Chaldean material preserved by Proclus (see esp. notes to fr. 169). In addition, the striking parallels between several of the fragments of the Oracles and fragments of Numenius (who was both a contemporary of Julian filis as well as a native of Apamea in Syria) point in the same direction.

Saffrey would also understand the term “Chaldean” in a metaphoric sense, but with the specific meaning of one who is adept in magic (an association regularly made in Antiquity). Thus the citation in the Suda (no. 433) that Julian pater was both Χαλδαῖος and φιλόσοφος would mean that he was both a practitioner of magic as well as a speculative thinker (and not, e.g., a philosopher from Chaldea).³ However, it was Julian filis (or Julian the Theurgist; see Suda, no. 434) who was the actual “author” of the Oracles (λόγια δ’ ἐπῶν) as well as the writer of works on θεωρητικά and τελεστικά. (The later Neoplatonists also attest to other prose works of Julian filis; e.g., several books on the Celestial Zones—see Proclus, In Tim., III, 27, 10. According to the Suda entry, Julian pater wrote only four books περὶ δαιμόνων.) But Julian *fil*s, like his father, was also a practitioner of magic or, more precisely, “theurgy” (and thus his surname “the Theurgist”). Indeed, as Saffrey notes, it may well be that the Oracles themselves were transmitted via the theurgic technique of “calling” and “receiving” (see discussion infra), with Julian the Theurgist functioning as the “medium” through whom Julian the Chaldean extracted oracles from Plato’s “soul.”⁴ (The crucial evidence here is a passage from Psellus. See esp. notes to fr. 84 and 138.) Saffrey would further distinguish between these Platonizing or “philosophical” oracles and those he would label as “theurgy proper,” i.e., the so-called “magical” oracles comprised of “older” material perhaps assembled or collected by Julian the Chaldean.⁵ Although the Oracles (in whole or part) may well have been “received” via mediumistic trance (other scholars would label the Oracles “forgeries”),⁶ a clear and precise distinction between “philosophical” and “theurgical” fragments is problematic (see further below).

³ See Saffrey, p. 216. Saffrey also notes here (following the suggestion of F. Cremer, Die Chaldäischen Orakel und Jamblich de Mysteriis, Meisenheim am Glan, 1969, p. 132, n. 224) that the expression vir in Chaldea bonus (as cited in Porphyry, De regressu animae, p. 29*, 16, Bidez) should be similarly understood as designating “a man worthy with respect to the Chaldean rites” and not (in the usual translation) as “a man of worth from Chaldea.” (In this latter sense, see Lewy, p. 286 and n. 106, who identifies this unnamed man as Julian the Chaldean.)

Whatever the mode of transmission, of singular importance is the fact that the Oracles were regarded by the later Neoplatonists—from Porphyry (c. 232-303 C.E.) to Damascius (c. 462-537 C.E.)—as authoritative revelatory literature equal in importance only to Plato’s Timaeus.⁷ (Cumont, I believe, was the first to refer to them as the “Bible of the Neoplatonists”).⁸ Unfortunately, what remain of the Oracles are only

⁵ Saffrey, pp. 219-220.

⁶ This is the opinion, e.g., of P. Merlan, “Religion and Philosophy from Plato’s Phaedo to the Chaldean Oracles,” JHPh, I, 1963, p. 174. E. R. Dodds also admits this possibility, but adds: “...their diction is so bizarre and bombastic, their thought so obscure and incoherent, as to suggest the trance utterances of modern ‘spirit guides’ than the deliberate efforts of a forger.” (See “Theurgy and its Relationship to Neoplatonism,” JRS, 37, 1947, p. 56 = The Greeks and the Irrational, Boston, 1957, p. 284.) Dodds, then, like Saffrey, suggests mediumship as the “source” of the Oracles but, unlike Saffrey, assigns Julian *fil*s only the role of recording these utterances (and not that of actual medium). But the true authorship of the Oracles must remain in doubt. Although a collaboration between father and son (as Saffrey suggests) is an attractive solution (see, also, Lewy, p. 5 and Exc. I, pp. 443-447, who suggests the same possibility, especially as a way of accounting for the indiscriminate use of the terms οἱ θεουργοί and οἱ Χαλδαῖοι by the later Neoplatonists when quoting the Oracles), nevertheless, the possibility of single authorship cannot be absolutely ruled out. In this regard, see the remarks of P. Hadot, “Bilan et perspectives sur les Oracles Chaldaïques,” Lewy², pp. 703-706, who delineates all the problems but with no hard and fast conclusions. Similarly E. Des Places, Oracles Chaldaïques (Paris, 1971), p. 7, thinks it best, in the last analysis, to “protect the anonymity of the Oracles.”

⁷ See Dodds, “Theurgy,” 1947, pp. 57-60 = 1957, pp. 285-289.

⁸ See F. Cumont, Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism (London, 1911; rpt. New York, 1956), p. 279, n. 66. Cf. W. fragments, quoted for the most part by the various Neoplatonists, although Chaldean notions are also found in the writings of such Platonizing Christians as Arnobius of Sicca (c. 253-327 C.E.), Marius Victorinus (c. 280-363 C.E.), and Synesius of Cyrene (c. 370-413 C.E.). The Byzantine philosopher, Michael Psellus (c. 1019-1078 C.E.) also wrote several commentaries on the Oracles, inspired by Proclus. Fortunately, much of Psellus' work is extant, providing us with an important interpretive model albeit often Christianized. The extensive commentaries of Porphyry, Iamblichus, and Proclus, however, are lost. But from the fragments we do have, we can securely locate the Oracles in a Middle Platonic milieu, especially that type of Middle Platonism which had affinities with both Gnosticism⁹ and Hermeticism¹⁰ as well as links with Numenius.¹¹ John Dillon has aptly labelled this congruence of Gnostic, Hermetic, and Chaldean thought as the "underworld of Platonism,"¹² entstammende Bibel;" M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der Griechischen Religion, II (München, 1961), p. 479: "die Bibel der Neuplatoniker;" Dodds, "New Light on the 'Chaldean Oracles,'" HTR, 54, 1961, p. 263 = Lewy², p. 693: "...the last important Sacred Book of pagan antiquity."

⁹ G. Kroll, De Oraculis Chaldaicis (Breslau, 1894; rpt. Hildesheim, 1962), p. 70, referred to the Oracles as a form of "pagan gnosis." Recently, M. Tardieu has reaffirmed Kroll's position ("...the system of the Oracles is incomprehensible unless we see at its foundation the development of the Gnostic systems around Valentinus") while, at the same time, refusing to characterize the Oracles with the term "gnosis." (See "La Gnose Valentinienne et les Oracles Chaldaïques," in The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, I, ed. B. Layton, Leiden, 1980, pp. 194-237.) Tardieu's study is a structural analysis focusing on five propositions which locate the Oracles and Valentinianism in a shared physics, albeit religiously appropriated. But Tardieu's claim that the Oracles were dependent on this type of Gnosticism is overstated. The striking parallels between aspects of the Oracles and, e.g., "Sethian" Gnosticism (see infra) would preclude such a conclusion. A better solution, then, is that of Lewy who, although noting (but unsystematically) numerous parallels between the Oracles and Valentinianism, opts for a common Middle Platonic milieu (see pp. 311-398). In this regard, cf. J. Dillon, The Middle Platonists (London, 1977), pp. 384-389.

¹¹ The parallels here, in certain instances, are so similar that some form of direct dependency is surely involved. See, e.g., Num. fr. 17 (Des Places) and Ch. Or., fr. 7; Num. fr. 15 (Des Places) and Ch. Or., fr. 8. (See, also, A.-J. Festugière, La Révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, III, Paris, 1953, pp. 52-59 for additional parallels.) But in what direction? Festugière, "La Religion grecque à l'Époque Romaine," REG, 64, 1951, p. 482 and J.H. Waszink, "Porphyrios und Numenius," Entretiens Hardt, XII, 1965, pp. 43-44, argue for the priority of Numenius; Dodds, "Numenius and Ammonius," Entretiens Hardt, V, 1960, pp. 10-11 and Des Places, Numenius (Paris, 1973), p. 17, argue for the Oracles. Lewy, pp. 321-322 and Dillon, p. 364, would not, however, rule out the possibility of a common source. My own guess is that Numenius was posterior, but with the caveat that he borrowed selectively from the Oracles, as the differences in the two systems are often as striking as the similarities. See further comments in notes to fr. 7.

an expression which nicely captures the rather murky quality of these various systems with a) their elaborate and often exasperating metaphysical constructions; b) an extreme derogation of material existence; c) a dualistic understanding of human nature that envisions the soul or mind as a "spark" of the Divine trapped in matter; d) a method of salvation or enlightenment that generally involves a spiritual and/or ritual ascent of the soul; e) a mythologizing tendency that hypostasizes various abstractions into quasi-mythical beings. This movement away from the school traditions of Platonism towards an unabashed religiosity is the hallmark of these systems, although all three retain a veneer of philosophical respectability by assimilating elements from the eclectic Platonism of the day. For example, the Highest God in all three systems is often described in Pythagorean terms as a "Monad" who either exists alongside of or extends into a "Dyad" (see frs. 8, 11, 12 and notes). However, in the "underworld" of Platonism, abstract philosophical speculation gives way at this point to mythic formulations and a complex proliferation of cosmic entities is introduced,¹³ with a dominant female principle, in each case, operating at all levels and directly responsible for material creation as we know it. In certain Gnostic systems, for example, she is Ennoia or Sophia; in the Chaldean system, Dynamis or Hecate; in the Hermetica (esp. C.H. I), Life or Nature. Despite the abstract quality of most of these names, a definite personal function is assigned to each: the Gnostic Sophia experiences feelings of grief and fear, she gives birth to the Demiurge, Ialdabaoth; the Chaldean Hecate generates life from her right hip; the Hermetic Nature entices and unites with the primal Anthropos.

This female principle ultimately reflects the World Soul of Plato's Timaeus, refracted in varying degrees through the prism of Middle Platonism; along the way, Plutarch will have assimilated this figure to the Egyptian Isis; Philo, to the Jewish figure of Wisdom; and Numenius will have split it into opposed good and evil entities. But it is only in the "underworld" of Platonism that philosophical speculation about this figure becomes part of revelatory myth, often to the extent that "knowing" the myth becomes an important condition of salvation (this is especially true of the Gnostic systems). In other words, knowledge for its own sake passes over to "gnosis" for the sake of soteria, with spiritual enlightenment often coupled with magic and ritual as a means of freeing the soul. Although there is an ongoing debate as to what types of rituals may have been practiced in the various Gnostic and Hermetic communities (and, indeed, to what extent such communities even existed),¹⁴ it is clear that the Chaldean system included a complex ascent ritual involving purifications, trance, phantasmagoria, sacred objects, magical instruments and formulas, prayers, hymns, and even a contemplative element, all of which was practiced (most likely) in the context of a "mystery community."¹⁵ These and other issues are discussed in detail in the following outline.

I. THEOLOGY

A. First Principles

Chaldean theology largely reflects its Middle Platonic origins, with a stress in particular on the transcendence of the Highest God. In certain fragments, this transcendence approaches a via negativa, with the Highest God described as "snatched away" (fr. 3) or "existing outside" his products (fr. 84). In other fragments, however, the Highest God is positively characterized as "Father" (fr. 7, 14), "First" or "Paternal Intellect" (fr. 7, 39, 49, 108, 109), "Monad" (fr. 11, 26, 27), "Source" (fr. 13, 30, 37), and, perhaps, even "One" (fr. 9, 9a). This vacillation between negating and affirming the Highest God is a common feature of Middle Platonism, a thoroughgoing transcendence in these matters achieved principally by Plotinus, whose "One" is not only beyond Intellect, but beyond Being as well.¹⁶ In contrast, the Chaldean Supreme God is best characterized as Nous, albeit a self-contemplating Nous akin to Numenius' First God (see fr. 8 and notes). But even here the Oracles vacillate: is the Father to be equated strictly with his Intellect or is the so-called Paternal Intellect to be regarded as the first emanation of the Father? And if so, of what substance then is the Father, if not intelligible? The fragmentary nature of the evidence does not permit any hard and fast conclusions on these matters; indeed, the Oracles elsewhere also designate the Father "Abyss" (a term especially familiar to the Gnostic sources; see fr. 18 and notes), as well as describing him in Stoic terms as essentially "fiery" in nature (see fr. 3 and 37), albeit totally transcendent. (Unlike the Stoic God, the Chaldean Father is in no sense immanent in the world.) Further, the later Neoplatonists also designated him ὑπαρξίς, a notion which most likely derived from the Oracles, although only the verbal form ὑπάρχειν is found in the extant fragments (see fr. 1, 20, 84 and notes). In addition, the later Neoplatonists vacillated on the matter of his ontological status: Porphyry, for example, sometimes equated the Chaldean Father with the Plotinian One; Proclus, on the other hand, situated him beneath the One at the first level of the intelligible order (see fr. 3 and notes). In the last analysis, what can be affirmed about the Chaldean Supreme God is the fact of his transcendence, but not the precise nature of it.

¹⁴ On the role of cult and ritual in Hermeticism, see, now, J.-P. Mahé, Hermès en Haute-Égypte, I, (Quebec, 1978), pp. 54-59; L. Keizer, The Eighth Reveals the Ninth: A New Hermetic Initiation Disclosure (Seaside, CA, 1974), pp. 6-15; W. C. Grese, Corpus Hermeticum XIII and Early Christian Literature (Leiden, 1979), pp. 40-43; 201-202; G. Fowden, The Egyptian Hermes, (Cambridge, 1987), passim. Other scholars, however, have argued against a cultic and/or ritual Hermeticism, suggesting instead only the existence of a literary phenomenon, with the texts read, perhaps, in the context of a "school" setting. See, e.g., Festugière, Rév., I, p. 84; W. Scott, Hermetica, I (Oxford, 1936; rpt. 1968), pp. 1-8. It should be no surprise, then, that the current debate among scholars on the problem of "Sethian" Gnosticism echoes this same division. See, e.g., F. Wisse, "Stalking those Elusive Sethians," Rediscovery, II, pp. 564-577, who favors the "literary phenomenon" approach, arguing that there was no Sethian community as such, but only "like-minded Gnostics" reading various texts for the purpose of individual edification. In contrast, H. M. Schenke, "The Phenomenon of Gnostic Sethianism," Rediscovery, II, pp. 588-616, not only posits the existence of a Sethian community or sect, but argues that the group was organized around a relatively coherent system of doctrine and cultic/ritual practice. A middle position between these extremes is now suggested by G. Stroumsa, Another Seed: Studies in Gnostic Mythology, (Leiden, 1984), e.g., pp. 4-8; 172 and passim.

In addition to this First God or Father (whose sole function is to "think" the Platonic world of Ideas; see fr. 37, 39, 40), there is a Second God or Demiurgic Intellect whose function is to fashion the intelligible (or Empyrean) world on the model of these Ideas (e.g., fr. 5, 33, 37). This Second Intellect is conceived of as dyadic in nature (see fr. 8 and 12) as he is turned both towards the intelligible and sensible realms (in the manner of Numenius' Second God). In this regard, the Chaldean Second God is described as "Twice Transcendent" (δις ἐπέκεινα) whereas the First God is simply "Once Transcendent" (ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα; see fr. 169 and notes). These designations also underscore the notion that the Highest God (or "Once Transcendent") exists as an indivisible unity, whereas the Second God (or "Twice Transcendent") begins the process of division which ultimately leads to creation and generation. In the Oracles, this process of division is described in dynamic terms; the Second Intellect (as Demiurge) is said to project the Platonic Ideas ("divisions" or "lightning-bolts") onto primal matter (or "wombs" of the World Soul) like Zeus hurling his thunderbolts (see esp. fr. 35 and 37). By this "action," the initial movement towards material creation begins.

¹⁶ See, e.g., Dodds, "The Parmenides of Plato and the Origin of the Neoplatonic One," CQ, 22, 1928, pp. 129-142.

But this process entails the existence of a Third God, a feminine, generative entity, described either as "Power" (δύναμις) and situated as a median figure between the First and Second Gods (e.g., fr. 4), or conflated with Hecate as the World Soul (e.g., fr. 6, 51-53, 56) and thus located (in traditional Platonic fashion) on the borders between the intelligible and sensible realms. In this last regard, Hecate is described either as a "girdling membrane" (fr. 6) through whom influences travel from one level of reality to another, or is depicted in anthropomorphic terms as a goddess-like figure from whose right hip the particular souls of generation are said to issue (fr. 51).

The ambiguous localization of this feminine principle reflects an obvious truth: that a feminine element is necessary if there is to be a process of generation at all, whether at the highest or lowest levels. The figures of Ennoia and Sophia function in a similar manner in Valentinian Gnosticism. Indeed, the linking of "Power" with the Chaldean "Father" (or "Abyss") suggests a primordial bisexual deity akin to the Gnostic Abyss-Ennoia or Abyss-Sigē (see fr. 4 and notes). Sigē or "silence" is also mentioned in the Oracles, but seemingly not as a fully hypostatized entity (see fr. 16 and notes). A bisexual First God is also a feature of C.H. I—all these systems, then, underscoring the notion of an androgynous primogenitor who is the ultimate source of material creation, however dimly or darkly that creation is subsequently viewed.

Further, in the Chaldean system, the Father (or First Intellect), Power, and (Demiurgic) Intellect are regarded triadically; the Supreme God, in fine, understood as a triadic-monad or three-in-one deity (see fr. 26 and 27) whose Power and Intellect constitute, as it were, his immediate "faculties." A "triple-powered" Monad is also a familiar figure in various Gnostic systems, sometimes understood as the Supreme God (e.g., Allogenes, NHC XI, 49,36-38), other times as a lesser being (e.g., Steles Seth, NHC VII, 121,32-34). Of particular importance is the occurrence of the term τριδύναμος (or τριδύναμις) in several Gnostic texts (e.g., Cod. Bruce Untitled, 3.15; 8.12; the Coptic equivalent would be ΠΑ ΤΨΑΜΤΕ ΝΒΑΜ and variants; see, e.g., Marsanes, NHC X, 6,19) and the similar τριγλῶχis and τριούχον in the Oracles (as descriptive of the Monad; see fr. 2, 26 and notes. Synesius, who is dependent on the Oracles, prefers the term τρικόρυμβον; see H. 9(1),66. Cf., also, our fr. 27: παντὶ γὰρ ἐν κόσμῳ λάμπει τριάς, ἧς μονὰς ἄρχει.) In addition, in the Gnostic systems, this triple-powered One or Monad is said to be constituted of e.g., Existence (τὸ ὄν, ὑπαρξίς = ΠΗ ΕΤΕ ΠΑΪ ΠΕ), Life (ζωή = ΩΝΩ), Thought (νόησις = ΤΜΗΤΕΙΜΕ; see Allogenes, NHC XI, 49,26-31) or Existence (ὑπαρξίς), Life (ζωή = ΩΝΩ), and Intellect (νοῦς; see Steles Seth, NHC VII, 125,28-31), formulas which parallel the Neoplatonic triad Existence (ὑπαρξίς), Power/Life (δύναμις/ζωή), Intellect (νοῦς). This Neoplatonic triad, in turn, reflects a conflation of the Chaldean πατήρ/ὑπαρξίς, δύναμις, νοῦς with the Plotinian formula of Being (τὸ ὄν), Life (ζωή), Intellect (νοῦς). (See fr. 4 and notes and cf. Proclus, El. Th., props. 101-103.)

Of further interest is the occurrence of the term τριδύναμος in the writings of Marius Victorinus as descriptive of the Christian God (e.g., Adv. Ar. IV.21.26). As such, the Christian Trinity is viewed by Victorinus as consisting of Father (or Being), Son (or Intellect), and a median, Holy Spirit (or Life) who is feminine in nature. Victorinus also refers to the "Spirit" as mater (Adv. Ar. I.58.12) and conexio (H. III.242). A similar unorthodox understanding of the Christian Trinity is found in the Hymns of Synesius who, like Victorinus, views the "Spirit" (or πνοιά, not πνεῦμα; see, e.g., H. 2(4),98) as a median, feminine entity, variously termed ὠδὶς (H. 1(3), 238), μάτηρ (H. 2(4), 101), and θυγάτηρ (H. 2(4), 103). Although this generative, feminine "Spirit" (for both Synesius and Victorinus) is patterned on the Chaldean δύναμις (as mediated through Porphyry),¹⁷ the occurrence of similar triads in various Gnostic sources (e.g. Father, Mother/Spirit, Son; see, e.g., Ap. John, NHC II, 2,14) reflects an important interchange between the school traditions of Platonism and the Platonic "underworld."¹⁸

B. Lesser Beings

In the Chaldean system, a complex "chain" of lesser beings fills the spaces between the Primordial Triad¹⁹ and the world of matter. In the Augustine, however (although influenced by Victorinus), clearly rejected (or misunderstood) this trinitarian scheme at the ontological level. See De civ. dei, X.23: "Dicit (sc. Porphyry) enim deum patrem et deum filium quem Graece appellat paternum intellectum vel paternam mentem; de Spiritu autem sancto aut nihil aut non apert aliquid dicit; quamvis quem alium dicat horum medium, non intellego. Si enim tertiam, sicut Plotinus, ubi de tribus principalibus substantiis disputat, animae naturam etiam iste vellet intellegi, non utique diceret horum medium, id est patris et filii medium. Postponit quippe Plotinus animae naturam paterno intellectui; iste autem cum dicit medium, non postponit, sed interponit." However, Augustine's psychological trinity of mens, amor, notitia (in the view of Theiler and Hadot) may have been influenced by Chaldean notions (see notes to fr. 44).

Robinson, "The Three Steles of Seth and the Gnostics of Plotinus," Proceedings of the International Colloquium on Gnosticism, Stockholm, Aug. 20-25, 1973 (Stockholm, 1977), pp. 132-142; B. ¹⁹ Lydus, De mens., IV, 122; p. 159, 5-8 W., suggests a divine Ennead as well, but the evidence is inconclusive. See Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 262, n. 1.

extant fragments, the most important of these are the Iynges (ἰγγες), Connectors (συνοχεῖς), Teletarchs (τελετάρχαι), angels, and demons, although other entities are named by various commentators (see, e.g., Psellus, Hypotyposis). A similar “filling up” of divine space is also an important feature of Gnosticism and Hermeticism as well, where numerous quasi-mythic/quasi-abstract entities serve to separate the Highest God from the contamination of material existence.²⁰ In the Chaldean system, these various entities, for the most part, apparently function as diverse aspects of the world of Ideas.

1. Iynges

The name ἰγγξ, in Greek literature, is particularly associated with magic. Originally it designated a certain bird, the “wryneck,” which was bound to a wheel by a sorcerer and spun around as a means of attracting an unfaithful lover. In some instances, the wheel itself was called a Iynx. As such, the Iynx functioned as a love charm. Later, under the influence of Plato’s spiritualization of Eros, the word Iynx came to mean the “binding” force between man and the gods.²¹ It is this definition we find in the Oracles, but under various guises. For example, in fr. 77, the Iynges are identified with the “thoughts” (= Ideas) of the Father; in fr. 78, they are said to be “couriers” between the Father and matter; in fr. 79, the Iynges are connected with certain cosmic entities called “Intellectual Supports;” in fr. 206, they are equated with the “magic wheels” used in the theurgic rites. The apparent confusion of function here is somewhat illusory as the Iynges, in each instance, function as mediating or “binding” entities between the intelligible and sensible worlds. Indeed, the Iynges can be viewed not only as the mediators of messages, but as the message itself.

For example, as the “thoughts” or Ideas of the Father, the Iynges are actually magical names (voces mysticae) sent forth by the Father as “couriers” in order to communicate with the theurgist. At this end, the magic wheel spun by the theurgist attracts these celestial Iynges and enables the theurgist (who alone is privy to the divine language of the gods) to communicate with the Father. But the message communicated by the Iynges is none other than their own magical names which, when uttered, enabled the theurgist to acquire certain divine powers.

²⁰ The paradox, of course, is that these powers not only separate but connect the various levels of the cosmos, forming a “great chain of Being.”

²¹ See O. Geudtner, Die Seelenlehre der Chaldäischen Orakel (Meisenheim am Glan, 1971), p. 42 ff.

In addition, the Iynges are connected with the Intellectual Supports, cosmic entities which play an important role in maintaining the regular movement of the planets. Such an identification undoubtedly occurred because it was believed that the Iynges—when invoked by the theurgist—became physically situated in the various planetary spheres. It was from this vantage point, then, that the Iynges mediated the message of their magical names back and forth between the two worlds.

In sum, then, the Iynges play both a cosmic and theurgic role in the Chaldean system: identified with the Platonic Ideas and Intellectual Supports they both inform and participate in ruling the Universe; identified with the magic wheels and voces mysticae, they aid the theurgical act. This double function is also characteristic of both the Connectors and Teletarchs, to which we now turn.

2. Connectors

As cosmic entities, the Connectors (συνοχεῖς), like the Iynges, are said to issue from the Father (who, in one instance, is actually designated First Connector; see fr. 84 and cf. frs. 32, 80, 81); however, the principal function of the Connectors is quite different. Their chief purpose is to harmonize and protect the various parts of the Universe, a notion which builds on the Stoic concept of universal “sympathy” combined with a Middle Platonic re-evaluation of Plato’s Ideas. According to Lewy, this reinterpretation first occurs in Philo, where the Platonic Ideas are referred to as “invisible powers” which “hold together” the Universe.²² In the Chaldean system, these “powers” are equivalent to the Connectors, which perform the same harmonizing function.

In addition, the Connectors are said to perform a “protective” function (see fr. 82), but the exact nature of this activity is unclear. Perhaps the Connectors “protected” or “preserved” that very harmony which they themselves had created. In other words, the Connectors not only establish the “bond” of harmony in the Universe, they also preserve this concord by felicitously watching over it as guardians.

Lastly, the Connectors, like the Iynges, also have a theurgic function, as it is on the rays of the sun (called “Material Connectors” in fr. 80) that the soul makes its initial ascent. Seemingly, this theurgic dimension is mediated through the Teletarchs (see infra) as the Connectors are said to “assist” these three rulers during the course of the rites. This image of the sun with its “connective” rays can also serve as a paradigm for the role of the Connectors as a whole: at the theurgic level, the “connective" rays of the sun conduct the soul upward; at the cosmic level, "connective" currents emanate from the Father, the Primal Fire, like rays from the sun, disseminating stability and harmony throughout the Universe.

3. Teletarchs

Beneath the Iynges and Connectors are located the Teletarchs (τελετάρχαι, lit. "masters of initiation;" see fr. 85 and 86), divine entities which are assimilated to the χοσμογοί as rulers of the three worlds of Chaldean cosmology. As noted below, these three rulers may well parallel similar notions about various ruling powers both in Philo and the Gnostic sources. Lewy suggests an ultimate dependence here on the "Cosmokrators" or "Archons" of late Babylonian astral religion.²³ However, in contrast to the Babylonian Archons, who dominated the various planetary spheres, the Chaldean τελετάρχαι presided over the three worlds, a cosmogonic notion borrowed from the Platonic tradition.

The Teletarchs are also associated with the Chaldean virtues of Faith (πίστις), Truth (ἀλήθεια), and Love (ἔρως; see fr. 46), which function as faculties of the three rulers: Faith is connected with the Material Teletarch; Truth with the Ethereal Teletarch; Love with the Empyrean Teletarch. (A fourth virtue, "fire-bearing Hope"—ἐλπις πυρήνοχος—is also mentioned; see fr. 47.) As such, these virtues are not to be understood as spiritual qualities (as is the case with the Pauline triad of Faith, Hope, Charity),²⁴ but as cosmic entities involved in the very creation and maintenance of the Universe: "For all things," says the oracle, "are governed and exist in these three (virtues)" (fr. 48). As cosmic forces, Psellus (Hypotyp. 11) locates these three virtues at a middle point in the Chaldean "chain."

In addition, Faith, Truth, and Love are also understood in a theurgic sense, as it is through these three virtues that the theurgist is said to unite with God (see fr. 48 and notes). Indeed, for Proclus, Faith is the supreme virtue, as it is Faith alone, as a "theurgic power" (θεουργική δύναμις), which permits union with the One (see, e.g., Th. pl., I.25; p. 112, 1-3, S.-W.; cf. In Parm. VII, p. 502, 9-12, C. Steel = p. 42, 14-16, Klibansky-Labowsky). But whether Proclus' emphasis on Faith is authentic Chaldean teaching or his own innovation remains problematic. In the extant

fragments, Eros, as both the first issue from the Father (fr. 42) and the "bond" of all things (fr. 39), is clearly the chief virtue. Although Proclus attributes his understanding of Faith to "the gods" and "the theologians" (i.e., the Juliani), it may well be that his emphasis on Faith (as the prime virtue) was prompted by rivalry with Christianity.²⁵ Whether this is the case or not (the evidence is inconclusive), Proclan Faith is not, then, the same as Christian Faith nor even traditional Platonic Faith. Christian Faith is first and foremost faith in Christ as Savior and Lord; traditional Platonic Faith is based on δόξα and conviction from sense data and, as such, is the lowest virtue. Proclan Faith, on the other hand, is a "theurgic power" which unifies the soul and unites it with God. This theurgic dimension, then, clearly links Proclus with the Chaldean tradition, as does his understanding of Faith, Truth, and Love as "purifying" virtues (see fr. 46).²⁶

This last emphasis again connects these three virtues with the Teletarchs, as these three rulers are responsible for both purifying the ascending soul of material influences as well as guiding its journey upward. (As noted supra, it was through the medium of the Teletarchs that the rays of the sun—or "Material Connectors"—were conducted downward. It was on these rays, then, that the soul ascended, guided by the Teletarchs.) Further, all three Teletarchs have additional solar connections: the Empyrean Teletarch is associated with Aion (the transmundane sun) as the intelligible source of light; the Ethereal Teletarch is associated with Helios (the mundane sun) as the direct source of the earth's light; the Material Teletarch is associated with the moon and, as such, rules the sublunar zone traversed by the rays of the visible sun.

It should also be noted here that the Iynges, Connectors, and Teletarchs were all regarded triadically by the Neoplatonists. Not only did the three together form a triad but each, individually, was triadically conceived; i.e., three Iynges, three Connectors, three Teletarchs. In Psellus' interpretation (Hypotyp. 1-5), this triadization was a result of linking all three, in some way, to the three worlds. Earlier, Proclus (on whom Psellus was dependent), had already assimilated the Chaldean system to the "intellectual" and "intelligible" triads of his own system; thus, a triadic understanding of these three entities became inevitable.²⁷

²⁷ See Lewy, Exc. VII, pp. 481-485 for a convenient synopsis of the Platonic, Orphic, and Chaldean systems as found in Proclus' writings.

4. Angels and Demons

Angels and demons are also part of the Chaldean system and, like the Iynges, Connectors, and Teletarchs, play a role in the theurgic elevation of the soul. In the first instance, Porphyry (De philos. ex or. haur., Wolff, pp. 144-145) quotes a hymn which designates three classes of ἄγγελοι ἄνακτες: those who remain in the presence of the Supreme God, those who are separated from him, and those who praise him with hymns. The first and third groups can be classed together and favorably compared to the Cherubim and Seraphim of Jewish angelology.²⁸ As for the second group, Lewy equates these "ministering angels" (who aid the ascent of the soul) with the Iynges.²⁹ In addition, Psellus (Hypotyp. 17) distinguishes a class of "archangels" in the Chaldean "chain." Although no such angels are mentioned in the extant fragments, the notice of Psellus in De aurea catena (ed. Sathas, Ann., IX, 1875, pp. 215-217) to the effect that Julian the Chaldean "prayed" that his son-to-be (sc. Julian the Theurgist) would receive the soul of an "archangel" suggests an authentic Chaldean origin.³⁰ In fr. 137 and 138, the soul of the theurgist is said to derive from the "angelic order" in general.

The Oracles also mention demons, specifically evil demons, the presence of which was widely accepted in the popular imagination at the time.³¹ Such demons were believed to inhabit all aspects of the sublunar world and be responsible for both the passionate element in humans as well as the source of sickness and disease. The Oracles identify the following types: terrestrial demons (fr. 88, 90, 91, 216); atmospheric demons (fr. 91, 216); water demons (fr. 91, 92, 216); and, perhaps, lunar demons (fr. 216). In addition, these demons are described as "bestial" and "shameless" (fr. 89) and denounced as "dogs" (fr. 90, 91). This last designation is also familiar to Synesius (e.g., H. 1(3), 96-97; 2(4), 245-257); Proclus (In rem p., II, 337, 17-18) adds that these "dogs" are "blind." Since the Chaldean tradition associated Hecate with Nature (fr. 54), it was a logical step to identify the traditional hounds of Hecate with the demons that inhabit nature. Hecate, then, became the mistress of these demons (see fr. 91 and notes).

²⁸ See Hadot, Porphyre, I, pp. 392-394; Lewy, pp. 9-15.

²⁹ Lewy, pp. 162-163.

³⁰ As cited by Lewy, p. 224 and n. 195; cf. Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 393; Cremer, pp. 63-68.

Of particular interest to the Oracles is negating the pernicious influence these demons were believed to have on the course of the theurgic rites. They had to be placated and driven off (generally by apotropaic means; see infra) if the anagōgē was to be successful. An ascetic retreat from all bodily impulses was also demanded, as demonic matter was seen to be an active, aggressive force bent on destroying man, a theme which reaches its zenith in the “underworld” of Platonism.

Good demons are also part of the Chaldean system, but are seemingly equated with the angelic order. Psellus (Hypotyp. 23) tells us that good demons aid the ascent of the soul (like the ministering angels described above) and help fight off attacks from evil demons. Proclus (e.g., In rem p., II, 296, 7-10) makes a similar distinction. Although heroes are not mentioned in the extant fragments, Iamblichus’ classification of gods, angels, demons, and heroes is most likely based on Chaldean teaching (see notes to fr. 88.)

5. Aion and Eros

A word should be said here about two other divine beings which figure prominently in the Chaldean system: Aion and Eros. In the case of Aion, we immediately have the problem of deciding whether this hypostatized entity should be understood as separate from or conflated with Chronos or Time. On the face of it, the extant fragments seem to distinguish the two: cf. ἀκοιμήτου χρόνου, fr. 37; χρόνον ἀπέραντον, fr. 39; χρόνου χρόνος, fr. 185; and the descriptions of Aion as πατρογενὲς φᾶος, fr. 49 and ὅλον φῶς, fr. 59. Lewy, however, argues that all the expressions of Time in the Oracles should be understood as descriptive of Aion and, thus, Aion should be regarded as the “Chaldean God par excellence.”³² But Lewy’s argument, in part, is based on a parallel description of Aion in what subsequent scholars (e.g., Dodds, Des Places) regard as dubious Chaldean material (e.g., Tübingen Theosophia 13; see further infra). In addition, Lewy’s contention that Proclus’ description of the Chaldean Chronos (see fr. 199 and notes) actually applies to Aion (arguing that Proclus had to attribute to Time those epithets the Chaldeans attributed to Aion in order to reconcile the Platonic Aion with that of the Oracles)³³ surely goes beyond the evidence. Lewy’s tendency to over-systematize is apparent here and rightly criticized by Dodds, who would maintain a distinction between Aion and Chronos on the basis of what the fragments more obviously suggest; i.e., the existence of two separate divine beings.³⁴ Indeed, the name "Aion" is not found in any of the extant fragments but only in the frame material (see fr. 49, 59; cf. fr. 12). Thus, following Dodds, Aion should be demoted as the principal Chaldean god (if any, it is Hecate who should receive this accolade) in favor of several Time deities, including Chronos, the ζῶναι and ἄζωνοι, and Time gods associated with Day, Night, Month, and Year (see fr. 188 and notes).

Now Aion, as described in the fragments, is regarded as "light generated from the Father" (fr. 49), "the solar world" and "whole light" (fr. 59). As such, Aion is a noetic entity identified with the transmundane sun (and thus with the Teletarch of the Empyrean World) whose principal function is to manifest the "light" (= motion) of the Father to the world of Ideas. In this capacity, Aion's role is to keep the Ideas in a state of constant circular movement, as it is through such motion that the Ideas are said to "think" (see fr. 49, 77 and notes). In effect, Aion is the hypostatized motion of an otherwise immobile Supreme God. In this regard, there is an interesting parallel in Allogenes, NHC XI, 60,25, where a similar "eternal, intellectual, undivided motion" subsists just below the "triple-powered" High God. Indeed, in the Gnostic material in general, the entire unfolding of the pleroma is understood as a procession of Aeons from the Supreme God (analogous to the "chain" of Iynges, Teletarchs, Connectors, Sources, Principles, etc. which fill up the divine spaces in the Chaldean system.) The concept of a hypostatized Eternity, of course, finds its locus classicus in Plato, Tim., 37e ff., and is subsequently found in numerous other sources (e.g., C.H. XI.2-5; Asclepius 10; Philo, Mut. Nom. 267).³⁵

But to what extent the Chaldean Aion should be regarded as a genuine god (with statues, temples, etc.) remains problematic. Lewy, for example, compares the Chaldean Aion to both the Iranian Zervan and the Mithraic Aion, but his comparisons here are again based on the descriptions of Aion in Tübingen Theosophia 13 as well as various Iranian and Mithraic sources and not on the extant fragments.³⁶ Although Proclus refers to Aion as an "intelligible god" (In Tim., III, 13, 23) who is even greater than Nous (ibid., 27, 18 ff.), he does not then describe Aion in terms that would suggest a true deity (with a cult, statues, etc., as is the case with Hecate). Proclus does say, however, that the Chaldean Chronos, as a god, was invoked during the course of a theurgic rite (or αὐτοφάνεια; see ibid., 20, 22-24) but he does not then (pace Lewy) refer to Aion in this way. The most that can be said, then, is that the Oracles, to some extent, conflated Aion (as a noetic entity) with the Oriental notion of a true Aionic deity, but the extent of this process remains in doubt.³⁷

³⁴ See "New Light," p. 266 = Lewy², p. 696.

D. Nock, "A Vision of Mandulis Aion," HTR, 27, 1934, pp. 79-99 = Essays on Religion and the Ancient World, I (Cambridge, MA, 1972), pp. 377-396; W. Bousset, "Der Gott Aion," in Religionsgeschichtliche Studien, (Leiden, 1979), pp. 192-230.

³⁶ Lewy, pp. 405-409 and notes. Nock, however, ("Aion," 1934, p. 82 = 1972, p. 382) would discount any direct equation of Aion and Zervan.

We find a similar problem with the Chaldean Eros (mentioned above in connection with the triad Faith, Truth, Love). In addition to this association, the Oracles also mention Eros independently as the "first" to "leap" from the Paternal Intellect (fr. 42). As such, Eros functions as a cosmic principle whose "binding" quality preserves a sense of harmony not only in the Universe but in the human soul as well (see frs. 43 and 44). As such, Eros functions in much the same way as the Connectors, Iynges, and Intellectual Supports; in Geudtner's analysis, these last three are all "held together" through the "binding fire" of Eros as "die ausführenden Organe des Eros."³⁸

As a cosmic principle, Eros also takes on a quasi-mythological dimension; in fr. 42, he is said to "mingle" his "binding fire" with that of the Ideas in various "Source Craters," a reflection of the "mixing" metaphor in Plato, Tim. 41d (but here, of course, it is the Demiurge who does the "mixing"). But to what extent Eros functioned as a true god in the Chaldean system cannot be recovered from the extant material.

In any event, Eros' function as an all-pervasive cosmic power which "leaps forth" from God towards man and the world goes beyond what Wallis calls the "normal Platonic 'ascending' form" of Love³⁹ (as, e.g., reflected in fr. 48), but approaches, in some respects, the Christian notion of agapē, wherein God Himself is motivated by love. But the parallel, of course, is not exact. The Oracles, for example, have no figure analogous to Christ, in whom, for Christians, the love of God is most fully manifest. However, Proclus does develop the Chaldean notion of Divine Love to its fullest extent, envisioning both gods and men as moved by Eros to help those less perfect (e.g., In Alc., I, 15 [33,8-16 Cr.] W.).

II. COSMOLOGY

The Chaldean concept of the cosmos envisions a triad of concentric circles which encompasses both the intelligible and sensible orders: the Empyrean World is properly that of the intelligible; the Ethereal, that of the fixed stars and planets; the Material comprises the sublunar realm including Earth. However, such a distinction is not explicitly made in the extant fragments (but cf. fr. 76 and see frs. 39, 61, 62, 67) but is based on information from the later Neoplatonists. Proclus, for example, tells us that the Chaldeans "divided" the Universe into Empyrean, Ethereal, and Material Worlds (In Tim., II, 57, 10-14), as does Psellus (Hypotyp. 3 and 5). But Psellus elsewhere confuses the picture by conflating these three worlds with the seven planetary spheres or στερεώματα; e.g., P.G. 122, 1149 c 1-3 where he mentions ἑπτὰ σωματικὸς κόσμους: 1 Empyrean, 3 Ethereal, 3 Material. Damascius, similarly, speaks of a "chain" of three στερεώματα: Empyrean, Ethereal, Material (II, 88, 21-22). Although Lewy thinks this confusion originates with the later Neoplatonists (and not with the Juliani),⁴⁰ the lack of supporting evidence from the fragments must leave this question in doubt. Nevertheless, a basic division into three realms is clearly a Chaldean tenet, a notion which Dillon traces back to Xenocrates and, subsequently, is found elsewhere in various Middle Platonic sources (e.g., Philo, De opif., 70-71; Quaest. in Gen., IV.8).⁴¹ However, Tardieu's suggestion that the more immediate background of the Chaldean doctrine is the Stoic concept of "three fires" (see notes to fr. 73) is even more persuasive, since Chaldean cosmology, as a whole, is informed by a heliocentrism in which the sun functions as the "heart" or "center" of the Universe (see frs. 58, 70, 111). In this regard, each of the three worlds can be viewed as a "fiery" circle dominated, respectively, by the transmundane sun, mundane sun, and moon, each of which, in turn, is equated with one of the three Teletarchs.

Now, the notion of planetary rulers is a familiar one, as well, in Gnosticism, where various Archons similarly hold sway over the celestial spheres. However, there is an important distinction to be made here. The Chaldean Teletarchs are benign, even helpful figures, who aid the ascent of the soul; in contrast, the Gnostic Archons are hostile figures who must be subdued if the soul's ascent is to be safe and sure. This distinction is based on a crucial difference in attitude towards matter: since most of the Gnostic systems emphasize a radical fissure between the highest and lowest regions (and, thus, are essentially dualistic), the created world in toto—heavenly and sublunar—is subsequently viewed in strongly negative terms. Thus creation, in the Gnostic systems (especially varieties of Valentinianism), becomes the deformed work of an ignorant ⁴¹ Dillon, pp. 168-170.

(even evil) Creator, who rules the lower world (in opposition to the High God) in conjunction with his cohorts, the Archons. This rule is regarded in terms of a repressive Heimarmene (or astral determinism).

In contrast, the Chaldean system maintains a more positive, monistic view of creation;⁴² since matter is regarded as πατρογενές ('Father-generated'), it is only the furthest outreach of matter (or the sublunar world) which is strongly negated. On the other hand, that region which is closest to the intelligible world, viz. the Ethereal World of fixed stars and planets, still retains a significant portion of the Father's 'light.' Although this realm may be 'implicated in matter' (see fr. 69), it is not then submerged in matter as is the sublunar world. (In this regard, see fr. 134 and 163, where the Material World is regarded as 'light-hating,' 'dark-gleaming,' 'foul,' 'illusive,' etc.)

Since the hylophobia of the Oracles does not extend to the Ethereal World, neither does the notion of Heimarmene. In the Chaldean system, the rule of Heimarmene is equated with φύσις or Nature (see fr. 102) and thus, with those demonic powers which pervade Nature. Thus, to 'escape' Heimarmene in the Chaldean system is to escape the control of sublunar demons which incite the passions (see fr. 153 and 154) and not, as in the Gnostic systems, to escape the domination of astral and/or planetary powers above the moon.⁴³

In the Chaldean system, the Material World is also equated with Hades, a familiar notion of the period and perhaps, as Lewy notes, originating in the idea that the torments of the Netherworld were akin to the irrational impulses of the body.⁴⁴ (In this regard, Psellus, P. G. 122, 1153 a 2-3, mentions that the Chaldeans equated Hades with the irrational soul.) In any event, Hades, as synonymous with the Material World, becomes the direct antithesis of the intelligible or Empyrean World, although, in the Oracles, the terms βάθος and βυθός are used alike to designate both the realm of the Father as well as the world of matter (see fr. 18, 163 and notes). This 'apophatic characteristic of high and low' (to borrow Tardieu's expression)⁴⁵ is also found in the Enneads as well as in various Gnostic sources and underscores the idea that both the highest and lowest levels, at least on the surface, are utterly simple. The crucial difference, however, is that simplicity at the highest level signifies that the Supreme God is beyond all categories of form whereas, at the lowest level, it means that matter, as utter sterility (see fr. 100 and 134), is devoid of all form and, thus, needs to be informed. In the Oracles, this informing process is depicted dynamically 'in terms of the Second or Demiurgic Intellect hurling the Ideas (as thunderbolts) into the "wombs" of the World Soul.

In addition to this association with matter, Hades may also have been regarded as a personal god in the Chaldean system. Although the extant fragments do not mention Hades in this regard, Psellus does: he attributes to Chaldean belief the notion that Hades is the ἀρχηγὸν τῆς περιγείου λήξεως (P.G., 122, 1152 d 5-6). According to Lewy, this is an "authentic Chaldean concept" which ultimately reflects notions about the evil Ahriman. As such, argues Lewy, the Chaldean Hades (like Ahriman) would then be Lord of the demons which inhabit the Material World.⁴⁶ A Prince of demons is also found in Synesius' De Providentia (in the figure of Typhon); Porphyry, as well, recognizes a Chief of demons (e.g., De abst., II, 37-43). Both of these writers, of course, are dependent on Chaldean demonology. (Julian pater, as noted earlier, wrote four books περὶ δαιμόνων.) But these observations must be tempered by the fact that the extant fragments evidently assign this dubious honor to Hecate (see fr. 91 and notes). Thus, the extent to which Hecate's role in this capacity was distinguished from that of Hades cannot be known, except to acknowledge the presence of both in the Chaldean system as Ruler(s) of demons.

III. ANTHROPOLOGY

Chaldean anthropology is essentially informed by a Platonic-derived body/soul dualism in which the soul is depicted as descending into matter (via the ether, sun, moon, and air—the raiments of which make up the "vehicle" of the soul; see fr. 61 and further below) to "serve" the body ("our rushing vessel;" see fr. 186) but, hopefully, with an "untamed neck" (see fr. 99). As described by Synesius, this is actually a two-fold descent in which the soul first "serves" (θητεύειν) the body, and then becomes "enslaved" (δουλεύειν) to it (see H. 1(3), 571 ff.; cf. De insomn., 139 c). This "enslavement" or submersion into matter is also referred to as a kind of "intoxication," wherein the soul is said to be "drunk" on material distractions and thus needs to "sober up" and reflect on its divine origins and the nature of the Divine World (a familiar theme in the Platonic "underworld;" see fr. 15 and notes).

⁴⁶ Lewy, pp. 279-293.

The Oracles also distinguish two types of men: the theurgists (οἱ θεουργοί) and “the herd” (ἡ ἀγέλη). The former are those whose souls are properly purified and thus saved; the latter comprise the mass of men who plunge headlong into the whirl of passions (see fr. 153, 154 and notes). Although no further types of men are mentioned in the extant fragments, Cremer argues that the three classes of individuals outlined in Iamblichus, De myst., V.18 are based on Chaldean doctrine.⁴⁷ The first group would constitute “the herd” (ἡ ἀγέλη) or those totally involved with the material world; the third group would comprise “the few” (οἱ ὀλίγοι) or those free of all material constraints (and thus equivalent to the theurgists); the second group would be made up of those in between or “the middle men” (οἱ μέσοι) who, according to Iamblichus, are midway between φύσις (= material world) and καθαρόν νοῦς (= intelligible world). Although the extant fragments do not mention this middle group, Cremer points out that Iamblichus’ tripartite division of men in V.18 exactly parallels a similar tripartition of gods (noeric, ethereal, hylic) in V.19. Thus, both gods and men would correspond to the Empyrean (= noeric), Ethereal, and Material Worlds of Chaldean theology. Based on this evidence, then, it is likely that a tripartite classification of men can be assumed for the Oracles as well, especially given the Chaldean fondness for triadic classifications of all types.

According to the fragments, the souls of the theurgists are said to derive from the angelic order, from which point they incarnate with the purpose of aiding mankind (see fr. 122, 123, 138 and notes. The figure of Osiris in Synesius’ De Providentia is clearly modelled on this idea.) But this descent is not simply an automatic one, but a willful choosing to reincarnate, as the theurgist has the option of remaining “forever” in the intelligible realm (fr. 138). Smith suggests that this latter idea may have influenced Porphyry, who affirmed the permanent release of the soul⁴⁸ (see De regressu an., p. 41*, 22-25 Bidez), but the seed of such a notion is also apparent in Plotinus; e.g., Enn. II.2.4.8-11; 4.6.30 ff. However, Porphyry was most likely influenced by that Chaldean doctrine which denied reincarnation in bestial form (see fr. 160). Porphyry accepts this doctrine (see, e.g., De regressu an., p. 38*, 10-15 Bidez) contra Plotinus, who had favored the idea of transmigration not only in animal but vegetable form as well (based on the premise that a soul which succumbs to its basest elements deserves a similar existence; see, e.g., Enn. III.4.2; IV.3.12.25-29). The Oracles happily reject this idea. Indeed, the Oracles apparently grant the lower soul (and its vehicle) a permanent post-mortem dwelling place in the Ethereal World (see fr. 158 and further below); the rational soul, then, ascending to the intelligible or Empyrean World and entering "paradise" (or the choir of angels which perpetually praise the Father with hymns; see fr. 165 and notes). Unpurified souls, however, would spend a period of time in Hades, undergoing some form of retribution and/or purification until they were ready to return to Earth (see fr. 162 and notes).

IV. SOTERIOLOGY

The principle means of salvation in the Chaldean system involves the purification of the soul via the techniques of theurgy. Although the precise term θεουργία does not appear in the extant fragments, the related noun θεουργοί does (fr. 153). However, Cremer overstates his case when he declares that the Oracles are "der konstituierende Bestandteil der Theurgie; vor ihnen und ohne sie gibt es keine Theurgie."⁴⁹ After all, the Suda, s.v., reports that Julian *fil*s wrote θεουργικά, τελεστικά, and λόγια δ' ἐπ' ὧν, suggesting the existence of three separate works.⁵⁰ In this regard, Boyancé has shown that the term τελεστικά, as it refers to the art of fabricating statues, has a much wider application than Chaldean usage.⁵¹ Thus Boyancé, contra Dodds, would separate τελεστικά from θεουργικά.⁵² (Dodds had relegated τελεστικά to a "branch" of theurgy.⁵³ Smith similarly speaks of "branches" of theurgy.)⁵⁴ The problem here, of course, is whether all things Chaldean are equally theurgic (Cremer's assumption). The confusion, in part, goes back to the later Neoplatonists, who often referred to the Juliani collectively as οἱ θεουργοί as well as οἱ Χαλδαῖοι.⁵⁵ But this is an observation after the fact. Indeed, if it was Julian *fil*s (or Julian the Theurgist) who actually coined the term θεουργία,⁵⁶ then the tradition associated with Julian pater (or Julian the Hadot, "Bilan et perspectives," p. 704, n. 3), I still think it prudent to keep the three titles distinct.

Chaldean) could not have been understood, at least initially, as a tradition of theurgy. Thus, any tradition "handed down" from father to son (including the Oracles) might properly be labelled "Chaldean" but not, in every respect, necessarily "theurgic." That the two terms are closely related goes without saying, but any absolute identification (as Hadot notes)⁵⁷ must remain problematic.

A further difficulty is a matter of definition: how exactly are we to define the word "theurgy?" One possibility (as suggested, e.g., by Eitrem and Dodds) is that theurgy should be understood in the sense of "working on" or even "creating" the gods, thus emphasizing the role of the theurgist as the principal agent in the theurgic ergon.⁵⁸ But theurgy involves more than just "working on" the gods; it also involves the active participation of the gods themselves. Theurgy, then, can best be characterized as "divine action," since theurgy properly involves not only "divine actions" on the part of men, but the "action of the Divine" on behalf of men. As A. Smith aptly puts it: "Men are involved in the operation of ritual or divine action, but it is the Divine which achieves results."⁵⁹

Theurgy as praxis, then, can be distinguished from theology as speculation (indeed, it may be that Julian *fil*s "invented" the term theurgy to distinguish his activity from that of the θεολόγοι, or those who merely "think" about the gods)⁶⁰, but how are we to distinguish theurgy from magic, which it more closely resembles? Is theurgy simply a form of "white" or "good" magic, in contrast to the "black" or "evil" magic associated with the name goēteia, as some scholars have suggested?⁶¹ Yes and no. Theurgy certainly appropriates many of the techniques familiar to the magician, but its purpose is quite different: whereas "common" magic has a "profane" goal (e.g., in its "white" form, influencing a lover or affecting the weather), theurgy has a specific religious or salvific end, namely, the purification and salvation of the soul (see, e.g., Eitrem, p. 76: "...il y a une proche parente entre la magie et la théurgie;" pp. 72-73: "...des communs efforts et des communs remèdes des magiciens et des théurges;" Lewy, p. 238: "...the magical art of the Chaldean theurgists did not differ in essentials from that of their competitors (the 'goets')."

Iamblichus, De myst., I.12: τῆς ψυχῆς σωτήριον). In addition, and most importantly, theurgy emphasizes a passive attitude towards the gods (with the gods taking the initiative), whereas magic involves coercing or forcing the gods against their will. This aspect of theurgy is especially emphasized by Iamblichus, who repeatedly stresses that the rites of theurgy (contra goēteia) do not involve the forcing or drawing down of the gods but, rather, entail a free and willing bestowal of Divine power by which the gods purify the devout and draw them upward (see, e.g., De myst., I.12; 14; II.6; 11; III.1; 10; 18; IV.2). For Cremer, this distinction is so critical that he baldly states: "...ist eine Gleichsetzung von Theurgie und Magie nicht mehr möglich."⁶² If magic is to be defined essentially as coercion,⁶³ then theurgy can no longer be confused with magic, as both its intent (the salvation of the soul) and effect (a passive relation with the gods) are counter to magical practice as it is commonly understood. Theurgy, therefore, should be regarded basically as a religious phenomenon, albeit one that is comfortable with the outward forms of magic.

In this regard, Trouillard compares, indeed equates, theurgy with Christian sacramentalism, emphasizing a common principle of ex opere operato as well as a similar notion of Divine "grace."⁶⁴ In the first instance, it is through "act" alone (e.g., gestures, signs, manipulation of objects) that the Divine reveals itself. In Iamblichus' words (De myst., II.11): "The tokens (συνθήματα) themselves, by themselves, effect their own work." Secondly, the efficacy of any ritual act (theurgic or sacramental) depends not on constraint (as stressed supra), but on the willing, "gracious" presence of God. Based on these similarities, then, Trouillard concludes that theurgy and Christian sacramentalism are essentially the same, the only difference being that of orientation; i.e., Christian sacramentalism (especially the Eucharist, which Trouillard views as the "center" of the Sacraments) "continues the history of a man-God," whereas theurgy is fixed in "mythic thought."⁶⁵ This may be so (although theurgic ritual, pace Trouillard, in no sense recalls the adventures of any mythic personage; on this point, Trouillard confuses theurgic ritual with that of the Mysteries), but a more important point of contrast, I think, can be found in a fundamental difference in world view. Christian sacramentalism, after all, is based on a theistic view which assumes an essential difference between Creator and creation. Thus, any sacramental act performed here below must ultimately depend for its effect on an irruption of the Divine into an otherwise natural order. In contrast, theurgy is based on an emanationist view which posits a "sympathetic" link between all aspects of the cosmos; the emphasis here is on sameness, not difference. Thus theurgy, unlike Christian sacramentalism, depends not on any inbreaking of the Divine but, rather, on a recognition of the Divine's presence in even the basest matter. (In this regard, see, e.g., Proclus, El. Th., props. 144 and 145.) It is on this point, then, that theurgy and Christian sacramentalism part company.

⁶³ Cf. Barb, p. 101: "The fundamental difference between magic and religion is still the same as it always was. On the one hand, we have the religious man, offering his adorations in humble supplication to the Deity; always careful to add to any supplication the reservation 'if it be according to Thy Will.' On the other hand, we have the magician, attempting to force the supernatural powers to accomplish what he desires and avert what he fears." For more recent assessments of the relation between magic and religion in Antiquity see, e. g., A. F. Segal, "Hellenistic Magic: Some Questions of Definition," in Studies in Gnosticism and Hellenistic Religions, ed. by R. van den Broek and M. J. Vermaseren (Leiden, 1981), pp. 349-375; D. E. Trouillard suggestively defines theurgy as "un symbolisme opératoire destiné à éveiller la présence divine." He also emphatically states that "la théurgie n'est pas la magie."

In the following sections, the theurgical praxis associated with the Chaldean system is outlined in detail, based on information from both the extant fragments as well as relevant parallel material from other sources. Lewy's attempt to systematize this material, of course, cannot be applauded enough. However, many problems remain. Indeed, as Hadot points out, if we agree that the Oracles (in whole or part) were received via mediumistic trance over a period of time, then, in Hadot's words, "toutes les expressions Chaldaïques ne peuvent être totalement cohérentes, et les reconstructions systématiques doivent être menées avec la plus grande prudence."⁶⁶ Dodds is similarly cautious, while at the same time praising Lewy's attempt "to dovetail together the smallest scraps of information."⁶⁷ Such caveats apply not only to the theological constructs which inform the Chaldean system (with its awkward fusion of gods, goddesses, and philosophical hypostases), but to the actual practices which come under the rubric of theurgy.

Lewy broadly separates the latter into "magical ritual" and "theurgical elevation," with the purpose of distinguishing certain isolated rites from the anagōgē proper. However, this separation is somewhat arbitrary, as Lewy himself admits,⁶⁸ since no systematic presentation of Chaldean theurgic ritual is preserved in any of the relevant sources. Nonetheless, it is more than likely that Chaldean theurgic practice was close, in many respects, to those traditions preserved in the magical papyri (and reflected, as well, in various Gnostic and Hermetic rites of ascent) and, indeed, as more recent scholarship suggests, may well have included a genuine noetic/contemplative element at the highest levels of ascent. These and other issues are discussed below.

A. Conjunction

The term "conjunction" (σύστασις), although it appears just once in a questionable fragment (fr. 208), is familiar to us from its widespread use in the magical papyri (as Eitrem has admirably demonstrated).⁶⁹ The term refers to the "communication" or "contact" (but not "union")⁷⁰ of the theurgist (or magician) with a particular god or spirit. It was via this particular rite that Julian the Chaldean purportedly "conjoined" (συνέσθησε) the soul of Julian filis with that of Plato and "all the gods" (see notes to fr. 84). Proclus was also adept in the art of conjunction (see fr. 208) and reports that such practices were especially used by the Chaldeans to "conjoin" with the various Time gods (e.g., Night, Day, Month, Year) as well as with Chronos himself (see In Tim., III, 32, 16 ff.; 89, 15 ff.). The principal means of effecting this contact was through the use of various invocations: the adept "called upon" the god by uttering his divine names, which amounted to a lengthy recitation of unintelligible vowel and consonant sounds. Such nomina barbara (see fr. 150) or voces mysticae (equivalent to the συνθήματα and σύμβολα; see frr. 2, 108, 109 and notes) are found throughout the magical papyri as well as in certain Gnostic and Hermetic texts and are a staple of late Antique magical practice. Although a cursory glance at these lists of sounds reveals what appears to be a random selection of so much vocal gibberish, closer scrutiny shows that there are definite patterns not only to the arrangements of the vowels and consonants, but also in terms of numerical equations, all of which had potent magical properties.⁷¹ By rhythmically chanting these sounds (which equalled the "hidden" or divine name of the god), the adept was able to effect the proper conjunction with the god.

The σύστασις with a specific deity or spirit could also be effected via material means. Psellus, in a long passage (P.G. 122, 881 b-c), relates a Chaldean "covenant" involving the burying and digging up of certain purified "hylic" substances (e.g., spices, plants, stones) as a means of conjoining with the corresponding spirit of the plant or stone. The chief effect of this particular conjunction was to form a "compact" with the invoked spirit so that he would function as a ministering agent during the soul's ascent (and thus help ward off demonic attack).⁷²

B. Conjunction

Another rite involved the actual "conjuring up" of a specific deity who would then prophesy to the theurgist. This process of conjunction could seemingly proceed in one of two ways: either by animating the god's statue or by a ritual of "binding" and "loosing."

1. Animation of statues

This particular rite properly comes under the rubric of τελεστική, although (as noted above) both the term and the rite (like the term σύστασις) have a wider application than Chaldean usage. Ultimately, the art of statue vivification goes back to an Egyptian origin.⁷³ The actual term τελεστική, however, does not appear in the extant fragments; it is possible, then, that the later Neoplatonists derived most (but not all) of their information on the subject from the τελεστικά of Julian *fil.*⁷⁴

According to Psellus (see Bidez, Mélanges Cumont, p. 95), this τελεστική ἐπιστήμη involved the placing of certain stones, herbs, even small animals (all designated as σύμβολα; cf. fr. 108 and notes) within the cavity of a statue to establish a "sympathetic" relation with the god. Iamblichus (De myst., V.23) makes a similar statement (although using the expression ἡ θεουργικὴ τέχνη), stressing that these "sacred" (ἱερά), "perfect" (τέλεια), and "godlike" (θεοειδή) objects provided a "complete and pure receptacle" (δοχὴν ὁλοτελῆ καὶ καθαρὰν) for the god. A comparable rite is described in fr. 224 (although this is properly a "Porphyrian," not Chaldean, oracle; see notes ad loc.), where Hecate gives instructions on how to fashion her "image;" in this case, from lizards and herbs "in the clear air under the waxing moon," in conjunction with a prayer (missing from the text but probably composed, in part, from nomina barbara; cf., e.g., Mithras Liturgy, p. 23 ff., Meyer).

The operative principle behind all these procedures is that of sympatheia, a notion which assumes a direct correspondence between a given deity and his or her symbolic representative in the animal, mineral, and vegetable worlds. Thus, by properly fashioning and consecrating the god's "material image" (and then placing it in the god's statue), he or she could be persuaded to appear (generally in the form of light) and answer the questions put to him by the theurgist. The "illumination" from the deity also aided the purification of the soul and its "vehicle" (see further infra).

2. Binding and Loosing

This rite (like that of σύστασις and τελεστική) must be largely reconstructed from sources outside the Oracles (including the "Doubtful Fragments"—especially the "Porphyrian" oracles—of our own text). Again, it is a matter of a common magical practice appropriated by the theurgists for their own ends.

The technique itself involved the "binding" of a god in a human medium (again, via the utterance of voces mysticae) and then "loosing" him (via similar formulae) when the rite was completed. Fr. 141 suggests that the medium himself could effect the "loosing" (ἐκλυσίς) of the god simply by turning his thoughts to "earthly things."

In any event, what is important to stress here is that it was not the theurgist, but the god invoked, who had ultimate control over the rite. Although (as Lewy notes) the Chaldeans freely used the current vocabulary of conjuration (e.g., δεσμοί, ἀνάγκη, βία; cf. Psellus, Scripta minora = Des Places, p. 221: οἱ Χαλδαῖοι δεσμοῦσι καὶ λύουσιν (sc. τοὺς θεούς)) they did not then claim to have power over the gods, as the gods themselves had communicated the very spells which would bind them.⁷⁵ This point is underscored in fr. 222, where Hecate appears at the behest of an "eloquent prayer" which the gods had initially suggested. Porphyry uses the apt phrase "persuasive necessity" (πειθανάγκη; fr. 219) to convey this same sense of gentle persuasion (as opposed to the active coercion of the magician; in this regard, cf. frr. 220, 221, and 223, where the gods invoked complain about being bound "against their will," an important argument for a non-Chaldean origin for these particular fragments. See notes ad loc.).

Prior to the rite, the officiants—or “caller” (κλήτωρ) and “receiver” (δοχεύς; see fr. 211 and cf. Proclus, In Crat., 100, 21-22: αἱ θεουργαὶ τοὺς μὲν κλήτορας καὶ τοὺς δοχέας...προκαθαίρειν παρακελεύονται)—underwent preliminary purifications of some kind (probably via fire and water; see Proclus, ibid., and cf. fr. 133 and notes) and were clothed in special garments (cf. Proclus, In rem p., II, 246, 23-25). We might suppose that in certain instances, the “caller” himself functioned as the medium. This is apparently the case in the magical papyri.⁷⁶

The actual presence of the god was manifest in various ways. Iamblichus, for example (see De myst., III.5), describes several types of divine possession (ἐπίπνοια, ἐνθουσιασμός, θεοφορία), each of which could be verified by certain physical reactions; e.g., levitation, bodily and facial movements, complete immobility, changes in voice, insensitivity to fire, etc. In addition, luminous apparitions often appeared, sometimes seen entering or leaving the medium’s body. In this regard, Iamblichus (De myst., III.6) distinguishes between apparitions seen by the “caller” (τῷ θεαγωγῶντι), those viewed by the “receiver” (τῷ δεχομένῳ), and those witnessed by all (τοῖς πᾶσιν θεωροῦσι)—this last apparently the most desired effect.

Although distinctions of this type are not made in the extant fragments, the information we do have generally confirms Iamblichus’ statements. In fr. 146, for example, the deity invoked (probably Hecate) is said to appear in a variety of luminous shapes; e.g., as a “fiery child,” “sumptuous light,” “dazzling horse,” even a “formless fire” (from which the goddess communicated with the theurgist; cf. fr. 148). Other fragments (frs. 144 and 145) stress that the gods are initially without form (ἄτύπωτα) but take on various shapes in order to become visible to human sight, this “forming” process taking place either in the Ethereal or Emphyrean realm (see fr. 144 and notes).

The technical terms for these “self-manifestations” are also found in the extant fragments; αὐτοπτον ἄγαλμα, fr. 101; αὐτόπτοις φάσμασιν, fr. 142 (but without clear distinctions). Proclus, on the other hand (following Iamblichus), distinguishes between autoptic visions (or those seen by the medium or receiver) and epoptic visions (or those viewed only by the caller; see the remarks of Psellus, P. G., 122, 1136 c-d). This vocabulary of self-manifestation is also found in the magical papyri, sometimes in conjunction with the term σύστασις; e.g., αὐτοπτος σύστασις (PGM IV.220;

⁷⁶ See Lewy, p. 43, who claims that there is no instance in the magical papyri and literature of a “recipient” other than the “caller” himself. Thus, says Lewy: “We may therefore suppose that the Chaldeans derived their conception of the ‘recipient’...from oracular usage.” But Lewy’s contention that the term δοχεύς is a Chaldean neologism is problematic; see notes to fr. 211.

930).⁷⁷ Whether these two terms were conflated in the Chaldean tradition as well is not known; Marinus, for one, suggests not. He tells us (Vita Procli 28) that Proclus, as part of his "theurgic labors" (θεουργικά ἐνεργήματα), first experienced luminous "visions of Hecate (φάσμασι Ἑκατικοῖς φωτοειδέσιν αὐτοπτουμένοις) and then, as part of the "proper order" (ἐν τάξει), went on to experience the Chaldean "conjunctions" (συστάσεις; see fr. 208). Since the extant fragments do point to some sort of orderly theurgic progression (see, e.g., the use of τάξις in fr. 110; cf. βαθμίς, fr. 164; cf., also, fr. 136 and notes), Marinus' remarks may well reflect a Chaldean Vorlage.

Now Dodds has likened these luminous visions to the "ectoplasm" of modern seances, and suggests that theurgic mediumship, in general, is not unlike that of present-day "spiritualism" (and even chides Lewy for not noting this "helpful analogy").⁷⁸ But is there really an analogy here? After all, the purpose of a seance is to communicate with dead friends and relatives, not to evoke a deity in the context of a "sacramental" rite. (The repeated insistence of the later Neoplatonists on this precise point cannot be overlooked.) Indeed, in what sense can we compare the "ectoplasm" of a deceased human with the luminous form of a god or goddess? Surely there is an important (even qualitative) difference here.⁷⁹

C. Magical Instruments and Objects

The "magic wheel" (στρόφαλος; see fr. 206) of Hecate was mentioned above in connection with the Iynges. Although this association is not explicitly made in the extant fragments (but cf. ἀόκνω στροφάλιγγι, fr. 49

⁷⁸ See "Theurgy," 1947, pp. 66-69 = 1957, pp. 296-299; "New Light," p. 269 = Lewy², p. 698. Cf. "Supernormal Phenomena in Classical Antiquity," (= chapt. X, pp. 156-210 of The Ancient Concept of Progress, Oxford, 1973) where Dodds again emphasizes the similarities between theurgy and modern-day spiritualism but notes here, in addition, the point I make, viz. that "with all their similarities there is associated one fundamental contrast: what the spiritualists ascribe to the activity of a discarnate human mind the theurgists normally attribute to gods or non-human daemons" (p. 206). Dodds accounts for this difference by stressing the pagan fear of the disembodied dead as "angry dangerous spirits" whose "company was not as a rule desired" (ibid.). The modern attitude towards the dead is, of course, far more benign. But I would still maintain that there is an important, indeed qualitative, distinction between communing with a god in the context of a theurgic rite and communing with one's dead grandmother in a darkened parlor.

⁷⁹ A closer "modern" parallel might be the ritual evocation of the goddess Astarte described by R. Ellwood, Mysticism and Religion (Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1980), pp. 136-138. Ellwood claims that his experience culminated in "a powerful and unanticipated change of consciousness or bolt of ecstatic energy" which he likened (rightly or wrongly) to a "mystical experience."

and 87), Psellus equates the two (P.G., 122, 1133 a 8-9). As Psellus describes it, this "magic wheel" (or Iynx) was a golden sphere embedded with a sapphire and swung around by means of a leather strap. On the surface of the wheel magical characters were engraved. By swinging this wheel, the theurgist would imitate the motion of the heavenly spheres and thus "sympathetically" attract the celestial Iynxes (which would then function as "messengers" between the theurgist and the gods).⁸⁰ In addition, the swinging of this wheel could evidently be used for more profane ends. Marinus (Vita Procli 28; cf. fr. 208) tells us that Proclus, by using "certain Iynxes" (ἰνγγά τινα) caused rain to fall in Attica, thus ending a serious drought. Julian filis, as well, was known as a prodigious rain-maker; see Suda, s.v.

Brass instruments of some type (as well as birds) may also have been used in the Chaldean rites (see fr. 210 and notes), probably as an apotropaic means of warding off evil demons. (One is reminded here of the clanging of brass pots and pans at the time of the Roman Lemuria.) As for the apotropaic use of birds, see, e.g., Porphyry, De abst., 4.16.) Other apotropaic devices included the wearing of magical amulets, the offering of sacred stones (e.g., the mnizouris stone of fr. 149), as well as animal sacrifices.⁸¹ None of this, of course, is original. Like all the rites discussed above, the use of instruments and objects was common magical fare. But in a theurgic context, these various practices take on salvific significance; the end result was not mere manipulation, but the very salvation of the soul.

D. Anagōgē

Although the term ἀναγωγή does not appear in any of the undoubted fragments (but cf. ἀναγωγός, fr. 190 and notes), a developed doctrine of the ascent of the soul is clearly a Chaldean teaching. The term itself goes back to Plato, who used variants of ἀνάγειν to describe both the "ascent" of certain heroes from Hades to Olympus (e.g., Rep. VII, 521 c) as well as the "leading up" of the soul via dialectical reasoning (e.g., Rep. VII, 533 d).⁸² It is in this latter sense that Plotinus develops this term—the Plotinian anagōgē, in effect, understood as a contemplative process which brings the soul to greater and greater degrees of intellectual purification. In contrast, the Oracles regard the "leading up" of the soul as a ritual event; here, the soul ascends on the "rays" of the sun aided both by the ⁸⁰ Eitrem compares this "magic wheel" of Hecate with the traditional rhombos of the magician; see "Théurgie," pp. 78-79.

theurgist and the gods. This difference in approach can be attributed to a fundamental difference in attitude towards the soul. Since Plotinus maintained that the higher (or rational) part of the soul remained un-fallen, and therefore impassible, the individual need only recognize this fact, turn away (via his own moral efforts) from the material distractions of the lower soul, and return (via mental and philosophical disciplines) to his true nature—that of unfettered contemplation of the intelligible world. (Plotinus' purported success at combining his contemplative and active lives would certainly be personal testimony to this optimistic view of the soul.)⁸³

In contrast, the Oracles place a much greater emphasis on the fall of the soul in toto; since the soul is in constant danger of becoming totally enslaved to matter (see discussion supra), there is a much greater need for aid, both divine and human, in restoring the soul to its elemental state. The Oracles especially place an emphasis on purifying the lower soul and its "vehicle" (or ὄχημα-πνεῦμα; see, e.g., fr. 104 and notes), as it is this vehicle (formed of accretions from the ether, sun, moon, and air; see fr. 61 and notes) which keeps the soul fettered in matter. Unhappily, the extant fragments do not give us any detailed information on the precise relation of this vehicle to the lower soul; it may even be the case that the two were sometimes conflated, but our evidence on this point is not secure (cf. fr. 158 and notes).

This doctrine of the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα, of course, does not originate with the Oracles.⁸⁴ It is a general Middle Platonic and Neoplatonic theme, found in a variety of sources, and ultimately reflects a creative reworking of Plato's statements about the "vehicles" (ὀχήματα) of the stars combined with Aristotle's reflections on the soul's πνεῦμα. (According to Dodds, the earliest extant passage where these two terms are linked is Galen's De Placitis Hippocratis et Platonis, p. 643 Muller.)⁸⁵ The principle role of the vehicle was to join the soul to the body; it thus functioned (in Synesius' words) as a "middle body" (μέσον σῶμα; De insomn., 135 d)

which provided a mediating link between incorporeality and corporeality. The ὄχημα-πνεῦμα was also regarded as the seat of both sensation and imagination; Simplicius, for example, refers to the ὄχημα as both αἰσθητικόν and φανταστικόν (De anima, p. 17).⁸⁶

Now the later Neoplatonists all accepted the doctrine of the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα, but with varying emphases. Porphyry, for example, believed that the vehicle was attached only to the irrational soul and that, after death, both would be resolved into their constituent elements. For Porphyry, only the rational or higher soul could truly be saved and only through the type of philosophical speculation espoused by Plotinus. In this regard, Porphyry—like Plotinus—argued that the higher soul never actually descended into matter, but remained eternally above in the intelligible order. Therefore, one need only exercise the power of his intellect via philosophical contemplation to revert back to his true nature. Although Porphyry conceded that theurgic praxis could purify the lower soul and its vehicle, the use of such ritual was of value only to the ordinary man who could not follow the entire Plotinian path. In any event, for Porphyry, theurgy could elevate the soul only to a position within the material world. It could never lead the soul back to the One.

Iamblichus, on the other hand, admitted that both the irrational soul and its vehicle were worthy of salvation (along with the rational or higher soul), and that all three could be purified by theurgy. Since Iamblichus maintained that the soul, in its entirety, was implicated in matter, the corresponding use of theurgy—at every level of the soul—could therefore elevate the soul beyond the material to the intelligible world and ultimately back to the One. This is also the case with Proclus who, in addition, further developed the theory of the soul's vehicle, asserting an immaterial "luminous body" (ἀύγοειδὲς σῶμα) for the higher soul (not subject to corruption), as well as a perishable, material vehicle (πνευματικὸν ὄχημα) for the lower soul (see fr. 119, 120 and notes). Although Proclus believed that theurgy could purify both parts of the soul and their corresponding vehicles, only the higher soul and its immaterial vehicle would ultimately be saved.

As for Chaldean doctrine concerning the salvation of the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα, we are again on tentative ground. Dodds and Lewy, for example, had argued against its salvation.⁸⁷ Geudtner, however, based on an acute interpretation of the terminology in fr. 128 and 129 (see notes ad loc.), argues the opposite view, i.e., that the vehicle not only survives death but secures a post-mortem dwelling place in the Ethereal realm.⁸⁸ If this is the case (and other scholars would concur), then the Chaldean position would prefigure that adopted by Iamblichus.

The next problem, then, is ascertaining the Chaldean position vis-à-vis the purification/salvation of the higher soul. As noted above, both Iamblichus and Proclus argued that the higher soul could be purified via theurgy; Porphyry said no, maintaining that contemplation alone (in the Plotinian manner) was effective at this level. If we look at the extant fragments, it is clear that a majority allude to obvious ritual/theurgic procedures (as described above); however, frs. 1 and 9a, in contrast, suggest some form of contemplative experience. In fr. 1, for example, the theurgist is counselled by the gods to “extend an empty mind” (τεῖναι κεκεδὲν νόον) towards the Highest God (or τι νοητόν) in order to “perceive” (νοεῖν) him. Similarly, in fr. 9a, the advice is “to extend the perceptive faculty in the soul” (anime noema ampliare) “towards the One” (in unum)—both of these experiences understood as a movement away from concrete, sensible images (cf. multivarium aliud, fr. 9a) towards an intuitive grasp of the Highest Reality. In fr. 1, this intuitive perception is achieved via the “flower/flame of mind;” i.e., that most discreet part of the mind which is akin to the fiery, intelligible essence of the Father.

Now this kind of language is strikingly reminiscent of Plotinus’ via negativa approach to the One. In Plotinian terms, (e.g., Enn. VI.9.8-11), this ascent to the One involves a “stripping away” of multiplicity, a “putting away of otherness,” a “going forth from the self,” a “simplifying,” a “self-surrender,” an “extension towards contact,” a “rest,” the “flight of the alone to the Alone.” For Plotinus, this ultimate experience—this “flight” of the solitary soul towards the solitary One—is specifically mediated through “the prime part of νοῦς” or “that element in νοῦς which is not νοῦς” but is akin to the One (see, e.g., Enn. V.5.8.22-23 and notes to fr. 1)—an obvious analogue to the Chaldean ἄνθος νοῦ.⁸⁹ Thus, in both instances, the ultimate experience is that of a supra-rational state of unified intuition at the very highest levels of ascent. Given these parallels, then, how are we to reconcile this apparent inner, contemplative apprehension of the Divine with the type of external, ritual theurgy generally associated with the Chaldean anagōgē?

Several solutions have been proposed. Cremer, for example (based on the remarks of Iamblichus in De myst., VI.7), understands fr. 1 as descriptive of the passive mental attitude necessary for the theurgist to achieve before he can proceed with his theurgic labors.⁹⁰ In this analysis, τι νοητόν would not signify the Highest God but be an equivalent expression for Iamblichus' μόνοι οἱ θεοί who, in contra-distinction to demons, must be approached "without violence" (οὐ σφοδρότητι, fr. 1 = οὐδαμοῦ ἀπειλή, De myst., VI.7)—that is, "passively." Cremer would also equate Iamblichus' expression καθαρὸς λόγος with the ἄνθος νοῦ of fr. 1 and thus understand this latter term as expressive of the theurgist's "pure" (= "passive") approach to the gods. Although this is a suggestive interpretation, Cremer makes an important oversight—that Iamblichus elsewhere (Comm. In Parm., frs. 2A and 2B Dillon; see notes to fr. 1) uses the ἄνθος νοῦ terminology precisely as it is most obviously used here; i.e., in connection with the contemplative apprehension of the Supreme God (or τι νοητόν).

Lewy's interpretation of fr. 1 is similarly problematic. Since Lewy, as Cremer, views the Chaldean anagōgē as strictly a ritual event, he, too, is forced to interpret the language of fr. 1 in like terms. Thus, for Lewy, the contemplative language of fr. 1 would not express a Plotinian-type experience as such, but reflect, instead, only the appropriation of Platonic philosophical terminology to express what, in fact, is a theurgic/ritual illumination. In Lewy's words:

Plato compared the illumination accompanying the vision of the Ideas with that experienced by the initiate at the culminating point of the mystery. The Chaldeans, on the other hand, used the image of philosophical vision in order to represent the illumination of their initiate. Their equivocal mode of expression gave the Neoplatonists the possibility to interpret the injunctions of the Oracles concerning ritual ceremonies as figurative expressions of spiritual experiences; they could thus identify the Chaldean mystery of the ascent towards the divine light with the Plotinian intellectual process of self-perfection which is independent of all external action. The greater part of their injunctions relating to the accomplishment of the Chaldean mystery of immortality receive in the texts in which they have come down to us a spiritual interpretation.⁹¹

Although Lewy is correct, methodologically, to caution against accepting, prima facie, the various Neoplatonizing interpretations of the Oracles, he is guilty of overstatement when he suggests that most of these interpretations must then be considered suspect. Indeed, it may be the case that the Neoplatonists gave a "spiritual" interpretation to many of the injunctions of the Oracles (including fr. 1) precisely because this was their intent in the first place.

⁹⁰ Cremer, pp. 11-13; cf. p. 125.

Hadot, for one, is aware of this and asks, in particular, whether the Oracles actually proposed two alternative methods of ascent; i.e., a theurgic method and a “purely spiritual” method. To reconcile this apparent contradiction, Hadot suggests that the Chaldean anagōgē may well have been close to Porphyrian conceptions, viz. theurgical purification for the lower soul, leading to union with the lesser gods; philosophical or contemplative purification for the higher soul, culminating in union with the One (or Chaldean Father).⁹² A. Smith makes a similar observation but prefers to speak in terms of a “lower” and “higher” theurgy, the former concerned with the “lower gods” and therefore “material in its ritual,” the latter addressed to the “transcendent gods” and, therefore, “less material” (if at all) in its “ritual elements.” Smith’s distinction is based primarily on his reading of Iamblichus’ De mysteriis, but suggests that some form of “lower” and “higher” theurgy may already have been present in the Oracles.⁹³

The problem here is that Hadot seemingly wants to maintain a distinction between theurgy per se and philosophical contemplation as an activity devoid of theurgic elements, whereas Smith wants to include a theurgic or ritual dimension at even the highest levels of ascent. However, Smith equivocates on this last point and admits (with specific regard to Proclus) that “one might suppose that the word theurgy was sometimes not applied to the very highest level of ascent.”⁹⁴ Elsewhere, Smith notes that Proclus apparently “cuts theurgy short” at the level of the νοητοὶ θεοί, thus separating theurgic praxis from the activity of the ἄνθος νοῦ. At the highest level of ascent, there is only “silence” and the experience of νόησις.⁹⁵ Marinus (Vita Procli 3) alludes to the same division when he posits a grade of “supra-human” virtues over that of the “theurgic” virtues. Smith remarks: “It is noteworthy that the highest virtues are passed over in silence, a perhaps not altogether fortuitous use of the word which recalls that region of silence at the summit of the noetic world."⁹⁶

A similar distinction is made by Festugière who demonstrates that for Proclus, theurgy was a means of purifying the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα in particular (and thus permitting union with the "traditional gods") whereas contemplation via the ἄνθος νοῦ permitted union with the "god of the philosophers," i.e., the One. Festugière's argument is further illumined by a similar distinction in the writings of Hierocles, a contemporary of Proclus.⁹⁷

As for Iamblichus, although he does not focus on union with the One in the De mysteriis, he nonetheless alludes to some sort of trans-theurgical moment in the ascent when he states in X.6 that the τέλος of the ἱερατικῆς (= theurgic) ἀναγωγῆς is establishing the soul in the *ὄλω τῷ δημιουργικῷ θεῷ*⁹⁸ and, therefore, at a level lower than that of the Supreme God. The same point is made in X.5. Elsewhere (as noted supra), Iamblichus (like Proclus) asserts the role of the ἄνθος νοῦ in apprehending the Highest God.

It is clear, then, that the later Neoplatonists were all trying to maintain some sort of distinction between theurgy and contemplation, with any attendant confusion arising more from their attempt to combine these two modes of ascent rather than rigidly separate them. (Porphyry would be the exception here.) If this is the case, then, did this attempt stem principally from a desire to wed Plotinus with the Juliani (as Lewy contends), or from a pattern implicit in the Oracles themselves? I would suggest the latter, and propose the following stages of ascent:

1. First of all, it is clear that the initial stages involved the purification of the lower soul/ὄχημα-πνεῦμα via a series of material rites. Psellus, for example (P.G., 122, 1132 a 8-12), tells us that τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ὄχημα is "strengthened" (δυναμώσομεν) or "purified" (καθαίρεσθαι) via "stones" (λίθοις), "herbs" (πόαις), and "incantations" (ἐπωδαῖς), thus making it "well-wheeled" (εὖτροχον) for the ascent. Marinus (Vita Procli 28; cf. fr. 206) tells us that Proclus was not only proficient in the use of the Chal-

Trouillard, "Le Merveilleux dans la Vie et la Pensée de Proclus," RPFE, 163, 1973, p. 452, who argues, contra Festugière, that "Proclus n'est pas double...il a bien intégré à sa démarche philosophique son goût du merveilleux." See, also, G. Shaw, "Theurgy: Rituals of Unification in the Neoplatonism of Iamblichus," Traditio, 41, 1985, pp. 1-98 who, influenced by Trouillard's analysis, now makes a similar case for Iamblichus.

dean “conjuncts,” “prayers,” and “magic wheels” (as well as experiencing autoptic visions of Hecate), but that he indulged in numerous lustrations (cf. fr. 133 and note). Elsewhere, Proclus himself mentions the use of “herbs” and “stones” in connection with “purifications” (καθάρσεις) by “sea water” and “sulphur” (De Magia; p. 151, 5-9 Bidez. Marinus, ibid., similarly mentions, in general, that Proclus τοῖς Χαλδαῖκοις καθαρμοῖς καθαιρόμενος.) All of these rites, then, would correspond to certain of the theurgical procedures discussed above. However, to what extent all or just some of these rites were considered a necessary prelude to the main elevation cannot be recovered from our sources, other than to note some sort of orderly progression (most likely over a period of time). In this regard, cf. Iamblichus, De myst., V.20, who mentions “those in the beginning of theurgy,” “those in the middle,” and those “few” who attain the “summit of the hieratic art,” but only after “great pain” and “late in life.”

2. Now, part of this process involved what Lewy called “the central Chaldean sacrament;” i.e., the elevation of the soul on the rays of the sun. Again, the precise order of events here must be tentatively reconstructed from various sources, including the extant fragments. For the most part, I have followed Lewy’s lead, but with certain modifications.

a. According to Lewy, a ritual “burying” of the body (as reported by Proclus; see Th. pl., IV.9; p. 30, 17 ff., S.-W.) preceded the actual elevation on the sun’s rays (which Proclus, ibid., alludes to as “the most secret of initiations:” ἐν τῇ μυστικωτάτῃ τῶν τελετῶν).⁹⁹ The apparent purpose of this rite was to mimic death, so that the soul (as in its actual post-mortem state) could be properly separated from the body. To this end, the head of the initiate was left uncovered, as this was where the soul was believed to reside. But Lewy’s further interpretation of this rite as a “mystic, voluntary suicide”¹⁰⁰ is surely wrong. Not only is the notion of death by violence (symbolic or otherwise) not attested as a Chaldean doctrine, but the one fragment which might support such a position is clearly misread by Lewy (see fr. 159 and notes). A better interpretation of this Proclan passage, then, is that of Saffrey and Westerink (see notes ad loc.), who suggest that this symbolic burial would correspond to the sixth “kind” of death enumerated by Damascius (In Phaed., II § 149,7-8), viz.

⁹⁹ See Lewy, pp. 204-207.

the “supernatural death” or “more divine way” of the theurgists, in which the elements of the body (symbolically) “dissolve” (thus assuring that the body, in its post-mortem state, will be free of demonic vengeance).

b. Once the body was symbolically “dead,” then the soul could be properly separated from it; but the precise nature of this separation must be conjectured. Certain clues, however, are given by Syrianus (as reported by Proclus; see In rem p., I, 152, 7-153, 20) who likens the Chaldean initiation to the funeral rites performed by Achilles at the burial of Patroclus. In this analogy (as interpreted by Lewy), the officiant at the rite (modelled on Achilles) would perform the actual separation by “calling forth” the soul of the initiate; the initiate, in turn, would be “laid out” (or symbolically “buried”) in the manner of Patroclus.¹⁰¹

Another possibility (perhaps performed in conjunction with the above) is that the initiate himself would aid in releasing the soul by engaging in certain breathing exercises. Fr. 124, for example, states that the soul is “thrust forth” (ἐξωσθηρες) by “inhaling” (ἀνάπνοοι). Similarly, in fr. 130, the soul (at a higher level of ascent) “draws in” (ἐλχουσαι) the “flowering flames” (πυρσους ἀχμαίους) which descend “from the Father” (ἐκ πατρόςθεν). Westerink, (see notes to fr. 130) thinks specifically here in terms of “feeding on” or “breathing in” sunlight. A similar process of “drawing in” or “inhaling” the sun’s rays or “breath” is found in the Mithras Liturgy (p. 7, Meyer): “Draw in (ἐλκε) breath (πνεῦμα) from the rays, drawing in (ἀνασπῶν) three times as much as you can, and you will see yourself being lifted up and ascending to the height, so that you seem to be in mid-air.” As Meyer notes (p. ix), this passage probably reflects some type of actual breathing technique, an observation apropos for the Chaldean material as well. Certainly, breathing techniques of one kind or another are a common feature of a wide variety of ascent traditions.¹⁰²

c. Following this initial release, then, the separated soul would be led upward on the rays of the sun (or “Material Connectors;” see fr. 80), making its way back up through the various spheres and elements which marked its descent (see fr. 110 and notes). This principal elevation would again be guided by the theurgist, with the aid of ministering angels (see fr. 122, 123 and notes) and the three Teletarchs (see fr. 85 and notes). In addition, the soul’s ascent would be aided by the singing of hymns (see fr. 131 and notes), the uttering of prayers (cf. fr. 140 and notes), and the chanting of voces mysticae. In Chaldean terminology, these last would be the συνθήματα and σύμβολα, identified with the Iynges (cf. fr. 87 and notes) and thus described in fr. 108 as “sown throughout the cosmos by the Father.” As such, these “tokens” and “symbols” have both material and immaterial manifestations. In the former instance, they are equated with the stones, herbs, scents, etc. handled by the theurgist during some of the preliminary rites (as discussed above). In the latter instance, they are imbedded in the soul as voces mysticae, serving not only as a means of prodding the soul upward, but also having the power to ward off demonic attack (see fr. 2 and notes). With this protection, then, the soul enters or “hastens” (see fr. 115) towards the streams of light, is drawn upward, “mingles” with the solar “channels” or “rays” (see fr. 66) and is ultimately established in the sun itself (see fr. 111)—“the seven-rayed god” (ὁ ἐπτάχτις θεός; see fr. 194). As such, this ascent to the sun (in Lewy’s interpretation) would be the culminating event of the entire anagōgē—the rays of the sun, in effect, accomplishing the final purification of the soul and thus rendering it “immortal” (ἀπαθανατισμός; see Proclus, In rem p., I, 152, 10).¹⁰³

But this purification (in Lewy’s analysis) would not be limited simply to the purifying effects of the visible or mundane sun, but would involve, as well, the intelligible purification of the rational soul via the “noetic” or intelligible rays of Aion—the transmundane sun—whose “light,” in turn, would derive from the intelligible fire of the Father; these “noetic rays,” then, descending from the Father via Aion to the visible sun, where the elevated soul “rests” (and is consequently “purified;” see fr. 130 and notes). As a noetic experience, then (argues Lewy), this purification—although expressed in “noetic” or contemplative language (as in fr. 1)—would, in fact, remain strictly a ritual event, conducted by the theurgist, and accompanied “by magical operations, invocations, recitals, and above all by numerous luminous visions.”¹⁰⁴ Thus, for Lewy, this elevation, in fine, would take the form of a sublime epopteia, similar to that described in the Mithras Liturgy, where the adept ascends on the rays of the sun to the Great God Aion-Helios-Mithra, and is subsequently “immortalized.”

What Lewy fails to appreciate, however, is that Chaldean utilization of “intellectual” or “philosophical” language to describe the highest moments of ascent may not simply reflect an equation of “magical” and “intellectual” processes (with the rites alone effecting purification),¹⁰⁵ but point instead to a genuine contemplative experience free of external manipulation. (This contemplative element is importantly missing from the ascent described in the Mithras Liturgy.) If so, the ascent to the sun would not effect the final purification of the soul (i.e., that of the higher or rational soul) but, rather, would serve only to fully purify the ὁχλημα-πνεῦμα—the salvation of which is promised by the Oracles (see esp. frr. 128, 129, 158 and notes; cf. fr. 196).

Following this line of interpretation, then, the Chaldean anagōgē, as a whole, would parallel that of Porphyry (as Hadot suggests); i.e., theurgical purification for the lower soul/ὁχλημα-πνεῦμα, intellectual or contemplative purification for the higher soul. This is the same model Festugière finds appropriate for Proclus. However, in Proclus' case (as noted above), a clear separation between theurgy and contemplation is not always easy to determine. This caveat would also apply to Iamblichus, as both see theurgy, in some form, as extending to the higher soul. What needs to be determined now is just what theurgy means at this higher level, and is a "higher" theurgy operative in the Oracles as well?

A distinction between types of theurgy, of course, has already been noted by various scholars. We have already mentioned Smith's "lower" and "higher" theurgy, the former restricted to material rites connected with the "lower gods," the latter concerned with worship of the "transcendent gods." Eitrem also distinguishes types of theurgy and, in terms of the Oracles, notes a "contemplative theurgy" (or "theoretical theurgy"), as well as a "practical theurgy," the former corresponding to the theosophical speculations of the Chaldeans, the latter to the actual techniques of ascent. For Eitrem, then, there is no contemplative aspect to the ascent per se, but only those ritual practices which he analogizes to the systaseis and epopteiai of the magical papyri.¹⁰⁶

Rosan, in his study of Proclus, also speaks in terms of a "lower" and "higher" theurgy, understanding the former as "theurgy proper" (and thus relegated to the use of material objects), the latter equated with Proclan pistis.¹⁰⁷ In this latter sense, Proclus, at times (e.g., Th. pl., I.25; p. 112, 1-3, S.-W.; Comm. In Parm., p. 502, 10-12, ed. C. Steel = p. 42, 15-16, Kl.-Lab.), regards pistis as the primary means of union with the One, arguing that it is "faith" (as a "theurgic power") which properly engenders that "silence" within the soul which is the appropriate mode of response to the "silence" of the noetic "deep" where the One (or Father) resides (cf. Th. pl., IV.9; p. 31, 12-16, S.-W.; see frr. 16, 132 and notes). Elsewhere, however (e.g., Exc. chald., IV; In Alc. I, p. 114 [248,3 Cr.] W.; Th. pl., I.3; p. 15, 3-4, S.-W.), Proclus uses the ἄνθος νοῦ terminology to express the soul's union with the One, this union understood in the manner described above, viz. as a supra-rational state of unified intuition.

¹⁰⁶ "Théurgie," pp. 51-52. The same distinction is made by Cremer, pp. 20-21.

¹⁰⁷ L. J. Rosan, The Philosophy of Proclus (New York, 1949), pp. 213-215 and n. 152; Cf. Rist, Plotinus, pp. 231-246.

Now, although Smith sees Proclus as sometimes distinguishing theurgy from the activity of the ἄνθος νοῦ (see supra), he also suggests that Proclus may well have regarded the ἄνθος νοῦ as that "token" or σύνθημα of the One within the soul (and, thus, would have regarded it, in some sense, as a "theurgic" device).¹⁰⁸ As evidence, Smith (apparently following Bremond)¹⁰⁹ cites In rem p., I, 177, 17-24, where Proclus speaks of the "unifying substance" (ἐνιαίας υποστάσεως) of the soul as τὸ ἄρρητον σύνθημα which (based on the principle "like by like") unites the transcendent One (or τῷ ὑπὲρ οὐσίαν πάσαν καὶ ζωὴν) with its proper "essence" (οὐσίας) and "life" (ζωῆς) within the soul. Elsewhere (e.g., In Alc. I, p. 114 [247,7-248,4 Cr.] W.), Proclus specifically describes the ascent to the One in terms of ascending to αὐτὴν τὴν ἄκραν ὑπαρξιν τῆς ψυχῆς which, for Proclus, is the ἄνθος τῆς οὐσίας ἡμῶν or τὸ ἄνθος τοῦ νοῦ.¹¹⁰ At this point, the soul is unified by "becoming one" (ἐν γενόμενοι) and "acting as one" (ἐνοειδῶς ἐνεργήσαντες).

In light of these passages, then, there can be no doubt that Proclus did indeed equate the ἄνθος νοῦ with the term σύνθημα and understood it specifically as the "unifying power" of the soul. Psellus corroborates this. In his commentary to our fr. 1 (= P.G., 122, 1144 b 11-12), he exactly states: ἄνθος δὲ τοῦ νοῦ ἡ ἐνιαία τῆς ψυχῆς δύναμις. In addition, in his commentary to our fr. 110 (= P.G., 122, 1129 d 4-7), Psellus understands the ἱερὸς λόγος of the soul as both ἡ νοερωτέρα ζῶή as well as ἡ ὑψηλοτέρα δύναμις τῆς ψυχῆς, ἡ ἄνθος νοῦ ἐν ἐτέροις ὀνομάζει τὸ λόγιον. Elsewhere, Psellus (quoting Proclus) states that the soul is formed ἀπὸ

Bremond, "Un Texte de Proclus sur la Prière et l'Union Divine," RSR, 19, 1929, pp. 460-462 who, like Smith, similarly equates the σύνθημα of unity within the soul with the ἄνθος νοῦ. Although Smith does not specifically cite Bremond here, he does cite this article in his bibliography. Cf., also, Sheppard, "Proclus' Attitude to Theurgy," p. 221: "...Proclus thinks of the 'one in the soul' as a σύμβολον of the First Hypostasis and that it is because of this σύμβολον-relationship that mystical union is possible...mystical union could be described as a lofty kind of theurgy because turning the 'one in the soul' towards the supreme One was thought of as activating a σύμβολον in the direction of what it symbolized."

τῶν ἱερῶν λόγων καὶ τῶν θείων συμβόλων (see P.G., 122, 1148 b 7-8 = Proclus, Exc. chald., V; p. 195, 18-19 Pitra; see notes to fr. 109).¹¹¹ In sum, then, for Proclus, the highest “unifying power” of the soul would be precisely that theurgic “sacred word,” or “divine token/symbol” understood as the “flower of mind” or ἄνθος νοῦ (= “one” in the soul; e.g. In Parm., 1071, 25-31).

In this analysis, then, the highest levels of ascent, for Proclus, would utilize both a contemplative as well as theurgic technique; i.e., a process of intelligible perception (as outlined, e.g., in In Alc., I, pp. 113-115 [246,3-249,14 Cr.], W.) combined with the unifying or “theurgic” power of the ἄνθος νοῦ as a σύνθημα. A similar process is described in Th. pl., IV.11; p. 35, 11-38, 27, S.-W., where the via negativa approach to the One, as well as aspects of the intelligible world in general, are combined with the graded use of various συνθήματα. In addition, Proclus also admits the efficacy of hymns offered to various classes of transcendent beings (e.g., Th. pl., II.11; p. 65, 5-15, S.-W.; IV.16; p. 50, 11-28, S.-W.; cf., also, the “hymn” to the νοεροὶ θεοί, fr. 18 and notes) and in one instance (Exc. chald., I; p. 192, 23-25 Pitra) equates the “intellectual” (νοεροί) and “invisible” (ἀφανεῖς) hymns “of the ascending soul” (τῆς ἀναγομένης ψυχῆς) with “the ineffable tokens of the Father” (τὰ συνθήματα τοῦ πατρὸς τὰ ἄρρητα). In Exc. chald., II; p. 193, 12 Pitra, the hymn offered to the Father is, in effect, the soul’s “assimilation” (ἐξομοίωσιν) to him.¹¹² And here, Proclus specifically rejects both the ordinary forms of hymnal praise (λόγοι σύνθετοι or κενῇ ῥημάτων καταιγίδι) as well as external rites (ἔργων κατασκευή or ἔργων φαντασίᾳ μετὰ τέχνης κεκαλλωπισμένων) as effective at the higher levels of ascent. This is also true with regard to Proclus’ theory of prayer, since Proclus understands “perfect” (τελεία) or “true” (ἀληθινή) prayer not in terms of ordinary vocal speech, but as an interior five-fold process of ascent which culminates in union (ἔνωσις) with the gods. As such, the function of “perfect” prayer is precisely that of evoking or awakening within the soul those very “tokens” (or συνθήματα) of the gods which, in turn, effect this union (see In Tim., I, 210, 27-212, 1. Cf., also, Iamblichus, De myst., V.26, who similarly underscores the “elevating” (ἀναγωγόν) force of prayer. It may be that Iamblichus’ theory of prayer (on which Proclus is dependent) may ultimately go back to Chaldean doctrine; see fr. 121 and notes).

In any event, based again on the principle “like by like” (see Exc. chald., IV; p. 194, 10 Pitra), Proclus insists that the One (and the intelligible world as a whole) must be apprehended by the “like” part of the soul—the One itself apprehended here (ibid., p. 195, 4 ff. Pitra) not by the “flower of mind” but by an even more refined essence, the “flower of the whole soul” (ἄνθος πασῆς τῆς ψυχῆς; see notes to fr. 1). Thus, for Proclus, the higher levels of ascent would involve not only a process of intelligible or noetic contemplation (in the Plotinian sense), but a type of “higher” theurgy as well, this latter involving the use of “perfect” prayer, synthēmata, noetic hymning, sacred silences, theurgic “faith,” the ἄνθος νοῦ—all of which had the power to elevate the soul and effect union with various aspects of the intelligible world, including the One itself.

Such a model seems appropriate for the Oracles as well, principally because it would permit us to give full weight to the contemplative language of frs. 1 and 9a (cf., also, frs. 17-19 and notes) without negating those aspects of the anagōgē which would remain properly theurgic. As such, we can suppose that the ἄνθος νοῦ of the fragments would similarly function as a σύνθημα or theurgic device or “power” and not solely as an organ of contemplative perception. Although the terms ἄνθος νοῦ and σύνθημα are not explicitly equated in the fragments, it may well be that the “pure Paternal token” (πατρικοῦ συνθήματος ἄγνου) of fr. 109, as well as the τριάδος σύνθημα of fr. 2 should be understood in this sense. This would also be true of the Chaldean term ἀλκή (“strength”)—an equivalent expression in the Oracles for the “spark of soul” or “flower/flame of mind” (cf. frs. 2, 32, 49, 82, 117-119). In fr. 2, it is specifically the “triple-barbed strength” in the soul which is equated with the τριάδος σύνθημα as that theurgic force or power which functions as a “focusing” device to prod the soul upward. In fr. 117, certain adepts (probably the theurgists) are said to be “saved” through their own “strength;” in fr. 119, the soul’s “strength” is said to “bind (us) to god” (θεοσυνδέτου ἀλκῆς) for the purpose of “exciting us towards the flight up there;” in fr. 109, the soul emerges from “forgetfulness” when it “remembers” the “pure, Paternal token” or, in Psellus’ interpretation (see supra), that “sacred word” or “symbol” in the soul understood as the ἄνθος νοῦ. This evidence suggests, then, that in the Oracles, the soul’s “flower/flame,” “spark,” or “strength,” did indeed function as a “token” or σύνθημα which specifically had the power to theurgically “focus” and elevate the soul and, ultimately, to “bind” or unite it with its noetic counterpart, viz. the fiery, triadic essence of the Highest God or τι νοητόν. If so, then the teaching of the Oracles regarding the highest levels of ascent would prefigure, in many ways, the ideas especially elaborated by Proclus.

Now, a comparable process of ascent can also be found in various Gnostic and Hermetic texts, where patterns of noetic hymning and prayer, sacred silences, voces mysticae, etc., are combined with various forms of contemplative illumination as a means of prodding the soul upward. Of particular interest are several of the so-called “Sethian” tracts found in the Nag Hammadi Library (e.g., Allogenes, Marsanes, 3 Steles Seth, Zostrianos), some (or even all) of which may have been known to the school of Plotinus.¹¹³ As noted earlier, a similar Platonic philosophical vocabulary (familiar to the Oracles as well) is used in all of these texts to describe aspects of the intelligible world with an emphasis, in particular, on a “triple-powered” One or Monad situated at the heights of the noetic order. The ascent to this Deity, like the ascent to the Chaldean πατήρ, similarly involves not only some form of philosophical or contemplative purification (the negative theology of Allogenes, NHC XI, 61,32 ff. is particularly striking), but the use of voces mysticae, hymnic prayers, sacred silences, “sealing,” etc.¹¹⁴

The thirteen “seals” (σφραγίδες) of Marsanes, NHC X, 2,12 ff. are especially interesting. Here, the first three “seals” are specifically connected with the material world (and, perhaps, with the use of the “waxen images” and “emerald stones” mentioned later in the text; see 35*,1-6), the other seals apparently progressively concerned with various aspects of “incorporeal” existence (e.g., “conversion,” “the self-begotten ones,” “incorporeal being,” “wisdom,” etc), the thirteenth or highest seal related in some way to the Supreme God or “Silent One.” Although the precise nature of these “seals” is not disclosed in the text, Pearson (notes ad loc.) suggests that they would correspond either to the voces mysticae or divine names associated with various angelic powers or to a ritual of “baptism”.¹¹⁵ In either case, it is the “sealing” itself which apparently effects the soul's ascent and, consequently, permits the adept to attain "knowledge" or "perception" of the various levels of the intelligible order.

¹¹⁵ Whether this baptism should be understood as an actual rite performed with water or as a type of inner, spiritual “sealing” is problematic. Pearson, Nag Hammadi Codices IX and X (Leiden, 1981), pp. 248-249, suggests the former, as does Schenke (“Phenomenon,” pp. 602-607); Schenke, however, would not absolutely rule out some

Now, in the Oracles, the συνθήματα and σύμβολα function in a similar way. Not only do these "tokens" and "symbols" have a material association (identified with the stones, herbs, scents, etc. handled in some of the preliminary rites), but they have an immaterial manifestation as well (esp. in the form of voces mysticae). Indeed, Synesius uses the terms σύνθημα and σφραγίς interchangeably in an anagogic context; see notes to fr. 2.) Thus, to borrow Proclus' language, "participation" (μέθεξις) in the συνθήματα/σύμβολα—at whatever level—is the principal means by which the soul reverts back to the gods and, ultimately, to the Highest God himself. (With regard to Proclus, Smith speaks in terms of ascending from "corporally immanent henads or συνθήματα to those immanent on higher spiritual levels.")¹¹⁶ This seems to be the case with the Marsanes text as well. If so, then this text would provide a further link between aspects of Sethian Gnosticism and the tradition(s) on which the Oracles drew (with Syria, perhaps, as a common geographical locus).¹¹⁷

This brings us to the matter of the text. Although I have based my ordering of the fragments on that of Des Places (Oracles Chaldaïques, Paris, 1971), unlike Des Places, I have also included the introductory formulae which, for the most part, are found in Kroll's edition (De Oraculis Chaldaicis, Breslau, 1894; rpt. Hildesheim, 1962).¹¹⁸ The exception here are those fragments from Psellus (P.G., 122, 1124 a - 1149 b) which do not include introductory material but only a given verse or verses with an appended commentary. Where applicable, Psellus' paraphrase of a given verse is included in our text. In addition, the present text also includes the Latin fragments from Moerbeke's translation of Proclus' Com-

form of "spiritualized" baptism (see p. 606). In contrast, L. Koenen, "From Baptism to the Gnosis of Manichaeism," Rediscovery, II, pp. 734-756, argues that among the Manichaeans (as well as other Gnostics, including "Sethians"), water baptism was regularly replaced by "gnosis;" thus, the recurring expression "living water" found in various Gnostic texts, should be understood only in this sublimated, spiritual sense.

¹¹⁶ See Smith, p. 120.

¹¹⁸ Prior to Kroll, G. Plethon (c. 1360-1452 C.E.) had evidently put together a collection of the Oracles but under the name of Zoroaster; see J. Bidez and F. Cumont, Les Mages Hellénisés, II (Paris, 1938; rpt. 1973), pp. 251-263. J. P. Migne placed this collection with Psellus' commentaries on the Oracles (P.G., 122, 1115 a - 1122 b). Apart from Lewy's study, the only other English translations of the Oracles are those of G. R. S. Mead, Echoes from the Gnosis, VIII (London and Benares, 1908) and Sapere Aude, The Chaldean Oracles of Zoroaster, (Bothell, WA, 1984), but these are extremely unreliable "loose" translations and attempts at interpretation.

mentary on the Parmenides, VII (ed. C. Steel, 1985; cf. Klíbanksky-Labowsky, 1953) recently isolated by H.-D. Saffrey (fr. 9 and 9a), as well as three additions to the section on "Various Chaldean Expressions" now suggested by Des Places (fr. 210a-c). Fragments noted with an asterisk indicate that Tardieu (Lewy², pp. 679-680) finds these fragments suspect (in addition to the "Doubtful Fragments" numbered 211-226). Since the present text is not meant to be a new critical edition, I have not excised these suspect fragments (as Tardieu suggests), but have included all of Tardieu's reservations in my commentary.¹¹⁹ Following Dodds and Des Places, I have also excluded those fragments from the Tübingen Theosophia (ed. K. Buresch, 1889) which Lewy had erroneously thought were Chaldean in origin.¹²⁰

The oracular fragments in the Greek text have been arranged in stichoi (following Des Places) with three dots at the beginning or end of a line of verse indicating a truncated hexameter.

¹¹⁹ It should be noted that Tardieu's edition includes some 220 pages of "Complements," including errata, addenda, indices locorum, verborum, rerum, an extremely useful concordance of the fragments, as well as the articles cited above by Dodds (n. 8) and Hadot (n. 6). See the review of G. Stroumsa, Numen, 27, 1981, pp. 167-172.

¹²⁰ See Dodds, "New Light," p. 265 = Lewy², p. 695, who rightly challenges several of Lewy's assumptions. The main objection to including the oracles from the Theosophia is that no ancient authority cites them (in part or whole) as belonging to the collection of the Chaldean Oracles. See, also, the introductory remarks to the Doubtful Fragments (infra, p. 217).

Moreover, (Iamblichus and his successors in their Commentaries on the Chaldean Oracles) invoke the gods as witnesses in those verses where they address the theurgist:

“For there exists a certain Intelligible which you must perceive by the flower of mind. For if you should incline your mind toward it and perceive it as perceiving a specific thing, you would not perceive it. For it is the power of strength, visible all around, flashing with intellectual divisions. Therefore, you must not perceive that Intelligible violently but with the flame of mind completely extended which measures all things, except that Intelligible. You must not perceive it intently, but keeping the pure eye of your soul turned away, you should extend an empty mind toward the Intelligible in order to comprehend it, since it exists outside of (your) mind.”

“Arrayed from head to toe with a clamorous light, armed in mind and soul with a triple-barbed strength, you must cast into your imagination the entire token of the triad, and not go toward the empyrean channels in a scattered way, but with concentration.”

And the oracle-giving god says such things about (intelligible knowledge).

4

For everywhere Power has been assigned the middle place; and among the intelligibles, it connects the Father and Intellect:

5

(p. 13 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., II, 57, 30-58, 3)

“...οὐ γὰρ ἐς ὕλην

p. 58, 25-30; cf. H.D. Saffrey, REA, XXVII, 1981, p. 222)

Merito igitur neque nomen ipsi possibile adducere, tamquam adaptari potens; hoc itaque, quod ultra omnia et soli “le unum” potens efferibile fieri desideran-tibus eloqui quod ineloquibile, non Plato solummodo, sed et dii appellaverunt
sic. Ipsi enim sunt responsa dantes sic:

5 “omnia enim ex uno entia e converso ad unum videntia secta sunt, sicut intellectualiter, in corpora multa.”

5

"For the First Transcendent Fire does not enclose its own Power in matter by means of works, but by Intellect. For Intellect derived from Intellect is the Craftsman of the fiery cosmos," says the oracle.

6

But (Atlas) holds up the sky and separates it from the earth, so that the things above are not confused with the things below:

"For as a girdling, intellectual membrane, he separates,"
according to the oracle,

"the first fire and the other fire which are eager to mingle."

7

"For the Father perfected all things and handed them over to the Second Intellect, which you—the entire human race—call the First Intellect."

8

And the most mystical tradition—the Oracles from the gods—says that

"...beside this one sits a Dyad."

And it says:

"For it has a double function: it both possesses the intelligibles in its mind and brings sense-perception to the worlds."

Rightly, then, it is impossible to attribute a name to (the One), as if a name were able to fit it. Thus, that which is beyond all things and can be indicated only by the term "the One" by those who desire to express the inexpressible, not only Plato alone but even the gods have spoken in this way. For the gods themselves give oracular responses as follows:

"For all things which issue from the One and, conversely, go back to the One, are divided, so to speak, intelligibly, into many bodies."

9a

(e Proclo, In Parm., VII, ed. C. Steel, V. 2, p. 512, 94-97 = Klibansky-Labowsky, p. 58, 30-33; cf. Saffrey, ibid.)

et nobis consulentes seponere quidem anime multitudinem, intelligentiam autem nostram sursumducere et circumducere in unum (dicentes):

“neque in tuo intellectu detinere multivarium aliud, sed anime noema in unum ampliare.”

(p. 15 Kr. = Psellus, P.G., 122, 1145 a 4)

“...εἰσὶν πάντα ἐνὸς πυρὸς ἐκγεγαῶτα.”

11

(p. 15 Kr. = Proclus, In Alc., p. 23 [51, 8-11 Cr.] W; cf. Proclus, In Eucl., 98, 17 F.)

τριτῶν τοίνυν ἐν τοῖς νοητοῖς καὶ κρυφίοις θεοῖς ὑποστάσεων οὐσῶν καὶ τῆς μὲν πρώτης τῷ ἀγαθῷ χαρακτηριζομένης·

“τάγαθὸν αὐτὸ νοοῦσα ὅπου πατρικὴ μονάς ἐστι,” τὸ λόγιόν φησι.

12

(p. 15. Kr. = Damascius, II, 29, 15-18; cf. Proclus, In Eucl., 99, 1-2 F.)

ὥς δὲ ἐν τούτῳ μένουσα (sc. ἡ ὁλότης) τῷ κινεῖσθαι τε καὶ ὀρμᾶν καὶ τετάσθαι πρὸς γέννησιν αἰὼν ἐστίν·

“...ταναή (γὰρ) μονάς ἐστίν ἢ δύο γεννᾷ”

(κατὰ τὸ λόγιον). Διὸ καὶ τὸ μένειν αἰεὶ τῇ ἀόκνῳ στροφάλιγγι πᾶσι χαρίζεται, κατὰ τὴν αὐτὴν χρησμωδίαν.

(p. 15 Kr. = Psellus, P.G., 122, 1145 d 7)

14

(p. 15 Kr. = Psellus, P.G., 122, 1141 d 6)

“πατὴρ οὐ φόβον ἐνθρώσκει, πειθῶ δ’ ἐπιχεύει.”

9a

And (the gods) advise us to put aside the multiplicity in the soul and elevate our perceptive faculty and drive it toward the One:

“And do not keep in your mind the multiform other,” they say, “but extend the perceptive faculty in the soul toward the One.”

10

11

Now among the intelligible and hidden gods three essential natures exist, and the first is characterized by the Good:

“Perceiving the Good itself, where the Paternal Monad exists,”

says the oracle.

12

Since (the wholeness) which continues in this movement, desire, and tension towards generation is Eternity:

“...for the Monad is extensible which generates duality,”

(according to the oracle). Therefore, all things are obliged to remain forever in ceaseless motion, according to this oracular tradition.

13

14

“The Father does not provoke fear, but imbues persuasion.”

15

(p. 15 Kr. = Proclus, In rem p., I, 27, 27-28, 2)

“πᾶς θεὸς ἀγαθός,” καὶ τῶν λογίων τῷ ἀξιώματι μαρτυρούντων, ἐν οἷς αἰτιώμενα τὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀσέβειάν φησιν·

“οὐδ’ ὅτι πᾶς ἀγαθὸς θεὸς εἰδότες· ἅ, ταλαεργοί, νήψατε...”

16

(p. 16 Kr. = Proclus, In Crat., 63, 25-26)

δηλαδὴ τὸν ὑπερουράνιον τόπον καὶ ὅσα

“...τῇ θεοθρέμμονι σιγῇ τῶν πατέρων...”

17

(p. 19, n. 1 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., I, 18, 25)

“...τῷ δὲ νοοῦντι τροφή τὸ νοητόν” κατὰ τὸ λόγιόν ἐστι.

18

(p. 18 Kr. = Proclus, In Crat., 57, 25-26; cf. Damascius, II, 16, 6 [ὑπὲρ κόσμον] + 65, 16 [ὑπέρκοσμον])

“οἱ τὸν ὑπέρκοσμον πατρικὸν βυθὸν ἴστε νοοῦντες,” λέγει πρὸς αὐτοὺς (sc. τοὺς νοερούς θεούς) ὁ ὕμνος.

19

(p. 19, n. 1 Kr. = Damascius, II, 16, 15-16)

εἴρηται γὰρ (παρ’ αὐτῶν τῶν θεῶν)

20

(p. 11 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., III, 102, 10-12; cf. Damascius, II, 16, 20-21; 57, 26-28)

“οὐ γὰρ ἄνευ νόος ἐστι νοητοῦ, καὶ τὸ νοητὸν οὐ νοῦ χωρὶς ὑπάρχει...”

κατὰ τὸ λόγιον.

15

"Every god is good." The Oracles testify to this axiom in those verses where they blame the impiety of men and say:

"And you do not know that every god is good. O, drudges, sober up..."

16

Clearly the transcendent place and all those things

"...in the god-nourishing silence of the Fathers."

17

"...for the one who has perception, the intelligible is nourishment," according to the oracle.

18

"You (gods) who know the supermundane, Paternal Abyss by perceiving it," says the hymn about them (sc. the intellectual gods).

19

For it is said (among the gods themselves) that "every mind perceives this god..."

20

"For Intellect does not exist without the intelligible, and the intelligible does not exist apart from Intellect..."

according to the oracle.

20 bis

(Damascius, II, 16, 18)

λέγεται γὰρ εἶναι (sc. ὁ πατήρ)

“...νοητόν, ἔξων τὸ νοοῦν ἐν ἑαυτῷ.”

21

(p. 19 Kr. = Damascius, I, 147, 27-148, 1; cf. 153, 20; 235, 4; 275, 28)

“...πάντ’ ἐστὶ γὰρ, ἀλλὰ νοητῶς,” φησὶ τὸ λόγιον.

22

(p. 18 + n. 1 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., III, 243, 16-21 + In Parm., 1091, 6 + 8 Co.²)

Οὕτω καὶ ἐν τοῖς λογίοις αἱ ἐνέργειαι τῶν θεῶν καὶ αὐτοῦ τοῦ πατρὸς ὑπ’ αὐτῶν δηλοῦνται διὰ τοῦ εἰπεῖν, ὥς ὅταν λέγῃ·

“εἰς τρία γὰρ νοῦς εἶπε πατρὸς τέμνεσθαι ἅπαντα, <πρωτίστου πατρὸς> αἰδίου νῶ πάντα κυβερνῶν· οὗ τὸ θέλειν κατένευσε καὶ ἥδη πάντ’ ἐτέμνητο.”

23

(Didymus, De Trinitate, II, 27; P.G., 39, 756 a)

(Εἰσὶν δὲ οἱ στίχοι χρησιμοῦ οὕτως)·

“ὄφρα τὰ πάντα τριάς συνέχῃ κατὰ πάντα μετροῦσα.”

24

(p. 43 Kr. = Damascius, I, 291, 11-13)

καὶ τίς ἡ μέση δυάς; ἡ συνοχικὴ φύσις καὶ ἡ τελεταρχικὴ, αὕτη μὲν διορίζουσα τὴν συνοχὴν

“εἰς ἀρχὴν καὶ τέρμα καὶ εἰς μέσα τάξει ἀνάγκης.”

25

(p. 46 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., III, 316, 9-10)

ὥσπερ δὴ φησι καὶ τὸ λόγιον·

“ταῦτα πατήρ ἐνόησε, βροτὸς δὲ οἱ ἐψύχωτο.”

20 bis

For it is said that the Father is “...intelligible, having within himself that which thinks.”

21

“...for he is all things, but intelligibly,”

says the oracle.

Thus, in the Oracles as well, the actions of the gods and of the Father himself are revealed by them through speech, as when it says:

“For the Intellect of the Father said for all things to separate into three, governing all things by the Intellect <of the very first> eternal <Father>. He nodded his assent to this and immediately all things were separated.”

(The verses of the oracle are as follows):

“In order that a triad might connect the All while measuring all things.”

24

And what is the dyadic middle? It is the connective and teletarchic nature which separates the cohesion

“into beginning, end, and middle in the order determined by Necessity.”

25

Indeed, even as the oracle says:

“The Father thought these things and a mortal was brought to life by him.”

26*

(Lydus, De mens., II, 6; 23, 10-12 W.)

πρὸς γὰρ τὸν ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα ὁ Πρόκλος οὕτω·

“μουνάδα γὰρ σε τριουῶχον ἰδὼν ἐσεβάσσατο κόσμος.”

27

(p. 18 Kr. = Damascius, I, 87, 1-4; cf. II, 87, 14)

εἴτε πατὴρ ἐστι καὶ δύναμις καὶ νοῦς, εἴη ἂν τὸ πρὸ τούτων, ὁ εἷς πατὴρ ὁ πρὸ τῆς τριάδος·

“παντὶ γὰρ ἐν κόσμῳ λάμπει τριάς, ἥς μονὰς ἄρχει,” φησὶ τὸ λόγιον.

28

(p. 18 Kr. = Lydus, De mens., II, 8; p. 28, 1-5 W.)

πάντα γὰρ τὰ νοητὰ ἐν τῇ τριάδι περιέχεται καὶ πᾶς ὁ θεὸς ἀριθμὸς ἐν τῇ τάξει ταύτῃ προελήλυθεν, ὥς καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Χαλδαῖος ἐν τοῖς λογίοις·

“τῆσδε γὰρ ἐκ τριάδος κόλποις ἔσπαρται ἅπαντα.”

29

(p. 18 Kr. = Lydus, De mens., II, 8; p. 28, 6-7 W.)

καὶ πάλιν·

“τῆσδε γὰρ ἐκ τριάδος πᾶν πνεῦμα πατὴρ ἐκέρασεν.”

30

(p. 19 Kr. = Damascius, II, 67, 1-3)

Διόπερ οὐδὲ πηγὴ μία τῶν πολλῶν αὕτη γε, ἀλλὰ

“πηγὴ τῶν πηγῶν”

καὶ πηγῶν ἀπασῶν, κατὰ τὸ λόγιον,

“μήτρα συνέχουσα τὰ πάντα.”

31

(p. 15 Kr. = Damascius, II, 63, 20-23)

ἡ τρίτη τάξις ἀπὸ τῆς πρώτης καὶ τῆς δευτέρας ὁμοῦ πρόεισιν·

“ἐξ ἀμφοῖν δὴ τῶνδε ῥέει τριάδος δέμα πρώτης οὔσης οὐ πρώτης, ἀλλ’ οὐ τὰ νοητὰ μετρεῖται.”

26*

For Proclus speaks in this way concerning the Once Transcendent:

“For the world, seeing you as a triadic Monad, has honored you.”

27

Whether there is Father, Power, and Intellect, there would be that which is before these, the Single Father, who is prior to the triad:

“For in every world shines a triad, ruled by a Monad,” says the oracle.

28

For all the intelligibles are enclosed in the triad, and every divine number comes forth in this order, as even the Chaldean himself says in the Oracles:

“For in the womb of this triad all things are sown.”

29

(continues fr. 28)

And again:

“For in this triad the Father has mixed every breath.”

30

Therefore, this is not one source of many things, but

“Source of Sources,” and of all sources, according to the oracle,

“the womb which contains the All.”

31

The third order proceeds at the same time from the first and second order:

“From both of these flows the bond of the first triad, which is not truly first, but where the intelligibles are measured.”

32

(p. 19 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., I, 420, 11-16)

Ἡ τρίτη τοίνυν τριάς ἡ νοητὴ τὸ αὐτοζῶον, περὶ ἧς καὶ τὰ λόγια φησιν, ὅτι “ἐργάτις (ὅτι) ἐκδότις ἐστὶ πυρὸς ζωηφόρου <αὕτη> , (ὅτι) καὶ τὸν ζωογόνον πληροῦς Ἑκάτης ἡ κόλπον (καὶ).....ἐπιρρεῖ τοῖς συνοχεῦσιν ἀλλήν ζειδῶροιο πυρὸς μέγα δυναμένοιο.”

33

(p. 19 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., I, 12, 16-19)

ἡ μὲν οὖν ἐν τῷ δημιουργῷ τέχνη μένει τε ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ αὐτός ἐστι, καθ’ ἣν καὶ “...ἐργοτεχνίτης,” ὑπὸ τῶν λογίων ἐπονομάζεται καὶ

“κόσμου τεχνίτης πυρίου...”

34

(p. 20 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., I, 451, 17-22)

οὕτω δὲ καὶ τὰ λόγια τὸν μέγιστον τοῦτον θεὸν “πηγὴν πηγῶν” προσαγορεύει καὶ μόνον ἀπογεννησά τα πάντα φησίν·

“ἔνθεν ἀποθρῶσκει γένεσις πολυποικίλου ὕλης· ἔνθεν συρόμενος πρηστήρ ἀμυδροῖ πυρὸς ἄνθος κόσμων ἐνθρόσκων κοιλώμασι· πάντα γὰρ ἔνθεν ἄρχεται εἰς τὸ κάτω τείνειν ἀκτῖνας ἀγητάς.”

5

35

(p. 20 Kr. = Damascius, II, 133, 1-6; cf. Proclus, In Crat., 58, 19-22)

ἡδὴ δὲ καὶ αὐτοῖς τοῖς θεοῖς πρῶτος “ὁ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα” τὴν ἐβδομάδα προβάλλεται· τοῖς δὲ ἄλλοις, ἀπὸ τούτου κατὰ μέθεξιν·

“τοῦδε γὰρ ἐκθρῶσκουσιν ἀμείλικτοί τε κεραυνοὶ καὶ πρηστηροδόχοι κόλποι παμφεγγέος αὐγῆς πατρογενοῦς Ἑκάτης καὶ ὑπεζωκὸς πυρὸς ἄνθος ἡδὲ κραταῖον πνεῦμα πόλων πυρίων ἐπέκεινα.”

32

Now the third intelligible triad is self-generated, about which even the Oracles say that

“it is a worker, (that) it is the dispenser of life-giving fire, (that) it fills up the life-giving womb of Hecate (and)...pours on the Connectors a force of fruitful and very powerful fire.”

33

Thus, the skill which exists in the Demiurge both remains within him and is himself, according to which he is called “...skilled worker”

by the Oracles, and “Craftsman of the fiery cosmos...”

Thus, the Oracles also call this very great god “Source of Sources,” and say that he alone generated the All:

“From there (i.e., “Source of Sources”), the birth of variegated matter leaps forth. From there, a lightning-bolt, sweeping along, obscures the flower of fire as it leaps into the hollows of the worlds. For from there, all things begin to extend wonderful rays down below.”

Indeed, the First Once Transcendent communicates the hebdomad to the gods themselves; but to others, it is communicated by him through participation:

“For Implacable Thunders leap from him and the lightning-receiving womb of the shining ray of Hecate, who is generated from the Father. From him leap the girdling flower of fire and the powerful breath (situated) beyond the fiery poles.”

36

(p. 21 Kr. = Proclus, In Crat., p. 58, 11-15)

39

(p. 25 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., II, 54, 5-16)

τοῦτον δὲ τὸν μέγιστον καὶ τελεώτατον δεσμὸν ὃν περιβάλλει τῷ κοσμῷ πανταχόθεν

“ἔργα νοήσας γὰρ πατρικὸς νόος αὐτογένεθλος πᾶσιν ἐνέσπειρεν δεσμὸν πυριβριθῇ ἔρωτος.”

Therefore, even in the Oracles it is said that the Very First Source encloses the Implacables but "rides upon" all others:

"The Intellect of the Father rides upon the unshakeable guides which shine inflexibly by the furrows of the Implacable Fire."

37

And (we must) recall the very (words) which are found in the Chaldean Oracles:

"The Intellect of the Father, while thinking with its vigorous will, shot forth the multiformed Ideas. All these leapt forth from one Source, for from the Father comes both will and perfection. But the Ideas were divided by the Intelligible Fire and allotted to other intelligibles. For the Ruler placed before the multiformed cosmos an intelligible and imperishable model from which, along a disorderly track, the world with its form hastened to appear, engraved with multiform Ideas. There is one Source for these, from which other terrible (Ideas), divided, shoot forth, breaking themselves on the bodies of the worlds. Those which are borne around the frightful wombs like a swarm of bees—flashing here and there in various directions—are the intelligible Thoughts from the Paternal Source, which pluck in abundance the flower of fire from the acme of sleepless Time. The first self-perfected Source of the Father spouted forth these primordial Ideas."

38

At any rate, the Oracles, explaining to us the Ideas which exist primarily in (the Paternal Intellect), have called them "Paternal Thoughts:"

"These are the Thoughts of the Father, after which my fire is rolled up."

39

But this greatest and most perfect bond which the Father everywhere throws around the world...the Oracles have called "bond of Love, heavy with fire:"

"For after he thought his works, the self-generated Paternal Intellect sowed the bond of Love, heavy with fire, into all things."

5 καὶ τὴν αἰτίαν προσέθηκεν·

“ὅφρα τὰ πάντα μένη χρόνον εἰς ἀπέραντον ἐρῶντα, μηδὲ πέση τὰ πατρὸς νοερῷ ὑφασμένα φέγγει.”

διὰ γὰρ τοῦτον τὸν ἔρωτα πάντα ἤρμονται ἀλλήλοις·

“ὥ σὺν ἔρωτι μένει κόσμου στοιχεῖα θέοντα.”

40

(p. 37 Kr. = Damascius, II, 200, 21-24)

ὀρμηθέντες...σαφῶς δὲ καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν λογίων· εἴρηται γὰρ

“ἀρχάς, αἱ πατρὸς ἔργα νοήσασαι τὰ νοητὰ αἰσθητοῖς ἔργοις καὶ σώμασιν ἀμφεκάλυψαν.”

41

(p. 65 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., II, 300, 10-14)

ἔτι δὲ τὸ “ἐφάπτεσθαι” πρεπόντως εἴρηται, διότι προσεχῶς ἡ ψυχὴ καὶ ἐφέστηκε τοῖς αἰσθητοῖς καὶ ἐξήρηται τῶν νοητῶν, τῆς ἐπαφῆς τὴν ἐναργῆ καὶ ἄμεσον καὶ κατ’ ἐπιβολὴν ὠρισμένην ἐστῶσαν γινῶσιν δηλούσης καὶ

“...ταῖσθητὰ νοούσης/ὡς ἐπαφητά,”

5 φησί τις θεῶν.

42

(p. 25 Kr. = Proclus, In Parm., 769, 7-12 Co.²)

Διακέχριται ἅμα καὶ συγέχριται (sc. τὰ εἶδη τὰ νοητὰ) (κατὰ τὸ λόγιον) “δεσμῷ ἔρωτος ἀγητοῦ, ὃς ἐκ νόου ἔκθορε πρῶτος, ἐσάμενος πυρὶ πῦρ συνδέσμιον, ὅφρα κεράσση πηγαίους κρατῆρας ἐοῦ πυρὸς ἄνθος ἐπισχών.”

43

(p. 26 Kr. = Proclus, Th. pl., I, 2; 11, 13-14 S.-W.)

“...ἔρωτι (μὲν) βαθεῖ...”

κατὰ τὸ λόγιον ἀναπλήσας τὴν ψυχὴν.

And the Oracles add the reason for this:

“In order that the All might continue to love for an infinite time and the things woven by the intellectual light of the Father might not collapse.”

Because of this Love, all things are suited to one another:

“With this Love, the elements of the world remain on course.”

40

Inspired...clearly by the Oracles; for it is said that

“the Principles, which perceived the intelligible works of the Father, concealed them with sense-perceptible works and bodies.”

Further, “to touch” is suitably stated, because of the proximate way the Soul presides over sense-perceptibles and is dependent on intelligibles, with the contact revealing a knowledge which is clear, immediate, and established according to a definite intuition, and “...perceiving sense-perceptibles as capable of being touched,”

says one of the gods.

(The intelligible Ideas) are separated and compounded at the same time (according to the oracle)

“by the bond of wondrous Love, which leapt first from Intellect, clothing his bonded fire with the fire (of Intellect) in order to mingle the Source Craters while offering the flower of his fire.”

43

Having filled the soul

“...with a deep Love...”

according to the oracle.

44

(p. 26 Kr. = Proclus, In Alc., 23 [52, 13-14; 53, 1-2 Cr.] W.)

“πάντα γὰρ ἐν τρισὶ τοῖσδε κυβερνᾶται τε καὶ ἔστι” (φησὶ τὸ λόγιον). καὶ διὰ τοῦτο καὶ τοῖς θεουργοῖς οἱ θεοὶ παρακελεύονται διὰ τῆς τριάδος ταύτης ἑαυτοὺς τῷ θεῷ συνάπτειν.

44

(The Chaldeans) hand down an oracle concerning the entire soul as a divine triad. For (the Chaldean) himself says:

“(The Father) mixed the spark of soul with two harmonious qualities, Intellect and divine Will, to which he added a third, pure Love, as the guide and holy bond of all things.”

45

The gods have termed (wanton love)

“...a stifling of true Love.”

46

(It is necessary)...to propose the virtues which, from creation, purify and lead back (to God),

“...Faith, Truth, and Love,” that praiseworthy triad.

47

Divine Hope, which descends from Intellect and is certain, concerning which the oracle says:

“May fire-bearing Hope nourish you...”

48

“For all things are governed and exist in these three (virtues),”

(says the oracle). For this reason, the gods counsel the theurgists to unite themselves with God by means of this triad.

49

(p. 27 + n. 1 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., III, 14, 3-10)

Διὸ καὶ ὑπὸ τῶν λογίων “πατρογενὲς φάος” εἴρηται (sc. ἡ τάξις τοῦ αἰῶνος), διότι δὴ τὸ ἐνοποιὸν φῶς πᾶσιν ἐπιλάμπει·

“...πολὺ γὰρ μόνος ἐκ πατρὸς ἀλκῆς δρεφάμενος νόου ἄνθος ἔχει τὸ νοεῖν πατρικὸν νοῦν <καὶ νόον> ἐνδιδόναι πάσαις πηγαῖς τε καὶ ἀρχαῖς καὶ δινεῖν αἰεὶ τε μένειν ἀόκνω στροφάλιγγι.”

50

(p. 27 Kr. = Damascius, II, 164, 18-19)

λέγεται ὑπὸ τῶν θεῶν

“μέσσον τῶν πατέρων Ἑκάτης κέντρον πεφορῆσθαι.”

51

(p. 28 Kr. = Proclus, In rem p., II, 201, 10-16)

τοῦτό μοι δοκεῖ καὶ τὰ λόγια λέγειν τὸ φῶς, ἡνίκα ἂν διδάσκοντα περὶ τῆς ψυχώσεως, ἦν ἡ πηγὴ τῶν ψυχῶν τὰ πάντα ψυχοῖ. λέγη·

“δεξιτερῆς μὲν γὰρ λαγόνος περὶ χήραμα χόνδρων πολλὴ ἄδην βλύζει ψυχῆς λιβάς ἀρχιγενέθλου ἄρδην ἐμψυχοῦσα φάος πῦρ αἰθέρα κόσμους.”

52

(p. 28 Kr. = Psellus, P.G., 122, 1136 a 11-12)

“λαιῆς ἐν λαγόσιν Ἑκάτης ἀρετῆς πέλε πηγὴ, ἐνδον ὅλη μίμνουσα τὸ παρθένον οὐ προῖεσα.”

53

(p. 28 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., II, 61, 22-25; cf. I, 408, 16-17)

οὕτω δὴ καὶ τὰ λόγια τὰς μεριστὰς τοῦ δημιουργοῦ νοήσεις “διανοίας” προσεῖρηκε·

“...μετὰ δὴ πατρικᾶς διανοίας ψυχὴ ἐγὼ ναίω θέρμη ψυχοῦσα τὰ πάντα.”

49

Therefore, (the order of Eternity) is said to be "Father-begotten light" by the Oracles since, indeed, unifying light shines upon all things:

"For (Aion) alone, copiously plucking the flower of mind from the strength of the Father, has the power to perceive the Paternal Intellect <and> to impart <Intellect> to all Sources and Principles, and to whirl them about and keep them forever in ceaseless motion."

50

It is said by the gods that

"the center of Hecate is borne in the midst of the Fathers."

It seems to me that the Oracles also speak about this light, when giving instructions concerning the principle of life by which the source of souls animates the All. It says:

"Around the hollow of her right flank a great stream of the primordially-generated Soul gushes forth in abundance, totally ensouling light, fire, ether, worlds."

52

"In the left flank of Hecate exists the source of virtue, which remains entirely within and does not give up its virginity."

53

Thus, even the Oracles call the divisible perceptions of the Demiurge "Thoughts:"

"...after the Paternal Thoughts I, the Soul, am situated, animating the All with my heat."

54

(p. 29 Kr. = Proclus, In Parm., 821, 5-7 Co.²; cf. In rem p., II, 150, 21; In Tim., I, 11, 21 + III, 271, 11)

θεολόγοι δὲ καὶ πηγὴν αὐτῆς (sc. τῆς φύσεως) ἐν τῇ ζωογόνῳ ὑπέστησαν θεῶ·

“νώτοις δ’ ἀμφὶ θεᾶς φύσις ἄπλετος ἡώρηται.”

55

(p. 29 Kr. = Proclus, In rem p., I, 137, 21-23)

“χαῖται μὲν γὰρ ἐς ὅζῳ πεφρικότι φωτὶ βλέπονται,” φησὶν τις θεῶν.

56

(p. 30 Kr. = Proclus, In Crat., p. 81, 2-8)

περὶ δὲ τῆς ζωογόνου πηγῆς Ῥέας, ἐξ ἧς πᾶσα ζωὴ θεία τε καὶ νοερὰ καὶ ψυχικὴ καὶ ἐγκόσμιος ἀπογεννᾶται, οὕτως φασὶν τὰ λόγια·

“Ρεῖη τοι νοερῶν μακάρων πηγὴ τε ῥοή τε· πάντων γὰρ πρώτη δυνάμει κόλποισιν ἀφράστοις δεξαμένη γενεὴν ἐπὶ πᾶν προχέει τροχάουσαν.”

5

57

(p. 31 Kr. = Simplicius, In Phys., 616, 33-35; cf. 615, 13; 623, 34)

πῶς οὖν τὰ λόγια φησιν·

“ἐπτά γὰρ ἐξώγκωσε πατὴρ στερεώματα κόσμων.”

58

(Proclus, In rem p., II, 220, 11-18)

ἀλλὰ τῶν παρὰ Χαλδαίοις θεουργῶν ἀκούσας, ὡς ἄρα ὁ θεὸς ἐμεσεμβόλησεν τὸν ἥλιον ἐν τοῖς ἐπτά καὶ ἀνεκρέμασεν ἀπ’ αὐτοῦ τὰς ἑξ ἄλλας ζώνας, καὶ τῶν θεῶν αὐτῶν ὅτι τὸ ἡλιακὸν πῦρ

“...κραδίης τόπῳ ἐστήριξεν...”

5 ἔπομαι μὲν τοῖς ἐκ τῶν θεῶν πεφασμένοις.

54

But even the theologians suppose that the source (of Nature) is in the generative goddess:

“On the back of the goddess boundless Nature is suspended.”

55

“For her hair appears dazzlingly in shimmering light,”
says one of the gods.

56

Concerning Rhea, the generative source, from whom all divine life— intellectual, spiritual, and mundane—is generated, the Oracles speak as follows:

“Truly Rhea is the source and stream of blessed intellectual (realities). For she, first in power, receives the birth of all these in her inexpressible womb and pours forth (this birth) on the All as it runs its course.”

57

How then do the Oracles say it:

“For the Father has inflated the seven firmaments of the worlds.”

58

But having heard from the Chaldean theurgists that God intercalated the sun among the seven (zones) and made the six other zones dependent upon it, and having heard from the gods themselves that the solar fire

“...was established at the site of the heart...”

I follow what has been revealed by the gods.

59

(p. 33 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., III, 83, 13-16)

καὶ οἱ γε μυστικώτατοι τῶν λόγων καὶ “τὴν ὁλότητα” αὐτοῦ τὴν ἐν τοῖς ὑπερκosμίοις παραδεδώκασιν· ἐκεῖ γὰρ

“(ὁ) ἡλιακὸς κόσμος (καὶ τὸ) ὅλον φῶς...”

ὥς αἴ τε Χαλδαίων φῆμαι λέγουσι καὶ ἐγὼ πείθομαι.

60

(p. 33 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., II, 9, 16-18)

καὶ τῶν θεολόγων ἀκούων

“πῦρ πυρὸς ἐξοχέτευμα...”

τὸν ἥλιον καλούντων

“καὶ ταμίαν πυρός...”

5 καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς τοιούτοις ὀνόμασι.

61

(pp. 33-34 + 47 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., III, 61, 8-25 + 234, 28-30 = vv. 14-15)

καὶ τῶν λογίων...πανταχοῦ μετὰ τὸν ἥλιον τὴν σελήνην ταττόντων καὶ μετὰ τὴν σελήνην τὸν ἀέρα...

“αἰθέριός τε δρόμος καὶ μήνης ἄπλετος ὁρμή,” φησίν,

5 “ἡέριοί τε ῥοαί...”

καὶ πάλιν·

“αἰθήρ, ἥλιε, πνεῦμα σελήνης, ἥερος ἀγοί.”

καὶ ἐν ἄλλοις·

10 “ἡλιακῶν τε κύκλων καὶ μηναιῶν καναχισμῶν κόλπων τ’ ἡερίων...”

καὶ ἐξῆς·

“...αἰθρης μέρος ἡελίου τε καὶ μήνης ὀχετῶν ἡδ’ ἥερος... αἰθρης {μέρος} ἡελίου τε σεληναίης τε καὶ ὅς<σ>α ἡέρι συνήχονται...”

15 καὶ ἀλλαχοῦ·

“...καὶ πλατὺς ἀήρ
 μηναιῶς τε δρόμος καὶ αἰέπολος ἡέλιος.”

59

And indeed the most mystical doctrines hand down that this "wholeness" exists in the supermundane (worlds); for there exists the

"solar world (and the) whole light..."

as the Chaldean Oracles say and which I believe.

60

And I hear the theologians call the sun

"fire, channel of fire...
and dispenser of fire..."

and all such names.

61

And the Oracles...everywhere place the moon after the sun and the air after the moon:

a). "The ethereal course and the boundless impulse of the moon," they say,

b). "and airy streams..."

And again:

c). "Ether, sun, breath of moon, airy leaders."

And in other (verses):

d). "Of solar circles and lunar soundings and airy hollows..."

And next:

e). "...portion of ether and sun and channels of moon and air..."

f). "[Portion] of ether, sun, and moon and all those things which swim with the air..."

And elsewhere:

g). "...and expansive air, the course of the moon and the eternal orbit of the sun."

62

(p. 34 Kr. = Damascius, In Phaedonem, 359 (239, 3-4 N.) W.)

ἀπλῶς δ' οὖν οἱ

“τῶν στοιχείων αἰθέρες...”

ὥς φησι τὰ λόγια, ἐκεῖ.

63

(p. 34 Kr. = Damascius, II, 128, 3-5)

καὶ οἱ θεοὶ ἐν τοῖς λογίοις

“χυρτῶ σχήματι συρομένην...”

παραδεδώκασι μίαν γραμμὴν, καὶ πολλή τοῦ γραμμιαίου σχήματος παρ' αὐτοῖς ἡ χρῆσις.

64

(p. 34 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., III, 124, 26-29)

καὶ γὰρ τὰ λόγια τῶν ἀστέρων τὸ προπόμεμα τῶν ἀπλανῶν οὐχ ἅπαξ, ἀλλὰ καὶ πολλάκις λέγοντα·

“μηναιὸν τε δρόμημα καὶ ἀστέριον προπόμεμα.”

65

(p. 35 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., II, 107, 6-11)

μέχρι γὰρ τοῦ κέντρου πρόεισιν ὁ τῆς ζωογονίας ὀχετός, ὥς καὶ τὰ λόγια φησι, διαλεγόμενα περὶ τοῦ μέσου τῶν πέντε κέντρων ἄνωθεν διήκοντος διαμπᾶξ ἐπὶ τὸ καταντικρὺ διὰ τοῦ κέντρου τῆς γῆς·

“καὶ πέμπτον μέσον ἄλλο πυρήοχον, ἔνθα κάτεισι μέχρι <καὶ> ὑλαίων ὀχετῶν ζωηφόριον πῦρ.”

66

(p. 55 Kr. = Proclus, In rem p., I, 178, 17-20)

“μιγνυμένων δ' ὀχετῶν πυρὸς ἀφθίτου ἔργα τελοῦσα”

(sc. ἡ ἀχροτάτη ζωή) κατὰ τὸ λόγιον, ἓνα δὲ σύνδεσμον θεῖον ἀπεργαζομένη τοῦ μετεχομένου καὶ μετέχοντος καὶ σύγκρασιν ἐνοποιόν.

62

Plainly, therefore, the “ethers of the elements...”

as the Oracles say, are there.

63

And the gods in the Oracles have taught us that a single line is “drawn in a curved shape...”

and they make a great use of linear shape.

64

For even the Oracles, not once but often, speak of the procession of the fixed stars:

“The lunar course and starry procession.”

65

For the generative channel proceeds up until the center, as even the Oracles say when speaking about the middle of the five centers, which extends from on high straight through to the opposite side via the center of the earth:

“And there is a fifth in the middle, another channel of fire, where the life-bearing fire descends as far as the material channels.”

66

“As the channels are mingled together (the highest life) perfects the works of imperishable fire,”

according to the oracle, and produces a single, divine bond and a unifying blend of participated and participant.

67

(p. 35 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., II, 50, 20-23)

καὶ μὴν καὶ τῶν Ἀσσυρίων θεολογία τὰ αὐτὰ παραδίδωσι θεόθεν ἐκφανθέντα· καὶ γὰρ ἐν ἐκείνῃ ὁ δημιουργὸς τὸν ὅλον κόσμον λέγεται ποιεῖν

“ἐκ πυρὸς, ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ γῆς καὶ παντρώφου αἵθρης.”

68

(p. 35 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., II, 50, 24-27)

καὶ ὁ ποιητὴς ὡς αὐτουργῶν (sc. λέγεται) τεκταίνεσθαι τὸν κόσμον·

“καὶ γὰρ <ὅ>τις πυρὸς ὄγκος ἦν ἕτερος, τὰ δὲ πάντα αὐτουργῶν ἵνα σῶμα τὸ κοσμικὸν ἐκτολυπευθῇ, κόσμος ἵν’ ἐκδηλος καὶ μὴ φαίνηθ’ ὑμενώδης.”

69

(p. 35 Kr. = Proclus, In Tim., I, 286, 8-13)

(ὁ οὐρανός) ἔστι δὲ ἀπλῶς καὶ σῶμα ἔχων...καὶ τούτῳ πάλιν ἐκεῖνο τὸ λόγιον εἴρηται συμφώνως·

“νοῦ μὲν γὰρ μίμημα πέλει, τὸ δὲ τευχθὲν ἔχει τι σώματος.”

70

(p. 36 Kr. = Damascius, II, 157, 15-20)

τὰ δὲ λόγια ἀπλῶς φύσιν λέγει τὴν διὰ παντῶν χωροῦσαν ἀπηωρῆσθαι τῆς μεγάλης Ἑκάτης...

“ἄρχει γὰρ φύσις ἀκαμάτη κόσμων τε καὶ ἔργων, οὐρανὸς ὄφρα θέῃ δρόμον αἰδῖον κατασύρων, καὶ ταχὺς ἥελιος περὶ κέντρον ὅπως ἐθάς ἔλθῃ.”

5

71

(p. 36 Kr. = Proclus, In Crat., 98, 14-15)

(Ἀπόλλων)...

“ἁρμονία φωτὸς γαυρούμενος...”

ὥς φησί τις τῶν θεουργῶν.

67

Moreover, the theology of the Assyrians teaches the same doctrines, which were revealed to them by the gods. For in that theology, the Demiurge is said to have made the entire world

“from fire, water, earth, and all-nourishing air.”

68

And the Maker, while working with his own hands, (is said) to fashion the world:

“For whatever other mass of fire there was, the All he worked with his own hands, so that the world-body might be fully completed and the world might be visible and not seem membrane-like.”

69

(The sky), quite clearly, is said to have a body...and with this (position), again this oracle is in agreement:

“For (the sky) is an imitation of Intellect, but the product has something of the corporeal in it.”

But the Oracles plainly state that Nature, advancing through all things, is suspended from the great Hecate...

“For untiring Nature rules both worlds and works, in order that the sky might turn round, pulling down its eternal course, and that the swift sun might come around the center, just as it is accustomed to do.”

71

(Apollo)...

“priding himself on the harmony of light...”

as one of the theurgists says.

72

(p. 36 Kr. = Proclus, Th. pl., 324, 3-8 Portus)

καί μοι δοκεῖ διὰ τούτων πάλιν ὁ Πλάτων τὰ αὐτὰ λέγειν ὕστερον τοῖς ὑπὸ τῶν θεῶν πεφασμένοις, καὶ ἦν ἐκεῖνοι “πάντευχον” προσειρήκασιν, ταύτην πανοπλίᾳ παντελεῖ κεκοσμημένην εὐφημεῖν·

“καὶ γὰρ δὴ πάντευχος ἐνόπλιος ἦκα θεεῖν.”

73

(pp. 37-38 Kr. = Damascius, II, 217, 5-10)

Εἰ δὲ ἐν οὐρανῷ λέγεται οὗτος ὁ Ζεὺς, ἔστι καὶ ἀρχικούς ὄντας εἰς οὐράνιον διηρῆσθαι καὶ χθόνιον, καὶ τὸν μέσον τοὺς τρεῖς πατέρας, ὡς μαρτυρεῖ καὶ τὰ λόγια·

“ἐν τούτοις ἱερὸς πρῶτος δρόμος, ἐν δ’ ἄρα μέσσω ἡέριος, τρίτος ἄλλος ὃς ἐν πυρὶ τὴν χθόνα θάλπει.
 ἀρχαῖς γὰρ τρισὶ ταῖσδε λάβροις δουλεῦει ἅπαντα.”

5

74

(p. 39 Kr. = Damascius, II, 206, 10-11)

ἀρχικοί εἰσιν ὡς πρῶτοι ἄρξαντες τοῦ ἀπορρεῖν τῶν οἰκείων πηγῶν. διὸ καὶ “...κρηνήϊος ἀρχή”

ὁ διάκοσμος ὑμνεῖται.

75

72

And, again, for these reasons, it seems to me that Plato said the very things which were later revealed by the gods. And that which the gods have termed "armed from head to toe," Plato has praised as "adorned in full armor:"

"For, I, the Divine, have arrived, armed from head to toe."

73

If this Zeus is said to be in heaven, it is possible to separate the ruling beings into heavenly and earthly, and in the midst of these are the three fathers, as even the Oracles testify:

"Among these is the first sacred course. Next, in the middle, is the course of air. Another, the third, is the one which heats the earth by fire. All things serve these three turbulent rulers."

74

They are Principles because they are the first to begin emanating their own sources. Therefore, the order is praised as

"...Principle Source."

75

At any rate, when (the oracle-giver) discusses the Principle multiplicity, he says

"...the Principle channel is inclined under them."

76

Likewise, the gods have taught us that there are numerous Iynges:

"Many of these leap forth and stand upon shining worlds. Among these are three summits: <that of fire, ether, and matter>."

77

"The (Iynges) which are thought by the Father also think themselves, since they are moved by his unspeakable counsels so as to think."

78

For the fathers who preside over magical operations cause all things to appear and then to disappear, since “...they are couriers...”

to the Father and to matter, to speak according to the oracle.

79

“Every world possesses unbending, Intellectual Supports.”

80

For that even...the gods...have taught us...there are many Connectors...these matters the Oracles make clear:

“But also, all those things which serve Material Connectors.”

81

And need we say more, when even the Oracles, in reference to the very gods who exist prior to that intelligible-and-intellectual order, expressly use these names:

“All things yield to the intellectual Lightning-bolts of the intellectual Fire, serving the persuasive will of the Father.”

82

Most of all, (the function of guarding) has been assigned to the Connectors, inasmuch as they encompass and connect all things within themselves. The gods also speak in this way:

“He has given the summits the protection of his (intellectual) Lightning-bolts, having mixed his own force of strength among the Connectors.”

83

Therefore, it is imparted by the gods that the Connectors are the “...unifiers...”

of the intellectual orders.

And the

 who stands on the Ethereal Worlds is a

The theurgists teach (these things) very clearly, and the Oracles from the gods themselves:

“But a holy name, in sleepless motion, leaps into the worlds

That (race of evil demons) draws down souls, (a race) which is also called “...bestial and shameless,” since it is turned towards Nature.

90

“...from the hollows of the earth leap chthonian dogs, who never show a true sign to a mortal.”

The oracle is about demons involved in matter. These (demons) are called dogs because they are the avengers of souls.

91

Starting from the spirits of the air, irrational demons begin to come into existence. Therefore, the oracle says:

“Driver (fem.) of dogs of the air, earth, and water.”

92

Therefore, even the oracle calls these gods

“...aquatic.”

93

Thus, also, concerning the

of demons.

The Oracles teach that (the Demiurge)...brings forth our souls and sends them into generation, a subject about which both the Oracles and Timaeus speak. For (the Demiurge) has placed

This character (sc. the letter Chi), which belongs to the essence of souls, as the property of every soul...these...are (the doctrines) of the theurgists and gods when they are describing unknown things.

96

“Because the Soul, existing as a radiant fire by the power of the Father, remains immortal. It is the Mistress of Life and possesses full measures of the many wombs <of the world>.”

97

“<Taking wing>, the soul of mortals will press God into itself. And possessing nothing mortal, the soul is completely intoxicated <by God>. Therefore, boast of the harmony under which the mortal body exists.”

98

For as someone more eminent than I said:

“The ethers have strengthened the body of a sacred man.”

99

(Those souls) <which> even the gods say are turned about

“...to serve (generation), but having served with an untamed neck...”

leave generation behind to go back up there.

We hear the Oracles say that matter is

For the source of Nature and the very first Destiny is named by the gods themselves:

The wisest of the Greeks designate Destiny as Nature.

The starry procession has not been brought forth for you sake. The wide-winged flight of birds is never true, nor the cuttings and entrails of sacrificial victims. All these are playthings, the props of commercial fraud. Flee these things, if you would open the sacred paradise of piety, where virtue, wisdom, and good order are brought together."

108

And another oracle is this:

"For the Paternal Intellect has sown symbols throughout the cosmos, (the Intellect) which thinks the intelligibles. And (these intelligibles) are called inexpressible beauties."

109

"But the Paternal Intellect does not receive the will of (the soul) until (the soul) emerges from forgetfulness and speaks a word, remembering the pure, paternal token."

110

"Seek out the channel of the soul, from where it <descended> in a certain order to serve the body; <and> seek <how> you will raise it up again to its order by combining (ritual) action with a sacred word."

That is, seek the source of the soul, from where (the soul) has been led astray and has served the body; and how someone, raising it up and awakening it by means of the telestic rites, might lead it back up from where it has come.

111

The intellectual (faculty) is well-wheeled...that which is borne around the intelligible as around a center:

"Urging yourself onward to the center of the clamorous light,"

says one of the gods.

"Let the immortal depth of your soul be opened. May all of your eyes stretch upward on high."

113

And in this way, the Oracles decree that the soul "be held in check:"

"A thinking mortal must hold the soul in check, so that it might not fall in with ill-fated earth but be saved."

114

(It is said) that Prometheus...forethought our rational life, so that we would not be

"...submerged in the passions of the earth," and be destroyed by the necessities of Nature, as one of the gods says.

115

"You must hasten toward the light and toward the rays of the Father, from where the soul, clothed in mighty intellect, has been sent to you."

116

"For the Divine is accessible not to mortals who think corporeally, but to all those who, naked, hasten upward toward the heights," as the oracle says.

117

And the more vigorous natures behold the truth by themselves and are more inventive,

"saved through their own strength..."

as the oracle says, while the weaker ones need both instruction and reminders from others who possess perfection in those areas where they lack it.

Let him listen to the sacred Oracles which speak of diverging paths...according to which it is possible to increase the seed from within:

“To some, (God) has granted (the ability) to apprehend the symbol of light through instruction. Others, however, he has fructified with their own strength while they are sleeping.”

119

Therefore...for the purification of our luminous body there is a need to get rid of material defilements, a need to undergo sacred purifications, and a need for the “...strength that binds us to God” exciting us toward the flight up there.

120

(We must)...take care of the purification of our luminous body, which the Oracles also call

“...delicate vehicle of the soul.”

121

In addition to these things, there is the “approaching”—for the oracle calls it thus:

“For the mortal who has approached the fire will possess the light from God.”

(The “approaching”) allows us a greater communion and a more distinct participation in the light of the gods.

122

How does the order of angels cause the soul to ascend?

“By making the soul bright with fire...”

(the oracle says). That is, illuminating the soul on all sides and filling it with pure fire, which gives it an unswerving order and power through which it does not rush into material disorder but makes contact with the light of the divine beings.

123

(p. 53 Kr. = Proclus, Exc. chald., I; 192, 17-19 Pitra)

“...ἐκτείνας πύριον νοῦν

123

(continues fr. 122)

And (the order of angels) causes a separation with matter by “...lightening (the soul) with a warm breath,” and causing a rising up through the anagogic life. For the “warm breath” is the sharing of life.

124

“Those who, by inhaling, drive out the soul, are free.”

125

According to (the Chaldeans), the Twice Transcendent shares himself with the worlds and sows “...lights which are set free,” to use their words.

126

(The theology of Plato)...

“has lit the fire...”

by which especially (souls) make contact with the unknowable transcendence of the One.

127

“On all sides, the reins of fire extend from the unformed soul.”

128

“...if you extend your mind, illumined by fire, to the work of piety, you will also save the flowing body.”

(p. 61 + n. 2 Kr. = Julian, Or. V, 178 d)

(p. 55 Kr. = Proclus, In Crat., 101, 3-8)

διὸ καὶ ὁ θεουργὸς ὁ τῆς τελετῆς τούτου προκαθηγούμενος ἀπὸ τῶν καθάρσεων ἄρχεται καὶ τῶν περιρράνσεων· κύματι ραίνεσθω παγερῷ βαρυχηέος ἄλμης,” ὥς φησι τὸ λόγιον περὶ αὐτοῦ.

129

And the Oracles of the gods testify to these things. I mean that through the holy rites not only the soul, but even the body is thought worthy of much help and salvation:

“Save also the mortal covering of bitter matter,” the gods announce to the most holy of the theurgists when they are encouraging them.

130

Therefore, (the souls), by perceiving the works of the Father,

“flee the shameful wing of allotted fate,”

as the oracle says,

“and rest in God, drawing in the flowering flames which come down from the Father. From these flames, as they are descending, the soul plucks the soul-nourished flower of fiery fruits.”

131

Therefore, the oracle says that the souls, ascending,

“...sing a hymn to Paean.”

132

For the Oracles concerning them point out that they are ineffable, and add:

“...keep silent, initiate.”

133

Therefore, even the theurgist who conducts this initiation begins with purifications and sprinklings:

“Above all, let the priest himself who governs the works of fire, be sprinkled with the icy billow of the deep-roaring sea,” as the oracle says about him.

Oracle:

“Do not hasten to the light-hating world, boisterous of matter, where there is murder, discord, foul odors, squalid illnesses, corruptions, and fluctuating works. He who intends to love the Intellect of the Father must flee these things.”

135

Therefore, even the gods exhort us not to gaze at (these demons) beforehand, until we have been strengthened by the powers from the initiation rites:

“For you must not gaze at them until you have your body initiated. Being terrestrial, these ill-tempered dogs are shameless.”

And for this reason, the Oracles add that “they enchant souls, forever turning them away from the rites.”

136

For in terms of both contemplative vision and telestic art, it is this which makes the ascent safe and sure for us—progress in an orderly fashion. At any rate, as the oracle says:

“For no other reason does God turn away from man and, with his living power, send him on empty pathways,” as whenever, in a disorderly and incorrect fashion, we make the ascent to the most holy of the visions or works.

137

Whoever lives a truly sacerdotal life, says the oracle,

“...shines as an angel, living in power.”

138

But he (sc. Plato) holds that the souls of the theurgists do not remain forever in the intelligible order, but that they, too, descend into generation, concerning whom the oracle says:

“...in the angelic order.”

δηλοῖ δὲ καὶ τὰ λόγια πρὸς τὸν θεουργὸν λέγοντα σαφῶς, ὅτι ἀσώματα μὲν ἐστὶ τὰ θεῖα πάντα, σώματα δὲ αὐτοῖς ὑμῶν ἕνεκεν ἐνδέδεται μὴ δυναμένων μετασχεῖν ἀσωμάτως τῶν ἀσωμάτων διὰ τὴν

ἐν τουτῷ (φῶτι) γὰρ

“...τὰ ἀτύπωτα τυποῦσθαί”

φησι κατὰ τὸ λόγιον.

139

Therefore, even the oracle has advised that

“...the fire-heated thought...”

holds the very first order in sacred worship.

140

It is necessary...to take part continuously in the worship of the Divine:

“To a mortal tarrying (in prayer), the blessed ones are quick (to act).”

141

...stating that which is spoken by the gods, namely:

“It is the loosing of the god when the sluggish mortal inclines toward that place.”

142

And the gods say these things to the theurgists, for they say that although we are incorporeal,

“...bodies have been attached to our self-revealed apparitions for your sakes...”

143

It is clear that the Oracles say plainly to the theurgist that all the divine beings are incorporeal, but that for your sake, bodies have been attached to them, since you do not have the power of sharing incorporeality with the incorporeal beings because of

“the corporeal nature onto which you have been grafted...”

144

For in this (light)

“...the unformed are formed,”

it says according to the oracle.

145

(p. 57 Kr. = Proclus, In Crat., 31, 12-14)

διὸ καὶ παρακελεύονται οἱ θεοὶ θεε λίθον μνίζουριν ἐπαυδῶν...”

145

Therefore, even the gods admonish us

“...to perceive the shape of light which has been stretched forth.”

For although it was without shape on high, it has become formed through procession.

And even the mystical doctrine handed down by the gods imparts these things:

“...after this invocation, (it says) you will either see a fire, similar to a child, extended by bounds over the billow of air, or you will see a formless fire, from which a voice is sent forth, or you will see a sumptuous light, rushing like a spiral around the field. But you may even see a horse, more dazzling than light, or even a child mounted on the nimble back of a horse, (a child) of fire or covered with gold or, again, a naked (child) or even (a child) shooting a bow and standing on the back (of a horse).”

147

“If you speak to me often, you will perceive everything in lion-form. For neither does the curved mass of heaven appear then nor do the stars shine. The light of the moon is hidden, and the earth is not firmly secured, but everything is seen by flashes of lightning.”

148

“But when you see the formless, very holy fire shining by leaps and bounds throughout the depths of the whole world, (then) listen to the voice of the fire.”

149

“When you perceive an earthly demon approaching, offer the mnizouris stone while making an invocation...”

150

Therefore, even the Oracles call the angular conjunctions (of Euclid) the 152

For (the Once Transcendent), as the oracle says, is simple, and indivisible.

153

The souls that are re-established in this (pentad) come under the sway of Destiny, says the oracle:

“For the theurgists do not fall into the herd which is subject to Destiny.”

154

We must flee the mass of men

as the oracle says.

says the oracle of those who lead a wicked life.

157

“<For> earthly beasts will occupy your vessel.”

The “vessel” is the composite mixture of our life; the “earthly beasts” are those demons who roam about the earth.

158

(The pneuma) accompanies the ascending (soul) as far as it can follow; and it is able (to follow) until it has come to the farthest opposite place. For also listen to what the Oracles say about this:

“And you will not leave behind the dregs of matter on a precipice, but there is also a portion for the image in the place surrounded with light.”

159

160

Because it is against nature for human souls to pass into irrational (animals). The Oracles are not the only ones to teach this when they say that it is an

that the human soul

“Do not stoop below into the dark-gleaming world beneath which an abyss is spread, forever formless and invisible, dark all around, foul, delighting in images, without reason, precipitous, twisted, forever revolving around its maimed depth, forever wedded to an invisible shape, idle, without breath.”

164

“Do not stoop below. A precipice lies beneath the earth, drawing (the soul) down from the staircase of seven steps.”

165*

“Seek paradise...”

The Chaldean paradise is the entire chorus of divine powers around the Father and the empyrean beauties of the demiurgic Principles.

166*

“...do not release (the soul), lest it come forth possessing something (evil)...”

Plotinus also places this oracle in (his tractate) concerning irrational release.

167

This is what the mathematical center typifies, since it is the termination point for all the lines (which proceed) from it to the circumference, and presents equality to them as the image of its own unity. It is in this way that the Oracles define “the center.”

“Center, from which all things are equal up to the rim.”

To be Vehicled

Since for those who are inspired by the Oracles, even these (supermundane) souls are said "to be vehicled" to certain supermundane bodies which are both Ethereal and Empyrean.

194

Seven-Rayed

But if I should touch upon the ineffable, mystical doctrine which the Chaldean spoke in a divine frenzy concerning the "seven-rayed" god—that god through whom he causes souls to ascend—I would be saying unknowable things. Yes, certainly unknowable to the herd, but well-known to the blessed theurgists.

Linked to the Zones

But (the theurgists) have praised Time itself as a god, and one (Time god) (they praise) as "Linked to the Zones"...the other as Independent of the Zones.

Defilement

The telestic (life) contributes the most by removing, through divine fire, all the "defilements" attendant upon generation, as the Oracles teach, and all the alien and irrational nature which the soul's pneumatic (vehicle) has drawn to it.

Therefore, even the pagans warn about impulsive mindlessness:

<are commanded> by the sovereignty of Zeus to assist men. For Zeus is the dispenser of all goods and evils. He is the one who determines the length of life for those who are brought into the world and who mixes the mortal body with both worthless and valuable things. Whoever in his wisdom would conciliate these demons and know what works please them, would excel all others in understanding and noble deeds, bearing noble gifts from a noble (benefactor) and fleeing common things."

Because the moon, in a proximate way, presides over all of generation and clearly governs all things there by herself, as the Oracles say:

"Nymphs of the springs and all water spirits; hollows of the earth, air, and beneath the solar rays; male and female lunar riders of all matter—heavenly, stellar, and fathomless."

217*

And it is clear that the oracle teaches these things:

"A sweet desire takes hold of all (souls) to dwell forever on Olympus as companions of the immortal gods. But not all are permitted to set foot in these halls."

When the person who had received the oracle, which had been delivered to him most fully, asked who it was, then, who achieved the ascent to the gods, and if it was the individual who especially preferred the life of the haruspex, the god added further:

"It is not whoever has thoughtfully placed his intention on the entrails (of sacrificial victims) who will immediately go to Olympus after the dissolution of the body, rising aloft on the light wings of the soul, but whoever [is wise...]"

And this is what Timaeus spoke darkly when he granted a kindred star to each soul.

For all (the gods) say that they have come by Necessity, not simply so, but in a manner—so to speak—of persuasive Necessity. Earlier, we mentioned those (verses) of Hecate by which she is said to appear:

"After daybreak, boundless, full of stars, I left the great, undefiled house of God and descended to life-nourishing earth at your request, and by the persuasion of ineffable words with which a mortal man delights in gladdening the hearts of immortals."

220*

And, again, another (god), being compelled, said:

"Listen to me, although I do not wish it, since you have bound me by Necessity."

221*

And still, more clearly, (Hecate says):

"Why, from the eternally coursing ether, do you need to invoke me, the goddess Hecate, by constraints which bind the gods?"

222*

And, again (Hecate says):

"I have come, hearkening to your very eloquent prayer, which the nature of mortals has discovered at the suggestion of the gods."

And next (Hecate says):

“Drawing them down from the ether by unspeakable spells, you brought them easily to this earth against their will. But (the demons) in the middle—the ones who stand on the mid-most gales far from the divine fire—you treat (these) demons shamefully and send them to mortals as prophetic dreams.”

224*

That even (the gods) themselves have advised how their statues ought to be made and from what kind of material, will be clear from the statements of Hecate to this effect:

“But execute my statue, purifying it as I shall instruct you. Make a form from wild rue and decorate it with small animals, such as lizards which live about the house. Rub a mixture of myrrh, gum, and frankincense with these animals, and out in the clear air under the waxing moon, complete this (statue) yourself while offering the following prayer.”

225*

That the gods who are summoned hasten to withdraw, will be clear by statements such as these, where they (sc. the gods) say:

“Finally, loosen the lord. The mortal no longer makes room for the god.”

226*

And concerning the King, Helios, and the gods in that place, (the theologians) praise that Dionysos as “associate of Helios, gazing upon the holy, celestial pole.”

They praise that Zeus, Osiris, the solar Pan, (and) the other (gods) which fill the books of the theologians and the theurgists.

Fr. 1

2. τὸν θεουργόν: Perhaps an allusion to Julian the Theurgist (see Lewy, Exc. IV, p. 463); cf. Saffrey, "Les Néoplatoniciens et les Oracles Chaldaïques," pp. 218-219, who suggests that Julian the Theurgist was the "medium" through whom Julian the Chaldean extracted oracles from Plato's "soul."

3. τὴν νοητόν: A reference to the Highest God of the Chaldean hierarchy. (Cf., e.g., fr. 20 bis; 21. See, also, the discussion in Lewy, pp. 165-169; 366-375; Festugière, Rév., IV, pp. 132-135.) Although this First God is generally described in Stoicizing terms as a primal, fiery Intellect (e.g., fr. 3, 5, 6), his nature is also regarded as essentially unknowable (e.g., fr. 3, 18, 84, 191). For Proclus, however, this term is not equated with the Plotinian One (who, of course, without qualification, is beyond Intellect), but with the "Father" of his first intelligible triad. (See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 483.) Cremer, p. 13, equates this term with μόνοι of Iambl., De myst., VI.7. See discussion in Introduction.

νοεῖν: The repeated use of νοεῖν in this fragment and elsewhere (e.g., fr. 11, 18, 19, 40, 49) to designate the mental apprehension of the Highest God and/or the intelligible world suggests a genuine contemplative aspect to the Chaldean anagōgē independent of any external ritual action. A process of contemplative perception is also an important aspect of both Gnostic and Hermetic patterns of ascent. On these matters, see detailed discussion in Introduction.

νόου ἄνθει: The "flower of mind" is that discreet, fiery organ or faculty (the highest power of the soul and akin to the fiery essence of the First God) which permits apprehension and/or union with the Highest God. The principle "like by like," a commonplace of Hellenistic philosophy, is apparent here. And so Proclus, Exc. chald., IV, p. 194, 9-10 Pitra: τῷ γὰρ ὁμοίῳ πανταχοῦ τὸ ὅμοιον συνάπτεσθαι πέφυκε. But for Proclus, it is not the "flower of mind" which achieves union with the Highest God, but the "flower of the whole soul" (ἄνθος πάσης τῆς ψυχῆς). Proclus' proliferation of hypostases and triads necessitated such a development, as he identified the Chaldean "Father" not with the Plotinian One, but with the highest level of his first intelligible triad. (See supra.) Thus, for Proclus, the ἄνθος νόου could only achieve union with this level, with the ἄνθος πάσης τῆς ψυχῆς effecting union with the One. See Exc. chald., IV, p. 194, 27 ff. Pitra; cf. Rist, "Mysticism," p. 215 ff. See, also, the comments of Smith, Porphyrus's Place, p. 121, n. 20: "Although Proclus' profusion of stages between human nous and the One is in many ways unsatisfactory, nevertheless the idea of the 'flower of the whole soul' looks like a determined effort to call a halt to the infinite regress (or rather progress). This stage differs from the others in being not a further refinement involving an even loftier part of man, but in attempting to reintegrate man as a whole." For Cremer, p. 13, the expression ἄνθος νόου is equivalent to the καθαρός λόγος of Iambl., De myst., VI.7. Cf., also, νόου ἄνθος, fr. 49; πυρὸς ἄνθος, fr. 34, 35, 37, 42; Synesius, H. 1(3), 140: ἄνθεα φωτός. Plotinus, Enn. V.5.8.22-23, speaks analogously of "that element in nous which is not nous" (τῷ ἑαυτοῦ μὴ νῶ; cf. V.3.14.5; VI.7.35.19-24) but is akin to the One.

4. ἐπεγκλίνης σὸν νοῦν: In Proclus' paraphrase (Exc. chald., IV; p. 194, 20-12 Pitra): τοῦτ' ἔστιν, ἐπερείσης ταῖς νοεραῖς ἐπιβολαῖς εἰς τὴν πρὸς ἐκεῖνο συναφήν.

5. ὥς τι νοῶν: i.e., as perceiving a specific mental object. In Proclus' paraphrase (Exc. chald., IV; p. 194, 22-23 Pitra): τοῦτ' ἔστιν, κατὰ τι μέτρον εἶδους καὶ γνώσεως ἐπιβλητικῶς. Cf., also, Plotinus, Enn. V.5.6.22-23 (re the nature of the One): οὐ γὰρ ἓν οὐδὲ τὸ 'οἶον' ὅτῳ μὴδὲ τὸ 'τι'; V.5.6.7 (re apprehension of the One): τὸ δὲ οὐκ ἔστι λαβεῖν ὡς τόδε.

ἀλκῆς: Here, "strength" alludes to the fiery essence or "flower" of the First God. In this sense, cf. the use of ἀλκή in fr. 32, 49, and 82. Elsewhere, ἀλκή alludes to the "flower/flame of mind" or "spark" within the soul which functions as a theurgic "power" which "binds" or unites the soul to God. In this sense, cf. the use of ἀλκή in fr. 117-119. Festugière, however (Rév., IV, p. 133, n. 2; and so Des Places), translates ἀλκή as "glaiive" ("sword") to reinforce the combative imagery of ἀλκή in fr. 2. But this translation, in both instances, obscures the real sense of this important Chaldean term. This expression is also used frequently by Synesius in connection with the "strength" of God; e.g., H. 1(3), 527, 534, 581, 601; 2(4), 198, 205, 267; 3(5), 55; 9(1), 16, 66. See Geudtner, pp. 50-53.

6. ἀμφιφαῦς: Cf. ἀμφιφάντα, fr. 158; ἀμφιφαῖς, fr. 189 (here, descriptive of Hecate); Synesius, H. 1(3), 155: ἀμφιφαῖς φῶς. Light, of course, is descriptive of the intelligible world; darkness, of the material world. Cf. ἀμφικνεφῆς, fr. 163.

δύναμις: Here, "power" reinforces the notion of "strength" in connection with the First God. In this sense, cf., esp., ἀλκὴν...δυναμένοιοι, fr. 32. Elsewhere, "power" principally refers to the feminine element of the Chaldean triad (e.g., fr. 4, 56, 96) but can also allude to the Second Intellect as well (e.g., fr. 3 and 5). This ambiguity reflects the fact that the Highest God is designated as a "triadic Monad" whose "power" is operative at each moment of the triad. A "triple-powered" Monad is also familiar to certain Gnostic sources. See fr. 26 and notes.

νοεραῖς στράπτουσα τομαῖσιν: This Chaldean vocabulary of "intellectual division" (initiated properly at the level of the Second Intellect; cf. τέμνεσθαι, fr. 22; τμήσις, fr. 179; omnia...secta sunt sicut intellectualiter, fr. 9) is found frequently in the writings of the later Neoplatonists. See, e.g., Proclus, In Tim., II, 256, 24-26: καὶ τὰ λόγια δὲ νοεραῖς μὲν στράπτειν τομαῖς δημιουργὸν λέγοντα; Damascius, I, 315, 22: ὁ δις ἐπέκεινα (cf. fr. 169 and notes) νοεραῖς στράπτων τομαῖς. See, also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 214; 2(4), 120: νοερά δὲ τομά. (Cf. H. 1(3), 208, 254-255; 5(2), 24.) These "divisions," of course, are the Chaldean equivalent of the Platonic Ideas. (Cf. ιδέας...ἐμερίσθησαν, fr. 37.) However, unlike the later Neoplatonists, the Chaldeans apparently did not distinguish clearly between noetic and noeric orders, but used τὸ νοητόν and τὸ νοερόν interchangeably to designate the intelligible world as a whole. Cf., e.g., the use of νοερός in fr. 37. See Festugière, Rév., III, p. 56, n. 3; Theiler, 1942, p. 8 = 1966, p. 261; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 99.

7. οὐ δὴ χρὴ σφοδρότητι νοεῖν κτλ.: In other words, the intelligible reality of the Highest God cannot be perceived in any direct or aggressive manner (such as focusing on a specific mental object), but must be approached obliquely in a state of passive readiness. Cf. Damascius' interpretation, I, 155, 2-3: ὅτι οὐχ ἡ σφοδρά (sc. γνώσις) καὶ ἀντερίδουσα πρὸς τι γνωστόν,...ἀλλ' ἡ ἀφιεῖσα ἑαυτὴν ἐκεῖνῳ. Cf., also, Iamblichus, Comm. In Parm., Fr. 2a (Dillon) re perception of the Intelligible: οὔτε ἐπιβολῇ ὅλως, οὔτε κατὰ ἐπείρεισιν ὠρισμένην οὔτε κατὰ περίληψιν οὔτε τινὰ τοιοῦτον τρόπον ἐκεῖνο γνωστόν. Iamblichus, surprisingly, also states here that the Intelligible (contra our fr. 1) cannot even be known by the “flower of mind” (οὔτε τῷ ἄνθει τοῦ νοῦ αἰρετόν). But, as Dillon notes, (p. 390), the contradiction here is “more apparent than real” in that Iamblichus—in this instance—is commenting on a passage from Plato’s Parmenides (see, also, Dillon, Fr. 2b and notes ad loc.)—and not exegeting the Oracles. (Cf., also, Proclus’ paraphrase to line 4 = v. 2, supra.) Cremer, however (p. 13), prefers to interpret this language as descriptive of the theurgist’s “passivity” in preparation for the theurgic ergon. See discussion in Introduction.

8. ἀλλά: Dam.; οὐδέ, cj. Kroll and Festugière (following Thilo). But οὐδέ here, as Lewy notes (p. 166, n. 373), negates the sense of the entire fragment.

ταναοῦ/ταναῆ: Lewy (pp. 168-169, and so Des Places) translates this term as “subtle,” but Hadot (Lewy², p. 709, n. 36) is surely correct in arguing that this expression properly conveys the sense of “extension,” as reflected in the use of τεῖναι, infra, l. 11 (= v. 9). Cf., similarly, ἐκτείνας πύριον νοῦν, fr. 128; sed anime noema in unum ampliare, fr. 9a. Cf. also, fr. 12, where ταναῆ describes the “extension” of the Monad into duality. For Synesius, ταναῆ is descriptive of matter: H. 1(3), 40: ταναῆς ὕλας. My translation of the entire expression νόου ταναοῦ ταναῆ φλογί is based on Festugière, Rév., IV, p. 133: “tendant à l’extrême la flamme de l’intellect.” Cf., also, Chaignet, Damascius, I, p. 245, and n. 1: “la flamme infinie d’une raison infinie.” For Chaignet, ταναῆ conveys the sense of “extension without limit.”

8-9. πάντα μετρούση πλὴν τὸ νοητὸν ἐκεῖνο: The point here is that the Highest God cannot be “measured” in any sense since he is without limit and absolute simplicity. (In this regard, cf. the description of the “Once Transcendent” in fr. 152.) The act of “measuring” (like “division”) begins at the level of the Second Intellect. Cf. μετροῦσα, fr. 23; μετρεῖται, fr. 31.

10-11. ἄγνὸν ὄμμα ψυχῆς: The “eye of the soul” is a common expression for the “spiritual eye” in man and can be equated with the “flower/flame of mind.” Cf. ὄμματα πάντα, fr. 112; ψυχῆς ὄμμα φέριστον, fr. 213.

11. τεῖναι κενεὸν νόον: The “empty mind” is that which is free of all forms of normal cognition (i.e., it no longer “measures” or focuses “intently” on its object), but is in a state of passive awareness, ready to apprehend or intuit the unified simplicity of the Highest God. Cf. supra, l. 5. Cf. also, Numenius’ expression ἔρημον/ἐρημία, fr. 2 (Des Places), as the place where the Good is found.

12. ἐπεὶ νόου ἕξω ὑπάρχει: In other words, since the intelligible reality of the First God is beyond any form of human thought, it can only be grasped indirectly by that organ or faculty (i.e., “flower/flame of mind,” “eye of the soul”) to which it is akin. This statement does not contradict fr. 20: τὸ νοητὸν οὐ νοῦ χωρὶς ὑπάρχει (as Dodds thought; see Proclus: El. Th., p. 287) since fr. 20 is describing an ontological situation vis-à-vis the Second Intellect, whereas v. 10 of fr. 1 is concerned with human cognition (and so Kroll, p. 12; Lewy, p. 165; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 325, n. 1). Cf., also, fr. 84: αὐτὸς πᾶς ἕξω ὑπάρχει. But here, the one who “exists outside” is the Highest God, who is essentially beyond all categorization. For the later Neoplatonists, the noun ὑπαρξίς (Victorinus: existentia) became a regular designation for the Chaldean Father. See, e.g., Rist, “Mysticism,” pp. 217-225.

Fr. 2

1. φωτὸς κελάδοντος: This expression apparently alludes to the “rushing sound” of the revolving, celestial spheres. (Cf. ibid., fr. 111; Lewy, pp. 192-193 and n. 59.) In Lewy’s interpretation (p. 194), the raiments formed from the substance of the spheres make up the “defensive armor” (or “vehicle”) of the soul (cf. fr. 61 and notes) and serve as a form of protection when the soul makes its ascent (depicted in this fragment as a type of “magical assault”).

2. ἀλκῇ τριγλῶχινι: An allusion to the triadic nature of the First God. Cf. Damascius, I, 254, and II, 62, 29 (where God is praised as τριγλῶχης); Synesius, H. 9(1), 66: τρικόρυμβον ἄλκην (as descriptive of the Monad). Cf., also, τριούχον, fr. 26 and notes.

3. πᾶν τριάδος: cf. Ruelle and Kroll; παντοιάδος, codd.; and so Lewy, p. 195, n. 74, who translates this neologism as “Manifold Universe.” Cf., also, Des Places, “Notes,” p. 321.

σύνθημα: This technical term (cf. fr. 109; σύμβολα, fr. 108) is equated by Lewy (p. 195) with the voces mysticae or hidden, divine names of the gods. (As such, this term is also equated with the Iynges; cf. frr. 76 and 77.) Here, the τριάδος σύνθημα or “token of the triad” can be equated with the “triple-barbed strength” of v. 2 (as the vox mystica of the Highest God) and thus be understood as a theurgic power which functions as a “focusing” device to prod the soul upward. In addition, Lewy suggests that the σύνθηματα, in general, functioned as the “magical” means of controlling demonic powers during the ascent. In this regard, cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 539, 620, where the “seal” (σφραγίς) of the Father (equated in vv. 538 and 628 with the term σύνθημα) is said to ward off demonic attacks. But with Synesius, additional Christian imagery is also likely, as the term σφραγίς is used in both orthodox and Gnostic Christian sources to designate baptism, both in its usual lustral sense and, in the Gnostic sources, designating, as well, a “spiritual” baptism or “sealing” of the soul as it ascends. As such, Gnostic “sealing” is also a means of controlling demonic/archontic powers. Cf., e.g., 1 Jew, chs. 44-52; Pist. Soph., esp. ch. 138; Marsanes, NHC X, 2,12-14; 66*, 1-5; Trim. Prot., NHC XIII, 49,27-32.

4. ἐμπυρίοις ὄχετοῖς: These “empyrean channels” are the mystical rays of the sun on which the soul makes its ascent. Cf. fr. 65, 66, 110; Synesius, H. 1(3), 306; 2(4), 203; 4(6), 36. See Geudtner, pp. 53-56.

5. περὶ αὐτῆς: In Damascius’ interpretation, this fragment refers to the acquisition of “intelligible knowledge” in the manner set forth in fr. 1. In this regard, cf. Proclus, In Parm. VII (ed. C. Steel, p. 512, 86-88 = Kl.-Lab., p. 58, 22-24), where Proclus describes the via negativa approach to the One as a type of combat: “...que ab abnegationibus est via ad ipsum plane et ille (sc. Socrates) determinavit, dicens ‘ut in pugna’ oportere omnia ab ipso auferre et ab omnibus illud separare” (Rep. 534 c 1).

ὁ χρησμοδῶν θεός: Probably Apollo; see Lewy, p. 6.

Fr. 3

1. ὁ πατήρ: A frequent designation for the Highest God (passim). The later Neoplatonists, however, had problems with this term, sometimes understanding it in the Chaldean sense (e.g., Porphyry, De regressu an., p. 32*, 24 Bidez), other times equating it with the highest member of the first intelligible triad (e.g., Pro-clus; see notes to fr. 1). See, also, the discussion in Rist, "Mysticism and Transcendence," p. 218 ff.

ἡρπασσεν: This expression (Lewy translates it "rapt away;" see p. 78 and n. 45; cf. Hadot, Porphyre, II, p. 91 and n. 1: "Le père s'est dérobé lui-même") underscores the ontological separation of the Father, who exists apart from everything (cf. fr. 84). This radical transcendence approaches a via negativa, as the Father, ultimately, is beyond characterization (cf. fr. 18 and 191). In the context of Psellus, this expression indicates that the Father is ἀκατάληπτον and ἀπερίληπτον. Cf., also, Proclus, Exc. chald., IV; p. 194, 29-31 Pitra: Εἰ γὰρ ὁ πρῶτος πατήρ ἀρπάζειν ἑαυτὸν λέγεται τοῦ νοῦ καὶ τῆς δυνάμεως, τίς ὁ μηδὲ οὕτως ἀρπάσαι δεηθεὶς ἑαυτὸν, ἀλλ' ὑπερῆρπασμένος ἀπὸ πάντων ἀπλῶς, καὶ θεὸς πάντων ὑμνούμενος;

Plotinus also uses this expression, but in connection with the contemplative ascent to Nous; e.g., Enn. V.3.4.11: συναρπάσαντα ἑαυτὸν εἰς τὸ ἄνω. An analogous term is χωρίζειν, which is common not only to the later Neoplatonists (as well as Plotinus), but to Gnostic sources as well (in both an ontological and anagogic sense). Cf., e.g., Marsanes, NHC X, 9,9 and 22, where the term ἀναχωρεῖν expresses, respectively, the ontological "withdrawal" of the Aeon Barbelo (apparently from two of the "powers" of the "Three-Powered One") as well as the "withdrawal" of the Gnostic into his self. Similarly, in 9,29-10,2, the "invisible Spirit" is said to "run up" (ΠΩΤ ΑΖΡΗΨ) to his "place" (τόπος), expressing this same idea of divine withdrawal or contraction. However, in the last analysis, it is only Plotinus who achieves a thorough-going transcendence with his doctrine of the One. See, in this regard, Dodds, "Parmenides," pp. 129-142; Dillon, Middle Platonists, pp. 386-389.

A last analogy is found in Paul's Epistle to the Philippians: οὐχ ἀρπαγμὸν ἠγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα (Phil. 2:6). L. Abramowski would interpret this New Testament usage of ἀρπαγμὸν as a similar expression of transcendence; see Drei christologische Untersuchungen, pp. 1-17.

2. δυνάμει νοερᾷ: An allusion to the Second or Demiurgic Intellect, who is directly responsible for shaping the cosmos according to the Ideas. Cf. fr. 5 and 7; Festugière, Rév., IV, p. 132.

ἴδιον πῦρ: i.e., the fiery essence of the Father which remains separate and distinct from the Second Intellect. Cf. ἴδιον, fr. 82; Synesius, H. 8(9), 54: ἰδίου πυρὸς ἀρχάν (but here, with reference to Christ).

Fr. 4

3. ἡ μὲν γὰρ δύναμις κτλ.: On the basis of this oracle, the later Neoplatonists discerned a Chaldean triad of Father (= ἐκείνω; ἐκείνου), Power, and Intellect. Porphyry, apparently, was the first to make this distinction; cf., e.g., De regressu an., pp. 36*, 15-19; 37*, 7-10 Bidez; Hadot, Porphyre, II, p. 91 and n. 2. This triad was also understood by the later Neoplatonists in terms of ὑπαρξεις, δυνάμεις/ζωή, νοῦς. However, as Tardieu points out ("Oracles chaldaïques," pp. 214-215), triads of this type antedate Porphyry, since similar triads appear in the Gnostic sources known to Plotinus and his school. Cf., in this regard, the triads ὑπαρξεις, ΩΝΖ = ζωή, νοῦς (Steles Seth, NHC VII, 125, 28-32); ΠΗ ΕΤΕ ΠΑΙ ΠΕ = ὑπαρξεις or τὸ ὄν; ΩΝΖ = ζωή; ΤΜΗΤΕΙΜΕ = νοήσις (Allogenes, NHC XI, 49, 28-38). See Robinson, "Three Steles of Seth," pp. 132-142. Pearson (Nag Hammadi Codices IX and X, pp. 246 and 275) suggests that the triad γνώσις, ὑπόστασις, ἐνέργεια in Marsanes, X, 9, 16-18 belongs to this group as well. In terms of the Chaldean triad, Proclus (cf. Th. pl., 365, 3ff.) and Damascius (cf. I, 87, 1-4 = fr 27; 108, 17-19) placed it beneath the One at the level of the first intelligible triad. (See Hadot, Porphyre, I, pp. 260-272; Rist, "Mysticism and Transcendence," p. 218 ff.) In any event, the triadic understanding of this oracle (combined with the monadic-triadic language of fr. 26 and 27) resulted in an understanding of the Chaldean First God as a three-in-one deity, a notion congenial to both Synesius and Victorinus, who grafted the Chaldean triad (as mediated through Porphyry) onto the Christian Trinity. The result: a median, feminine hypostasis equated with the Christian Spirit. See further discussion in Introduction.

In addition, this fragment also suggests the possibility of a primordial, bisexual deity; i.e., a Father who exists alongside of or "with" (σύν) his Power. (See Kroll, p. 28; Lewy, pp. 82; 340-343.) The Second Intellect would then be generated from this androgynous god (ἅπ' ἐκείνου). A bisexual First God is also mentioned in C.H. I.9 (ἄρρενόθηλος); Asclepius, 20 (Deus...utroque sexus fecunditate plenissimus), and in several Gnostic sources (e.g., Gos. Eg., NHC III, 42, 10-11: ΠΡΟΟΥΤ ΣΖΙΜΕ ΝΕΙΩΤ). Cf., also, Synesius, H. 5(2), 63-64: σὺ πατήρ, σὺ δ' ἔσσι μάτηρ/σὺ μὲν ἄρρην, σὺ δὲ θῆλυς. But the immediate source of Synesius' imagery is probably Porphyry; cf., De philos. ex or. haur., Wolff, p. 146: δ' ἔσσι πατήρ καὶ μητέρος (see Lewy, p. 24, n. 59). Theiler, 1942, pp. 6-7 = 1966, p. 259 cites a similar passage from Macrobius, In Somn., I, 6, 7 ff.: "unum autem, quod μονάς id est unitas dicitur, et mas et femina est..." Theiler, ibid., suggests that this passage from Macrobius probably derived from Porphyry's lost commentary on the Timaeus, but would ultimately reflect a Chaldean origin. Thus the notion of a bisexual Supreme God as a Chaldean tenet is fairly secure (despite Dodds' objection that such a notion is not "explicitly attested for the Oracles"; see "New Light," p. 266, n. 9 = Lewy², p. 695, n. 9).

Fr. 5

2. πῦρ ἐπέκεινα τὸ πρῶτον: As a "Transcendent Fire," the Chaldean First God, although appropriating Stoic imagery, nevertheless remains removed from the lower orders of being and participates only indirectly in the process of creation. Cf., esp., ἴδιον πῦρ, fr. 3; ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα, fr. 169.

ἔην δύναμιν κατακλείει: Here, "power" again alludes to the Second Intellect. Cf. ἔη δυνάμει νοερᾷ κλείσας, fr. 3.

3. νοῦ νόος: i.e., the Second Intellect. Epithets of this type are common. Cf., esp., πηγὴ πηγῶν, fr. 30 and notes. Cf., also, χρόνου χρόνος, fr. 185.

3-4. ὁ κόσμου τεχνίτης πυρίου: The Second Intellect as Demiurge initially fashions the intelligible or Empyrean World of Ideas. Cf. ἐργοτεχνίτης/τεχνίτης, fr. 33; ποιητής, fr. 68 (here, it is the sensible world which is formed).

Fr. 6

3. ὑπεζωκώς: In the context of Simplicius, this expression is descriptive of Atlas. However, in a Chaldean context, the reference would be to Hecate as the "girdling" World Soul. In this regard, cf. ὑπεζωκὸς πυρὸς ἄνθος, fr. 35 and notes. Although Lewy (pp. 353-354 and n. 159; cf. p. 92 and n. 101) feels this "girdling" notion is dependent on Plato, Tim., 36 e, Dodds ("New Light," p. 270,

n. 24 = Lewy², p. 699, n. 24) contests this dependence as “over-ingenious.” Lewy (p. 93) also notes that statues of Hecate often included a girdle (ζωστήρ) wrapped about her hips, which the Neoplatonists interpreted in cosmic terms; e.g., Damascius, I, 242, 14 ff. Proclus (In rem p., II, 225, 1-5; cf. Lewy, p. 92, n. 102; Exc. VII, p. 484) situates ὁ ὑπεζωκῶς—as a noetic entity—at the lowest point of the intellectual order, and thus on the border of the intelligible and sensible worlds (in the manner of the World Soul). Tardieu (“Oracles chaldaïques,” p. 208, following Kroll, loc. cit., n. 1) equates ὑπεζωκῶς with the Valentinian Horos, who performs a similar “girdling” function between the intelligible and sensible orders.

ὁ μὴν: Damascius, II, 13, 29 (who quotes our line in full); codd.: οὐ μὴν and ἡμῖν. Heiberg did not isolate this line as a Chaldean verse, but kept it as part of Simplicius’ text. Thus, for Heiberg, the line referred to Atlas as ὑπεζωκῶς τις, οὐ μὴν νοερός. Bidez, however (RPh, 1903, pp. 79-81), was the first to separate this line from Simplicius’ text (following Damascius), thus constructing our two-verse oracle. Kroll evidently overlooked Simplicius altogether, citing only Damascius’ text (and so Lewy). But then Festugière, in apparent ignorance of Bidez’s research, “discovered” these two lines once more (“Un Vers méconnu des Oracles chaldaïques dans Simplicius,” Symb. Os., XXVI, 1948, pp. 75-77), but neither Bidez nor Festugière was able to connect the role of ὑπεζωκῶς with the Chaldean Hecate.

5. πῦρ πρῶτον καὶ πῦρ ἕτερον κτλ.: Festugière (ibid., p. 77) understands this line as referring to the first and second “feux-intellects” who are separated by the median ὑπεζωκῶς. However, if ὑπεζωκῶς is understood as a World Soul figure, then the two fires of this line refer, respectively, to the noetic “fire” (or sun) of the intelligible world and its material counterpart, the mundane sun. Cf., in this regard, ἄλλο πυρῆσμον, fr. 65 and notes; πυρὸς ὄγκος...ἕτερος, fr. 68 and notes. See, also, Kroll, p. 35; Bidez, ibid., p. 81. But either interpretation is possible, assuming a pervasive, median principle (Hecate/δύναμις/ὑπεζωκῶς) operating at various levels of reality.

σπεύδοντα: Cf. fr. 115, 116, 134.

μιγῆναι: Cf. μιγνυμένων, fr. 66 (in an anagogic context).

Fr. 7

1. ἐξετέλεσσε: The “activity” of the Father consists of “perfectly” thinking the world as an intelligible model. Cf. οὐ...ἀτελής, fr. 13.

1-2. νῶ παρέδωκε δευτέρῳ, ὃν κτλ.: Cf. Numenius, fr. 17 (Des Places): ὦ ἄνθρωποι, ὃν τοπάξετε ὑμεῖς νοῦν οὐκ ἔστι πρῶτος, ἀλλ’ ἕτερος πρὸ τούτου νοῦς πρεσβύτερος καὶ θειότερος. The problem of influence here is much discussed. Dodds (“Numenius,” p. 11, contra Festugière, “Religion grecque,” p. 482; cf. Waszink, “Porphyrios,” pp. 43-45) argues (rightly, I think; cf. Tardieu, “Oracles chaldaïques,” p. 234) for a Chaldean origin: “...the address to mankind is both natural and usual in oracles, whereas in a philosophical dialogue it is anything but usual and has in fact the air of being dragged in by Numenius.” But cf. Lewy (pp. 320-321 and notes 26-29), who argues for a third source, suggesting that both Numenius and the Oracles mutually borrowed a “paraenetic motif” from Platonists of “similar tendency.” (Cf. Dillon, Middle Platonists, p. 364 who, similarly, would not rule out a third source.) Lewy also points out that the “profound differences” between the Oracles and Numenius

(e.g., Numenius' dualism with its evil world soul in contrast to the monistic, "Father-generated" universe of the Chaldean system; the developed doctrine of Chaldean emanations which is missing in Numenius) further argue against direct borrowing. This may be true for both systems as a whole, but should not then preclude a process of selective borrowing in terms of certain congenial ideas. Thus, it may well be that Numenius has borrowed this particular verse (assuming his eclectic philosophical interests) as supportive of his "two Intellects" doctrine.

Fr. 8

2. δυάς: An allusion to the dyadic nature of the Second Intellect, who functions both as a contemplative and active (or demiurgic) Mind; i.e., he both contemplates the intelligible world as well as directs his activity towards the sensible world. Cf. δύο, fr. 12; δις ἐπέκεινα, fr. 169 and notes. Cf., also, Numenius, fr. 15 (Des Places): ὁ μὲν οὖν πρῶτος περὶ τὰ νοητά, ὁ δὲ δεύτερος περὶ τὰ νοητά καὶ αἰσθητά. (See Lewy, pp. 114-115 and n. 187; Festugière, Rév., III, pp. 55-56; Des Places, pp. 125-126.)

τῷδε: Most likely the Father or First Intellect (and so Festugière, Rév., III, p. 55; Des Places, p. 121). But cf. Lewy (p. 114, n. 187), who suggests the Second Intellect and translates v. 1 as "duality is attached to him," viz. the Second Intellect (and so Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 201, n. 1). Cf., also, Dillon ("The Concept of Two Intellects," pp. 177-179), who argues that fr. 8, as a whole, should be regarded as a continuation of fr. 7 (which Lewy had already suggested; see p. 112, n. 181) and, thus, would understand τῷδε here as referring to the νῶ δευτέρῳ of fr. 7. This "Dyad" of fr. 8, then (as a Second Intellect), would be third in rank after the Father and a First Intellect distinct from the Father. Thus, for Dillon, this doctrine of "two Intellects" (situated after the Father) would differ from that of Numenius, for whom the First Intellect remains supreme. But such a schematization of the Chaldean hierarchy (in terms of any well-defined doctrine) cannot be affirmed on the basis of the fragments. The most that can be said is that the Oracles, perhaps, were moving in this direction, but essentially remained fluid in doctrine.

It should also be noted that Dillon's argument, in part, is based on the comments of Anon. Taur. IX, 1-5, where there is mention of the Father's δύναμις, νοῦς, and ἄλλον πάλιν <ν>οῦν. But as Dillon states, this doctrine may well be a Porphyrian innovation (or even criticism) of Chaldean teaching, especially assuming Porphyry's purported authorship of this "anonymous" document. In this regard, see Hadot, Porphyre, I, pp. 102-143; II, pp. 61-113.

4. τὰ νοητά: i.e., the Ideas. Cf. frr. 31, 40, 108.

5. αἰσθησιν: Cf. αἰσθητοῖς, fr. 40; αἰσθητά, fr. 41.

κόσμοις: A probable allusion to the stars. Cf. κόσμων, fr. 34. See Kroll, p. 28; Festugière, Rév., III, p. 55, n. 5.

Fr. 9

Fragments 9 and 9a have been isolated as Chaldean by Saffrey (loc. cit.), but Saffrey does not attempt to reconstruct the Greek. Earlier, Theiler had reconstructed part of our fr. 9a (= fr. 9, Des Places), but his reconstruction is problematic (see infra.) Following Saffrey, then, no attempt has been made here to reconstruct either the Greek or meter of these lines. However, the fragments have been separated from Proclus' text by quotes to maintain the uniformity of our text.

2. le unum: Moerbeke has introduced the French article here rather than use a Latin demonstrative pronoun; see discussion in Steel, V. I, pp. 44*-45*.

5. omnia enim ex uno entia: Cf. fr. 10: εἰσὶν πάντα ἑνὸς πυρὸς ἐκγεγαῶτα. If the Latin here is an accurate reflection of the Greek text (and not a re-wording of either Proclus or his Latin redactor), then the Oracles apparently referred to the Highest God as One in addition to his other designations. But cf. notes to fr. 10.

5-6. omnia...secta sunt sicut intellectualiter: Saffrey (p. 233, n. 51) compares the expression νοεραῖς τομαῖσιν in fr. 1. Cf., also, ἐμερίσθησαν νοερῶ πυρὶ μοιρηθεῖσαι εἰς ἄλλας νοεράς, fr. 37, with regard to the "division" of the Ideas/Intelligibles.

6. in corpora multa: Cf., again, fr. 37, where (in a slightly different sense) the Ideas/Intelligibles are said to "break" (= "divide") themselves on the "bodies" of the worlds (ῥηγνύμεναι κόσμου περὶ σώμασιν).

Fr. 9a

3. neque in tuo intellectu detinere: Theiler (p. 94, Klibansky-Labowsky) reconstructs the Greek as: ...μηδ' ἐν σῶ νῶ καταῖσχειν (= fr. 9, Des Places; cf. νῶ μὲν κατέχειν τὰ νοητά, fr. 8). But Tardieu (Lewy², p. 679) finds Theiler's restoration problematic, suggesting (as Saffrey has done) that the entire Latin text should be cited here instead.

multivarium aliud: Saffrey (p. 222) cites as a parallel πολυποικίλου ὕλης, fr. 34 and, thus, would reconstruct the Greek here as: πολυποίκιλον ἄλλο.

4. anime noema in unum ampliare: Cf. fr. 1, v. 6: νόου ταναοῦ ταναῇ φλογί; v. 9: τεῖναι κενεὸν νόον εἰς τὸ νοητὸν. Thus, this Latin fragment reinforces our contention that the Chaldean anagōgē consisted, in part, of a genuine contemplative (or via negativa) approach to the Highest God. But whether fragments such as these should be labelled "philosophical" (as opposed to "theurgical"), as Saffrey suggests (p. 219), is problematic. See further discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 10

1. ἑνὸς πυρός: Whether the Chaldeans ever designated the Highest God simply as "One" is problematic. According to Anon. Taur. IX,1 (see Kroll, p. 12), the answer is no: ὥς καὶ τὸ ἐν λέγειν αὐτὸν εἶναι παντελῶς παραιτεῖσθαι. (See Hadot, Porphyre, II, p. 64 ff., who argues that Porphyry is the author of this "anonymous" work.) But cf. Psellus, P.G. 122, 1149 c 5-6: μίαν ἀρχὴν τῶν πάντων δοξάζουσι, καὶ ἐν αὐτὴν καὶ ἀγαθὸν ἀνυμνοῦσιν; Hypotyp. 1: ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀρρητου...ἑνός. (Psellus' interpretations are, perhaps, based on a Proclan exegesis of our fragment. See Lewy, p. 81, n. 54. Cf., also, fr. 9: omnia enim ex uno entia.) Hadot, ibid., p. 93, n. 3, suggests that the ambiguity here may simply reflect a tension between "the affirmation and negation of the notion of the One." This tension is certainly borne out in those fragments where the Highest God is affirmed as Father, Monad, Intellect, etc., but then negated as essentially unknowable (e.g., fr. 3, 18, 84); but his affirmation simply as One remains inconclusive.

Fr. 11

1. ἐν τοῖς νοητοῖς καὶ κρυφίοις θεοῖς: Cf. Proclus, El. Th., prop. 162: πᾶν τὸ καταλάμπων τὸ ὄντως ὄν πληθος ἐνάδων κρύφιον καὶ νοητὸν ἐστὶ. (See O'Neill, Proclus: Alc. I, p. 32, n. 102.)

τριττῶν...ὑποστάσεων οὐσῶν: In addition to the "Good," Proclus mentions "Wisdom" (τὸ σοφόν) and "Beauty" (τὸ καλόν).

3. τᾶγαθόν: If Westerink's reconstruction of this line is correct, then the Oracles characterized the Highest God as Good as well, perhaps, as One; see supra, fr. 9 and 10. But cf. Kroll, loc. cit., who cites only the final hemistich as oracular; and so Lewy, p. 80, n. 52. Cf. Proclus, In Eucl., loc. cit., for the same attestation.

νοῦσα: cj. Westerink; νοούσης, codd.

πατρικὴ μονάς: Although Monad, the Father is also implicitly a triad. Cf., e.g., μουνάδα/τριούχον, fr. 26; τριάς/μονάς, fr. 27.

Fr. 12

1. (ἡ ὁλότης): In the context of Damascius, "wholeness" is equated with Aion or "Eternity." Cf., in this regard, (τὸ) ὅλον φῶς, fr. 59. For Proclus, however (loc. cit.), this term is understood in a Pythagorean context and thus equated with "the line" (ἡ γραμμή).

3. ταναή (γὰρ) μονάς ἐστὶν ἡ δύο γεννᾷ: Damascius equates this notion of "extensibility" or "tension" (τετάσθαι, l. 1) into "duality" with Aion; for Proclus, the context is again Pythagorean, and thus descriptive of the "point" (as monad) extended into the "line" (as dyad). In a Chaldean context, however, δύο would properly refer to the Second Intellect. Cf. δνᾶς, fr. 8; cf., also, ταναοῦ/ταναῇ, fr. 1 and notes.

4. μένειν αἰεὶ τῇ ἀόκνῳ στροφάλιγγι: Cf. αἰεὶ τε μένειν ἀόκνῳ στροφάλιγγι, fr. 49 (with reference to Aion). Because Damascius quotes part of this oracular fragment here (in addition to his equation of "wholeness" with Aion), Lewy (p. 99 and notes 137-138) suggests combining these two fragments in the following manner: Αἰὼν πατρογενὲς φᾶος <ὡς> ταναὴ μονάς ἐστὶ, ἡ δύο γεννᾷ: <καὶ ἡ> πολὺ, etc. For Lewy, then, fr. 12 means that Aion is a "subtle monad" with a "dual aspect;" viz. he is "sustained" by the "strength" of the Father while transmitting motion or "light" to the Ideas (or "Sources" and "Principles;" see fr. 49). This interpretation is a trifle over-ingenious. It is simpler to see fr. 12 as simply alluding to the "extension" of the Father or First Intellect (as μονάς; cf. πατρικὴ μονάς, fr. 11) into the demiurgic Second Intellect (or "Dyad;" see supra).

Fr. 13

1. πατρικῆς ἀρχῆς: Another designation for the Highest God, who is the Source or Principle of all that exists. Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 172; 2(4), 62: ἀρχῶν ἀρχά. Cf., also, fr. 40 and 49, where the ἀρχαί are the Ideas contained in the Paternal Principle. See, also, Lewy, pp. 115-116 and n. 192.

οὐ...ἀτελής: Cf. ἐξετέλεσσε, fr. 7. Psellus, loc. cit., connects this Chaldean notion of Paternal perfection with Jas. 1:17: πᾶν δῶρημα τέλειον ἄνωθεν ἐστὶ καταβαῖνον ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς τῶν φώτων.

τροχάζει: Cf. τροχάουσαν, fr. 56.

Fr. 14

1. πατήρ οὐ φόβον κτλ.: The meaning of this verse is obscure. Lewy (p. 147, n. 295) thinks Psellus, loc. cit., incorrectly inserted πατήρ here and suggests that the beginning of the line might have read instead: οὐ <μὲν γάρ> φόβον, etc. In Lewy's analysis, the verse is directed against the current magical belief that an invoked god inspired terror or fear.

ἐνθρώσκει: Compounds of θορεῖν are common in the Oracles; cf. frs. 34, 35, 37, 42, 76, 87. See, also, Theiler, 1942, p. 15 = 1966, p. 269.

πειθῶ: Cf. πειθηνίδι, fr. 81 (as descriptive of the Father's "will"). See Cremer, p. 17.

Fr. 15

3. πᾶς ἀγαθὸς θεός: Proclus here is commenting on Plato, Rep. II, 379 b-c to the effect that God is essentially good. According to Proclus, Plato's remarks must be expanded to include the notion that "every god is good," a view he then substantiates by quoting this verse from the Oracles. This Chaldean verse, however, is probably distinguishing between "good" or "true" gods who are helpful to mankind, and those spirits or demons who are evil and deceitful (particularly in the context of various theurgic rites). Cf. frs. 88-93 and notes; Iambl., De myst., III.31; Lewy, pp. 273-275 and n. 55.

4. νήψατε: This notion of "sobering up" is also found in the Hermetica (e.g., C.H. I.27; VII.1; 2) and Gnostic sources (e.g., Gos. Truth, NHC I, 22, 16-20). The general idea here is that those who are "intoxicated" by the world and its passions need to "sober up" and reflect on the true nature of reality. But cf. fr. 97, where the soul is said to be "drunk" on god, a metaphor often expanded to the idea of "sober drunkenness." In this regard, cf. Lewy, Sobria ebrietas, passim, who especially cites numerous references in the writings of Philo. Cf., also, Jonas, Gnostic Religion, pp. 68-73. Des Places would also now translate this expression as "sober up" ("degrissez-vous") rather than "abstain" ("jeûnez"); see "Notes," p. 322.

Fr. 16

1. τὸν ὑπερουράνιον τόπον: i.e., the intelligible world. Cf. Iambl., De myst., VIII.7: ὑπερουράνιων θεῶν; fr. 18: ὑπέρχοσμον; fr. 19 and 209: ὑπέρχοσμοίς.

2. θεοθρέμμονι: Lewy (p. 160, n. 355) cites Plato, Phaedrus, 247 d as the locus classicus of this term: θεοῦ διάνοια νῶ...τρεφόμενη. Cf. τροφή, fr. 17.

σιγή: "Silence" characterizes the supermundane "depth" or "abyss" where the Father dwells. Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 82; 2(4), 83, 85; 5(2), 22, 65; 8(9), 61; 9(1), 75. Cf., also, σίγα, fr. 132; Des Places, testimonia, p. 70, for additional parallels. In the Gnostic sources, σιγή often designates the female syzygy of the Highest God (who, in turn, is often called Abyss). See, e.g., Iren., Adv. Haer., 1.1; 2.1; Val. Exp., NHC XI, 22, 26. Des Places now suggests that fr. 16, in its usage of σιγή, is "closer" to a Gnostic milieu than he had previously thought; see "Notes," p. 323.

3. τῶν πατέρων: A reference either to the Father and Second Intellect (cf. fr. 22, 50 and notes) or to the rulers of the three worlds of Chaldean cosmology (cf. fr. 73 and notes). See, also, Lewy, p. 160 and n. 353; Theiler, 1942, pp. 9-12 = 1966, pp. 262-263.

Fr. 17

1. τῶ δὲ νοοῦντι: In the context of Proclus, a reference to the perceptive capacity of the gods and certain "wise men" (= the theurgists? Cf. Festugière, Tim., I, p. 46, n. 3). See, also, Lewy, pp. 160-161 and n. 355, who suggests that the gods in question are the νοεροὶ θεοί (based on Proclus, In Crat., 92, 12-14).

τροφή: Cf. θεοθρέμμονι, fr. 16.

Fr. 18

1. τὸν ὑπέρκοσμον πατρικὸν βυθόν: "Paternal Abyss" characterizes the noetic or "supermundane" home of the Father. Cf., e.g., Synesius, H. 1(3), 132: ἀκάμαντι βυθῶ; 189: βυθὸν ἄρρητον; 5(2), 27: βυθὸς πατρῶος; 9(1), 116: βυθὸν...θεολαμπῇ; 1(3), 411: βάθος αἰώνων. See, also, Lewy, p. 159, n. 35; Des Places, testimonia, p. 70, for additional parallels. In fr. 163, however, the terms βυθός/βάθος also designate the Material World. A similar equation is found in Plotinus as well, where both the One and matter are characterized in terms of absolute simplicity (e.g., Enn. VI.7.13.3-4). See Tardieu, "Oracles chaldaïques," pp. 205-209, who also cites Gnostic parallels to what he calls this "apophatic characteristic of high and low." Des Places now affirms that Chaldean usage of βυθός is closer to Gnostic usage than he had previously thought; see "Notes," p. 323.

νοοῦντες: Again, knowledge of the Highest God is a matter of intelligible perception (cf. e.g., frs. 17 and 19).

2. πρὸς αὐτούς: For Proclus, the "intellectual gods" (cf. notes to fr. 17). In Lewy's analysis (pp. 159-161), the Chaldeans did not distinguish between intellectual and intelligible gods (as did the later Neoplatonists), but asserted only the existence of planetary gods situated beneath Aion. However, these planetary gods, in Lewy's words, were "endowed with intellectual knowledge of the intelligible world" and thus were conceived of as "noetic entities."

ὁ ὕμνος: Cf. τὸν Παῖνα ἀείδειν, fr. 131.

Fr. 19

2. τόνδε...θεόν: A reference to the Paternal Intellect; see Lewy, p. 160, n. 354.

πᾶς νοῦς: i.e., "every divine mind" has the ability to perceive the Paternal Intellect; cf. fr. 18. From frs. 17-19, it can be inferred that ascent to the intellectual gods (or the Chaldean equivalent) imbued the soul with a similar noetic disposition, in preparation for the final "leading upward" towards the Father himself (as described in fr. 1).

Fr. 20

1-2. οὐ γὰρ ἄνευ νόος κτλ.: (Des Places' text mistakenly reads νοός.) This fragment suggests that the intelligible world of Ideas exists within the mind of the Second Intellect (νόος) and not outside. (Cf. fr. 8: νῶ μὲν κατέχειν τὰ νοητὰ.) Such a notion is consistent with second-century speculation about the ontological location of the Platonic forms. See Lewy, pp. 167 and n. 379; 322-324; Festugière, Rév., III, p. 56, n. 3; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 325, n. 1.

Fr. 20 bis

This fragment is neither cited by Kroll nor designated as oracular by Chaignet, but Lewy suggests the possibility; see p. 167, n. 379.

1-2. (ὁ πατήρ) νοητόν: Cf. τι νοητόν, fr. 1.

2. τὸ νοοῦν: The primary function of the Father is to "think" the intelligible world of Ideas. However, it is the Second Intellect who actively fashions the intelligible world on the model of these Ideas. Cf., esp., fr. 37.

Fr. 21

1. νοητῶς: Again, the reference is to the Father or First Intellect who is the intelligible source of all that exists. See Lewy, pp. 81 and n. 55; 333 and n. 75. Cf. Marius Victorinus, Adv. Ar. I, 50, 20: "universaliter omnimodis omnia." Hadot (Marius Victorinus, II, p. 852, ad not.) sees a reflection here of this particular fragment.

Fr. 22

3. νοῦς πατρός: Here, the Second or Demiurgic Intellect; cf. fr. 5 and 7. Festugière (Rév., III, p. 55) compares fr. 5, 7, and 22 with Numenius, fr. 12 (Des Places): τὸν μὲν πρῶτον θεὸν εἶναι ἔργων συμπάντων. Thus, the First God or Father remains removed from his creative "acts," which are the province of the Second Intellect.

εἶπε: The notion of speech as a creative "act" is more common in Oriental than Greek traditions. The best known example, of course, is the Biblical account of creation in Gen. 1. Note that Proclus, In Tim., loc. cit., l. 23, equates εἰπεῖν with νοεῖν.

εἰς τρία...τέμνεσθαι: This initial division would involve just the intelligible world. Cf. νοεραῖς τομαῖσιν, fr. 1; τμήσιος, fr. 179. Cf., also, ἐμερίσθησαν/μεμερισμένα, fr. 37.

4. <πρωτίστου πατρός>: Des Places has added πρωτίστου to Kroll's emendation of πατρός. (Cf. πρωτίστου πατρός, fr. 179, intro.) The reference here is to the Father or First Intellect.

5. οὐ: codd.; οὐ, cj. Des Places (following Bidez); ὤ, cj. Festugière (Rév., III, p. 55 and n. 3).

τὸ θέλειν κατένευσε: This expression reflects Il. 1, 524-530; 8, 175, where Zeus "nods" to indicate his "will." (See Lewy, p. 106, n. 165.) In the Chaldean system, "will" is a constituent of both the Father and the human soul. Cf. forms of βουλή in fr. 37, 77, 81, 107. Cf., also, νεύματι, fr. 44; Cremer, p. 102 ff. In the Gnostic and Hermetic literature, "will" is also an active, even hypostatized, aspect of God. Cf., e.g., Iren., Adv. Haer., 1, 29, 1; Gos. Truth, NHC I, 37, 18-34; C.H. I.8; 31; VII.5.

ἤδη: The idea of simultaneous thought and action is also reflected in fr. 25. Cf., also, C.H. I.14; X.2; XIII.19; Asclepius, 8; Ap. John, NHC II, 7, 4-9.

Fr. 23

1. (οἱ σίχοι χρησμοῦ): Didymus cites this verse as one of several oracles from different sources.

2. τὰ πάντα: Although forms of πᾶς are frequent in the Oracles, here (and in fr. 30, 53, 68) the substantive is best translated as "the All," a terminus technicus familiar to us from various Gnostic sources. (The Coptic form would be πτηρῳ.) In the Gnostic sources this term designates, as here, a general notion of universality as well as, more specifically, the hypostatized Aeons which, collectively, comprise the Gnostic pleroma. (See Logan, "The Meaning of the Term 'the All,'" pp. 203-208, who, in addition, includes the totality of the Gnostic "elect".)

τριάς: Here, the activity of the Second Intellect (understood triadically) whose "measures" are the Ideas. (See Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 261 and n. 2, who points out that the Ideas were also understood triadically in the Chaldean system.) It is the function of the Second Intellect to delimit or measure the All by actively projecting the Ideas onto the intelligible world. See Lewy, p. 108, n. 173; cf. p. 116. Lewy cites as a parallel a similar "oracle" quoted by Hermias, Phaedr., 248 a; p. 157 Couvreur: τριάς κατὰ πάντα μετροῦσα. Couvreur mistakenly identified this verse as Orphic; and so Kern, Orph. Fr. 310.

συνέχη: An allusion to the "connective" nature of this triad. Cf. fr. 24 and 30; δέμα, fr. 31.

κατὰ...μετροῦσα: tmesis; cf. πάντα μετροῦση, fr. 1; τὰ νοητὰ μετρεῖται, fr. 31.

Fr. 24

1. ἡ μέση δυνάς: In the context of Damascius, a reference to the median intelligible-and-intellectual order made up of the Connectors, Teletarchs, and Iynges. See Lewy, Exc. VII, pp. 483-484.

συνοχική: Cf. fr. 32, 80, 82, 177, 207.

τελεταρχική: Cf. fr. 86 and 177.

1 + 3. διορίζουσα...ἀρχήν...τέρμα...μέσα: The formula is Pythagorean. Cf., e.g., Arist., De caelo, A 1 268 a 10: καθάπερ γάρ φασι καὶ Πυθαγόρειοι τὸ πᾶν καὶ τὰ πάντα τοῖς τρισὶν ὥρισται· τελευτὴ γὰρ καὶ μέσον καὶ ἀρχὴ τὸν ἀριθμὸν ἔχει τὸν τοῦ παντός, ταῦτα δὲ τὸν τῆς τριάδος (as cited by Lewy, p. 109 and n. 174). Cf. also, Orph. Fr. 21 (Kern) re Zeus: ὁ μὲν δὴ θεός...ἀρχήν τε καὶ τελευτὴν καὶ μέσα τῶν ὄντων ἀπάντων ἔχων (= Plato, Laws, IV, 715 e).

3. τάξει ἀνάγκης: τάξει is equivalent to σειρά (cf. fr. 203) and refers to one of the "orders" or "chains" which link all aspects of the cosmos. Cf. Proclus, In Parm., 904, 12-18, which is a reflection of this fragment: ὁ δὲ εἰς πατρικὸς νοῦς πᾶσιν ἀφορίζει τὰ μέτρα τῆς μεθέξεως...ἀρχάς τε καὶ μέσα καὶ τέλη τῆς ἐκάστου τῶν εἰδῶν σειρᾶς προλαβὼν, καὶ μέχρι πόσου φθάνει ἀνάγκη τὴν ιδιότητα τὴν ἀφ' ἐκάστου καθήκουσαν.

Fr. 25

2. ἐνόησε: Analogous to εἶπε, fr. 22. Again, the idea here is one of simultaneous thought and action. See Lewy, pp. 180-181 and n. 19.

βροτὸς δὲ οἱ ἐψύχωτο: The Father, then, is the ultimate source of particular souls. Cf. fr. 115; Psellus, Hypotyp. 24. Elsewhere (fr. 51 and 53), "ensouling" is associated with the World Soul.

Fr. 26

Lewy, p. 106, n. 164, thinks this isolated verse from a hymn of Proclus (see Vogt, Hymni, fr. II, p. 84) is a Proclan "imitation" of the verse cited infra, fr. 27; and so Tardieu, Lewy², p. 680. But Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 96, n. 2, accepts its authenticity, as does Des Places. Although Proclus is clearly dependent on Chaldean terminology throughout his hymns, this would be the only instance of an entire verse cited verbatim. In addition, Lydus states only that the verse is Proclan, not Chaldean, in origin. As the verse stands, then, although inspired by the Oracles, it is most likely the finished creation of Proclus.

1. τὸν ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα: Another designation for the Father; see fr. 169 and notes.

2. μουνάδα: Cf. μονάς, fr. 11, 12, 27.

τριοῦχον: Cf. Damascius, I, 303, 23-25: καὶ εἰ προφῆνειεν ἐν ἑαυτῷ τὸ τριαδικὸν ἡνωμένον, πολλῶ μειζόνως τὸ ἐν μείνειεν τριοῦχον κτλ. Cf. also τριγλῶχινι, fr. 2 and notes. In the Gnostic sources, the expression ΠΑ ΤΩΑΜΤΕ ḤḌAM (and variants; see, e.g., Marsanes, NHC X, 6,19; 4,15-16; Allogenes, NHC XI, 45,13; BG 27,19-28,2) conveys the same idea. The Greek equivalent would be τριδύναμος (or τριδύναμις), a term which appears not only in the Gnostic sources but in Marius Victorinus as well (e.g. Adv. Ar. IV.21). Note that Hadot, op. cit. (cf. pp. 293-294 and n. 2), translates τριοῦχον as "triple-powered," based on Victorinus's use of τριδύναμος. See, also, Theiler, 1942, p. 12 = 1966, p. 265. In the Gnostic sources, however, the expression "triple-powered" is by no means used exclusively of the Highest God. See Pearson, Nag Hammadi Codices IX and X, pp. 266-268, ad not.; cf. pp. 245-246, for a rich discussion of this material.

Fr. 27

1. πατήρ-δύναμις-νοῦς: See fr. 4 and notes.

1-2. ὁ εἷς πατήρ ὁ πρὸ τῆς τριάδος: i.e., the Father in his monadic aspect.

3. παντὶ γὰρ ἐν κόσμῳ: Damascius, II, 87, 11-15, understands here the three worlds of Chaldean cosmology. For Proclus, Th. pl., 271, 14-15, it is a matter of ἐν ἐκάστῳ διακόσμῳ (of the intelligible-and-intellectual world).

τριάς, ἥς μονάς ἄρχει: Thus, the oracle establishes a monadic-triadic principle which informs every aspect of reality. See Lewy, pp. 106-107 and n. 164.

Fr. 28

1. τὰ νοητά: i.e., the Ideas. Cf. ibid., fr. 8, 31, 40, 108.

3. τῆσδε γὰρ ἐκ τριάδος: An allusion to the triadic nature of the Highest God; cf. ibid., fr. 29. See, also, Lewy (pp. 116-117 and n. 195), who points out that the later Neoplatonists understood this and related verses as suggestive of a divine Ennead consisting of a) the Paternal Monad with his Power and Intellect; b) a triad of "primordial" Ideas; c) a triad of "particular" Ideas. Although Lydus attributes this Ennead to the Chaldeans themselves (e.g., De mens., IV, 122; p. 159, 5-7 W.: θεὸς ὁ ἐννεάδος ἀριθμὸς ἐκ τριῶν τριάδων πληρούμενος καὶ τὰς ἀκρότητας τῆς θεολογίας κατὰ τὴν Χαλδαϊκὴν φιλοσοφίαν... ἀποσώζων; cf. Damascius, I, 299, 17: ἡ ὑμνουμένη ἐννεάς), an explicit Ennead cannot be attributed, with certainty, to the Oracles. The innovator here is undoubtedly Porphyry. See Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 262 and n. 1.

κόλποις: A frequent expression in the Oracles. Here, it designates the feminine (and thereby fecundating) power in which the Father "sows the All" (cf. μήτρα, fr. 30). Elsewhere, this term is especially associated with the fecundating power of the World Soul (e.g., fr. 32, 35, 37, 56, 96). For Synesius, κόλπος not only expresses the Father's generation of the Son (H. 1(3), 406; 4(6), 7), but his generation of "light," "mind," "soul" (H. 3(5), 29-30), as well as life in toto (H. 2(4), 195-207). A similar diversity of use is found in the Gnostic sources: e.g., Gos. Truth, NHC I, 24,10-11 (here, the Father's "bosom/womb" is "revealed" as the Holy Spirit); Ap. John, NHC II, 5,5 (here, Barbelo is referred to as the "womb of all things"); Gos. Eg., NHC III, 43,1 (here, the Father, Mother, and Son = "three ogdoads or powers" who issue from the Father's "bosom/womb"). In the last analysis, what is being expressed in all these sources is the notion of a bisexual or androgynous deity as the primogenitor of various aspects of creation.

ἔσπαρται: Cf. ἔσπειρεν, fr. 108; ἐνέσπειρεν, fr. 39 and notes.

Fr. 29

This verse continues the thought of fr. 28. Lewy, however (p. 179, n. 8), suggests (without explanation) that this verse may be a continuation of fr. 44. But this view is puzzling, in light of Lewy's interpretation of νεύματι in fr. 44 (for which, see notes ad loc.).

2. τῇσδε γὰρ ἐκ τριάδος: Cf. ibid., fr. 28.

πνεῦμα: Here, a likely allusion to the "Breath" contained in the World Soul. (In this regard, cf. πνεῦμα, fr. 35 and notes.) Des Places, however, (p. 128, following Theiler, 1942, p. 28 = 1966, p. 286), suggests an allusion to the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα or "vehicle" of the soul. But this is unlikely, as the soul's vehicle is acquired in its descent to earth (see fr. 61) and not fashioned by the Father in any direct sense.

ἐκέρασσεν: A reflection of the "mixing bowl" metaphor in Plato, Tim., 35 a. Cf. κεράσση, fr. 42; κράσας, fr. 44.

Fr. 30

2. πηγὴ τῶν πηγῶν: In the context of Damascius, a reference to the Highest God (αὐτοζῶον) as the ultimate origin or "Source" of all existence. Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 171; 2(4), 63: παγὰ παγῶν. Synesius continues his praise of God with a string of similar epithets: e.g., ἀρχῶν ἀρχά; ῥιζῶν ῥίζα; μονὰς μονάδων; ἀριθμῶν ἀριθμός; πάτερ πατέρων. Epithets of this type are common; see, e.g., Des Places, p. 128, for additional parallels. Lewy, however (p. 82 and n. 59), understands the Chaldean verse as referring specifically to the Father's δύναμις (and so Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 310 and n. 6). In this regard, cf. fr. 56, where it is Rhea, as World Soul, who is designated πηγή.

4. μήτρα: Again, a likely allusion to the Highest God as a bisexual deity. Cf. notes to δύναμις, fr. 4; κολποῖς, fr. 28.

συνέχουσα: This verb conveys the double sense of "contain" and "connect;" cf. συνέχη, fr. 23.

τά πάντα: Cf. ibid., frr. 23, 53, 68.

Fr. 31

1. τάξις: Cf. frr. 24, 110 and notes.

2. ἀμφοῖν: i.e., the Paternal Monad (cf., e.g., frr. 11 and 39) and Dyad (= Second Intellect; cf. frr. 8 and 12). Damascius equates the Monad and Dyad with the first and second intelligible triads of Proclus' system. See, e.g., Proclus,

Th. pl., III, 26; 91, 4-6, S.-W.; Lewy, pp. 107-108 and n. 170; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 261 and n. 2.

2-3. τριάδος...πρώτης οὔσης οὐ πρώτης: An allusion to the "measurable" triad of the Second Intellect. Cf. fr. 23, 24 and notes. The "truly" first triad is that of the Paternal Monad in its trinitarian aspect (cf. fr. 26), which cannot be measured in any way.

2. δέμα: A reference to the connective quality of the "measurable" triad. Cf. συνέχη, fr. 23 and notes.

3. τὰ νοητά: The Ideas; cf. ibid., fr. 8 and 108.

μετρεῖται: Cf. μετρούση, fr. 1; μετροῦσα, fr. 23.

Fr. 32

1. αὐτοζῶον: An equivalent term for πατρικὸς νοῦς. See Lewy, p. 83, n. 62; Festugière, Tim., II, p. 297 and n. 1. Cf. αὐτογένηθλος, fr. 39.

2. πυρὸς ζωηφόρου: This term describes the principle of life contained in the Paternal Intellect. Cf. ζωηφόριον πῦρ, fr. 65 and notes.

3. ζωογόνον: A regular epithet of Rhea-Hecate. Cf. ζωογόνω, fr. 54, intro.; ζωογόνου, fr. 56, intro. As a noetic entity, Proclus locates ἡ ζωογόνος θεά at the second level of the intellectual order. See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 484.

κόλπον: Cf. fr. 35, 37, 56, 96, where "womb" is similarly associated with the World Soul.

4. ἐπιρρεῖ: codd. Lewy, however (p. 83, n. 62), emends to προχέει based on a similar usage in fr. 56.

τοῖς συνοχεῦσιν: The "Connectors" are a class of noetic entities (= active Thoughts or Ideas of the Father) whose primary function is to conjoin the various parts of the Universe. Cf. fr. 80, 82, 177, 207; Lewy, pp. 129-132. The Connectors form a triad along with the Teletarchs (cf. fr. 86, 177) and Iynges (cf. fr. 76, 77). In Proclus' system, the συνοχεῖς are situated at the second level of the intellectual-and-intellectual order. See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 483; cf. Psellus, Hypotyp. 4.

5. ἀλκὴν...πυρὸς μέγα δυναμένοιο: Common to the Oracles as expressive of the Father's fiery essence. Cf. ἀλκῆς δύναμις, fr. 1, and the use of ἀλκή in fr. 49 and 82.

ζειδῶροι: Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 304; 3(5), 27.

Fr. 33

2 + 4. ἐργοτεχνίτης/τεχνίτης: These terms describe the demiurgic nature of the Second Intellect. Cf. τεχνίτης, fr. 5; ποιητής, fr. 68; Lewy, p. 113 and n. 185.

4. κόσμου...πυρίου: The Empyrean (= intelligible) World. In Chaldean cosmology there are three worlds: the Empyrean (or intelligible); Ethereal (or zone of the fixed stars and planets); Material (or sublunar world including earth). Cf., e.g., Proclus, In Tim., II, 57,9-12: τί οὖν; φαίη τις ἂν τῶν ἐκ τῆς ὑπερορίου θεοσοφίας (= Chaldean theology) ὠρμημένων καὶ τὰ πάντα διαιρουμένων εἰς ἐμπύριον αἰθέριον ὑλαῖον. Psellus, P.G., 122, 1149 c, further distinguishes three Ethereal and three Material Worlds (cf. fr. 57 and notes). Lewy (pp. 137-157; 376-377; 430-431) attempts to sort out the confusion here. See, also, discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 34

3. ἔνθεν: i.e., πηγὴν πηγῶν. Cf. πηγὴ τῶν πηγῶν, fr. 30.

γένεσεις...ὕλης: Cf. esp. Psellus, Hypotyp. 27: ἡ μὲν ὕλη πατρογενής ἐστι. This monistic understanding of creation contrasts, in particular, with the dualistic tendencies of Numenius and certain strains of Gnostic thought. See discussion in Introduction.

πολυποικίλου ὕλης: Lewy (p. 118 and n. 200; cf. pp. 111, n. 177, v. 10; 120, n. 204) equates this expression with κοσμοῦ σώματα in fr. 37 as a description of the "world-stuff" composed of the four elements. Cf. Proclus, In Tim., I, 388, 21: ἔνθεν ἄδην θρώσκει γένεσις πολυποικίλου ὕλης. (See Festugière, Tim., II, p. 254, n. 1.) Tardieu ("Oracles chaldaïques," p. 281) cites, analogously, Exc. Theod. 50,1: τῆς πολυμερούς καὶ ποικίλης ὕλης. See, also, fr. 9: multivarium aliud.

4. συρόμενος: Cf. συρομένην, fr. 63; σύρων, fr. 164; κατασύρων, fr. 70. Cf., also, Synesius, H. 8(9), 64: σύρων; 1(3), 307: κατασυρομέναις.

πρηστήρ: An allusion to the noetic Ideas which are projected from the Paternal Intellect like bolts of lightning. Cf. πρηστήρσιν, fr. 81 and 82; πρηστηροδόχοι and κεραυνοί, fr. 35; Synesius, H. 1(3), 161: πρηστηροκράτωρ. The imagery undoubtedly goes back to the vision of Zeus hurling his thunderbolts. See Lewy, pp. 118-119 and n. 200.

πυρὸς ἄνθος: Here, an oblique reference to Hecate as the "girdling flower of fire" (see fr. 35; cf. fr. 37 and 49), the cosmic equivalent of the νόου ἄνθος (fr. 1). See, also, Lewy, p. 92, n. 100.

5. κόσμων ἐνθρώσκων κοιλωμάσι: The "hollows of the worlds" are the planetary spheres whose corporeal element "obscures" or "dims" (ἀμυδροῖ) the "flower of fire." See Lewy, pp. 118, n. 200; 126 and n. 228. Cf. κόσμοις ἐνθρώσκουσαι, fr. 76; κόσμοις ἐνθρώσκον, fr. 87.

6. τὸ κάτω: An allusion to the world of matter. Cf. fr. 163-164.

ἀκτῖνας ἀγής: i.e., the "rays" of the sun which originate in the noetic fire of the Father. Tardieu ("Oracles chaldaïques," p. 202) equates this term with the "spark of soul" (cf. fr. 44) which is akin to the noetic fire. Cf., similarly, ἀκτίς, Treat. Res., NHC I, 43,31; Paraph. Shem, NHC VII, 4,5-6. Cf., also, αὐγῆς, fr. 35; αὐγὰς, fr. 115.

Fr. 35

1. ὁ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα: Cf. fr. 169 and notes.

τὴν ἑβδομάδα: For Proclus, the νοερά τάξις consisting of 1) ὁ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα; 2) Ἐκάτη; 3) ὁ δις ἐπέκεινα; 4-6) οἱ τρεῖς ἀμειλικτοί; 7) ὁ ὑπεζωκός. See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 484.

2. κατὰ μέθεξιν: This doctrine of "participation" is Platonic in origin; e.g., Parm. 132 d: ἡ μέθεξις τοῖς ἄλλοις...τῶν εἰδῶν.

3. τοῦδε: i.e., ὁ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα.

ἐκθρώσκουσιν: Cf. ἐξέθορον, fr. 37; ἔκθορε, fr. 42.

ἀμειλικτοί κεραυνοί: A vivid image of the noetic Ideas proceeding from the Father (or "Once Transcendent"). Cf., analogously, πρηστήρ, fr. 34; πρηστήρσιν, fr. 81 and 82. Cf., also, ἀμειλίκτου πυρός, fr. 36. In Lewy's words: "The attribute ἀμειλικτός signifies that the Ideas are characterized as ἀμειλίκτοι δεσμοί (Hesiod, Theog. 658) which 'bind matter in forms.'" (See p. 119, n. 201; cf. p. 121, n. 209.) As noetic entities, Psellus (Hypotyp. 10) locates the "Implacables" just above the cosmic triad of Faith, Truth, Love (cf. fr. 46). In Pro-clus' system, the ἀμειλίκτοι are equated with the ἄχραντοι θεοί and situated at the next to lowest point of the intellectual order.

4. πρηστηροδόχοι κόλποι: A reference to Hecate (= World Soul) as the receptacle of the Ideas.

παμφεγγέος: Des Places' text mistakenly reads παραφεγγέος (but now corrected; see "Notes," p. 324). Light/fire are characteristic of the intelligible/Empyrean World. Cf. forms of φέγγος/φέγγειν in fr. 39, 122, 125, 219. See, also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 532: νοερὸν φέγγος. Cf. H. 2(4), 163; 3(5), 43; 5(2), passim; 9(1), 100.

αὐγῆς: Cf. αὐγὰς, fr. 115 and 213.

5. πατρογενεὺς Ἑκάτης: Cf. πατρογενὲς φαός (= Aion), fr. 49; ἡ ὕλη πατρογενής, Psellus, Hypotyp. 27. In the last analysis, the Father is the source of all reality, be it Empyrean, Ethereal, or Material. As for Hecate, she not only functions as World Soul in the Chaldean system (e.g., fr. 6, 51-53, 56), as well as δύναμις between the First and Second Intellects (e.g., fr. 4), but is invoked as an oracle-giving goddess (fr. 146-148; cf. fr. 219; 221-224) and is said to be Mistress of demons (fr. 91).

ὑπεζωκὸς πυρὸς ἄνθος: Epithet of Hecate as the "girdling" World Soul. Cf. ὑπεζωκὸς, fr. 6 and notes.

6. πνεῦμα: Here, the "breath of life" which fills up the World Soul. According to Lewy (p. 122), "wombs," "girdling fire," and "breath" are all aspects of the World Soul which combine with the Ideas (as "thunderbolts") to perfect the sensible world. Cf. Chaignet, Proclus: Comm. Parm., I, p. 180, n. 6, who sees an allusion here to the πνεῦμα ἄπειρον of the Pythagoreans.

πόλων πυρίων: For Lewy, ibid., the four cardinal points situated in the region of the fixed stars; for Chaignet, ibid., "des mondes du feu." Cf. πόλον, fr. 226; Des Places, pp. 129-130.

Fr. 36

1. τὴν πρωτίστην πηγὴν: Cf. πρώτη πατρὸς πηγῇ, fr. 37; <πρωτίστου πατρὸς>, fr. 22.

3. νοῦς πατρός: Here, apparently, the Paternal or First Intellect. Cf. ibid., fr. 37; πατρὸς νοῦ, fr. 134; πατρικὸς νόος, fr. 39, 49, 108, 109.

ἄρράτοις...ἰθυντῆρσιν: A probable allusion to the orderly circuits of the stars and planets (Des Places, p. 130). Lewy (pp. 135-136 and n. 260) equates this expression with κόσμων κοιλώμασι in fr. 34.

ἐποχοῦμενος: Cf. ἐποχεῖσθαι, fr. 193. Cf., also, Numenius, fr. 2 (Des Places): ἐποχοῦμενον ἐπὶ τῇ οὐσίᾳ; Plotinus, Enn. I.1.8.9: ἐποχοῦμενον τῇ νοητῇ φύσει. In the case of Plotinus, Armstrong, Intelligible Universe, p. 96, suggests that this term conveys the sense of "transcending, but in contact."

4. ἄγναμπτον: Cf. ἀχαμπεῖς, fr. 79.

στράπτουσιν: Cf. στράπτουσα, fr. 1; στράπτουσαι, fr. 37.

ἀμειλίκτου πυρός: Equivalent to the ἀμειλίκτοι κεραυνοί, fr. 35.

Fr. 37

2. νοῦς πατρός: Again, a reference to the Father or First Intellect; cf. ibid.; fr. 36 and notes. See, also, Festugière, Rév., III, pp. 55-56.

ἐρροίζησε: Cf. ῥοιζοῦνται, infra, l. 10 (= v. 9); ῥοῖζον, fr. 107; ῥοιζαῖον, fr. 146; Synesius, H. 2(4), 35: ῥοῖζος. Lewy (p. 110 and n. 177) equates this term with ἔβλυσε, infra, l. 16 (= v. 15).

ἀκμάδι βουλῇ: Cf. βουλαῖς ἀφθέγοις, fr. 77; πειθηνίδι βουλῇ, fr. 81; ἀιδίῳ βουλῇ, fr. 107; νεύματι θείῳ, fr. 44; τὸ θέλειν κατένευσε, fr. 22 (and notes). "Will," then, like "Power" and "Intellect," functions as a hypostatized faculty of the Highest God. Cf. Synesius, who often conflates "Will" with the function of "Power" in a Christian context: e.g., H. 2(4), 96-98: γόνιμον βουλάν,/μεσάταν ἀρχάν,/ἀγίαν πνοιάν. See Lewy, esp. pp. 79-80 and n. 49; Cremer, p. 102 ff.

3. παμμόρφους: Cf. πάμορφον, fr. 186 bis.

πηγῆς μιᾶς ἄπο: Cf. μία πηγῇ, infra, l. 9 (= v. 8); πηγῆς πατρικῆς ἄπο, infra, l. 14 (= v. 13). This image of the Father or First Intellect as "Source" (cf. πηγῇ τῶν πηγῶν, fr. 30) is also found in both Gnostic and Hermetic literature; e.g., BG, 26,17; C.H. XI.3

ἄπο πᾶσαι: cf. Schneek ap. Kroll (and so Lewy and Des Places). This reading is also confirmed by the Latin text of Moerbeke (C. Steel, I, p. 146, 8): a fonte autem uno omnes prodierunt. Morrow-Dillon, however (p. 168), apparently base their translation on Cousin (ἀποπτάσαι): "they (the Ideas) leapt out in flight." But the use of ἄπο here as a postpositive is confirmed by a similar construction in v. 13 (πηγῆς πατρικῆς ἄπο) and fr. 213, v. 1 (χθονίων παθέων ἄπο).

4. ἐξέθορον: Cf. ἐκθρόσκουσιν, fr. 35; ἐκθορε, fr. 42.

πατρόθεν...βουλή τε τέλος τε: Again, the image is that of simultaneous thought and action. Cf. fr. 22 and 25; see Lewy, p. 111, n. 177, v. 3. Cf., also, πατρόθεν, fr. 77 and 130.

5. ἐμερίσθησαν: "Division" is characteristic of the Ideas. Cf. μεμερισμένοι, infra, l. 10 (= v. 9); τομαῖσιν, fr. 1; τέμεσθαι, fr. 22; τμήσιος, fr. 179.

νοερῷ πυρί: Here, apparently the Second Intellect. But cf. πυρὸς νοεροῦ, fr. 81; Festugière, Rév., III, pp. 56, n. 3; 57, n. 1.

6. ἄλλας νοεράς: i.e., the "particular" Ideas which inform the sensible world. See Lewy, pp. 105-117.

7. νοερὸν τύπον ἄφθιτον: i.e., the "primordial" Ideas (cf. ἀρχεγόνους ἰδέας, infra, l. 16 = v. 15) thought by the Paternal Intellect.

11. ῥηγνύμεναι κόσμου περὶ σώμασιν: Lewy (pp. 118-119 and n. 201) compares this image with that of the Ideas as ἀμελικοὶ κεραυνοί: "The underlying conception is that these Ideas, by virtue of their noetic fire, exercise upon the primal matter of the world an action similar to that of the smith who melts iron in fire and moulds it with a hammer." See, also, Proclus, In Tim., III, 103, 13, who repeats this line and comments on it as a reference to the "particular" or "demiurgic" Ideas.

κόλπους: The "wombs" of the World Soul which receive the Ideas. Cf., esp., fr. 96.

12. σμήνεσιν: The bee simile reflects Il. 2,87-90.

13. στράπτουσαι: Cf. fr. 1 and 36.

14. ἔννοιαι νοεραί: i.e., the Ideas. Cf. ἔννοια πατρός, fr. 38; πατρικὰς διανοίας, fr. 53.

15. δρεπτόμεναι πυρὸς ἄνθος: Cf. δρεφάμενος νόου ἄνθος, fr. 49 (here, applied to Aion).

ἄκοιμήτου χρόνου: According to Lewy (p. 105, n. 162), Chronos is equivalent to Aion in the Chaldean system. Dodds, however ("New Light," p. 266 = Lewy², p. 696), disagrees, pointing out that citations of χρόνος in the fragments suggest an independent deity. Cf. ἀπέραντον χρόνον, fr. 39; χρόνου χρόνος, fr. 185; cf., also, Synesius, H. 8(9), 63: ἀκαμαντοπόδας χρόνος. Proclus certainly makes this distinction; e.g., El. Th., prop. 53: πάντων τῶν αἰωνίων προϋπάρχει ὁ αἰὼν, καὶ πάντων τῶν κατὰ χρόνον ὁ χρόνος προϋφίστηεν. Elsewhere

(In Tim., III, 20, 22-23; cf. fr. 199), Proclus states that οἱ θεουργοί regard Χρόνος as a god. Similarly, in C.H. XI.5, Time and Eternity are also distinguished, but in an anagogic context: καὶ πάντα χρόνον ὑπεράρας Αἰών γενοῦ, καὶ νοήσεις τὸν θεόν. This Time/Eternity distinction, of course, ultimately goes back to Plato, Tim., 37 d, where Time is understood as an "image" of Eternity. However, a clear and precise distinction between Chronos and Aion cannot be affirmed with certainty for the Chaldean system. See, also, Dodds' discussion, Proclus: El. Th., pp. 228-229.

16. ἔβλυσε: Cf. βλύζει, fr. 51 (here, connected with Hecate).

17. αὐτοτελής: Cf. ἐξετέλεσε, fr. 7; οὐ ἀτελής, fr. 13. Cf., also, αὐτογένεθλος, fr. 39 and Des Places, "Notes," p. 324.

Fr. 38

3. ἔννοια πατρός: The "particular" Ideas of the Second Intellect. Cf. ἔννοια νοεραί, fr. 37; πατρικὰς διανοίας, fr. 53; Psellus, P.G., 122, 1135 a: (οἱ Χαλδαῖοι) ἰδέας νομίζουσι νῦν μὲν τὰς τοῦ πατρὸς ἐννοίας (as cited by Lewy, p. 280, n. 84).

ἑμὸν: The speaker is Hecate. The verse states that her place in the intelligible hierarchy is after the particular Ideas of the Second Intellect, thus conforming here to the Neoplatonic position of the World Soul. Cf., esp., fr. 53; Lewy, p. 91 and n. 97; Hadot, Porphyre, II, p. 71, n. 2.

εἰλυμένον πῦρ: A probable allusion to Hecate as the "girdling fire;" cf. ὑπεζωκώς, fr. 6; ὑπεζωκὸς πυρὸς ἄνθος, fr. 35. Lewy (pp. 91-92 and n. 98) translates "winding fire" and points to a serpentine image which draws on a traditional association of Hecate with snakes. Cf., in this regard, fr. 55.

Fr. 39

3. ἔργα νοήσας: i.e., the intelligible "works" or model of the world "thought" by the Father. Cf. πατὸς ἔργα τὰ νοητά, fr. 40.

πατρικὸς νόος: Cf. fr. 49, 108, 109. Elsewhere (e.g., fr. 37 and 134), νοῦς πατρός is used in an analogous sense. See, also, Lewy, p. 79, n. 48.

αὐτογένεθλος: Cf. αὐτοζών, fr. 32, intro.; αὐτοτελής, fr. 37 (expressions which are similarly descriptive of the Highest God). This notion of "self-generation" is also a common feature of various Gnostic systems, especially the term αὐτογενής. Cf., e.g., Gos. Eg., NHC III/IV passim; Marsanes, NHC X, 3,26; Allogenes, NHC XI, 46,11; 51,26; 58,12; Pistis Sophia, I,1; 28. Although there is a general tendency in the Gnostic systems to designate the second principle as "self-generated" and the first principle as "ungenerated" or "unbegotten" (cf., esp., the triad ἀγέννητον, αὐτογενές, γεννητόν of the Peratae as reported by Hipp., Haer. 5.12; see, also, Disc. 8-9, NHC VI, 57,13-15: ἀγέννητος, αὐτογέννητος, γεννητόν), this is by no means a hard and fast rule. In this regard, cf. Cod. Bruce, Untitled, e.g., chs. 1, 7, and 22, where the terms αὐτογενής/αὐτογέννητος designate the Highest God, but in, e.g., chs. 2, 6, and 12, the similar αὐτοπάτωρ is descriptive of a lesser being. Cf., also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 145-147 re the Supreme God: πατέρων πάντων/πάτερ αὐτοπάτωρ/προπάτωρ ἀπάτωρ; Orph. Hymn 10.10 (ed. Athanassakis) re Φύσις as αὐτοπάτωρ and ἀπάτωρ; Iambl., De myst., VIII.3 re the second principle: αὐτοπάτορος αὐτογόνου. Although this wide diversity of use suggests that this vocabulary of "self-generation" was simply "in the air" during the period of the Empire, Whittaker ("Self-Generating Principles," pp. 176-189) argues that the principle mode of transmission at this time may well have been via oracular literature (such as the Chaldean Oracles). Since this "self-generating" language can be traced back to some of the choral odes of the Greek tragedians (e.g., Sophocles, OC, 698; see Whittaker, pp. 185-186), later transmission via the "poetical" mode of oracles (Chaldean and otherwise) is an attractive argument.

4. ἐνέσπειρεν: Cf. ἔσπαρται, fr. 28; ἔσπειρεν, fr. 108. Cf., also, Numenius, fr. 13 (Des Places), where the First God is depicted as a "Sower" (ὁ μὲν γε ὦν σπέρμα...σπείρει), the Second God as a "Planter." (See Festugière, Rév., III, pp. 44 and n. 2; 57 and n. 1.) This "sowing" imagery is also found passim in the hymns of Synesius and, of course, is a common biblical metaphor as well.

δεσμὸν πυριβριθῇ ἔρωτος: Like the Connectors (cf. fr. 32, 80, 82, 177, 207), Eros functions as a "binding" force in the Universe whose "fiery" nature derives from the Father or Primordial Fire. Cf. δεσμῷ ἔρωτος and πῦρ συνδέσμιον, fr. 42; ἔρωτα συνδετικόν, fr. 44. Cf., also, Orig. World, NHC II, 109,4, where Eros is described as "fire from light." See Tardieu, Trois Mythes Gnostiques, pp. 149-150. See, also, Lewy, pp. 126-129 and n. 232; Geudtner, pp. 46-27; Des Places, "Notes," pp. 324-325.

6. χρόνον ἀπέραντον: Cf. ἀκοιμήτου χρόνου, fr. 37 and notes.

7. πατὴρ νοερῷ φέγγει: Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 523: νοερὸν φέγγος; Proclus, In Tim., I, 348, 22-23: τῷ νοερῷ φέγγει τοῦ πατρός, ὡς φησι καὶ τὸ λόγιον; Th. pl., I, 24; 106, 13 S.-W.: τοῦ νοεροῦ φέγγους.

9. κόσμου στοιχεῖα: An allusion either to the stars (Lewy, p. 127, n. 232; cf. Des Places, pp. 130-131) or the four elements (Proclus, loc. cit.).

Fr. 40

2. ἀρχάς: The "world-forming Ideas" of the Second or Demiurgic Intellect. (See Lewy, p. 115 and n. 190; cf. fr. 49 and 74.) The Ideas are called "Principles" because they derive from the Paternal Principle (πατρικῆς ἀρχῆς, fr. 13). Kroll, loc. cit., equates this term with the Young Gods of Plato, Tim., 42 a.

πατὴρ ἔργα νοήσασαι τὰ νοητά: i.e., the "primordial" Ideas or intelligible model thought by the Father. Cf. ἔργα νοήσας πατρικὸς νόος, fr. 39.

3. αἰσθητοῖς ἔργοις καὶ σώμασιν ἀμφεχάλυσαν: A description of the particular Ideas informing matter. Cf. fr. 68.

Fr. 41

4. ταῖσθητα νοούσης/ὡς ἐπαφητά: The Chaldean context of this verse is obscure. Lewy (p. 115, n. 190) sees an allusion to fr. 40. In the context of Proclus, the verse is connected with the mediating activity of the World Soul. (Cf. Festugière, Tim., III, p. 344, n. 1, who finds the entire passage unclear.) Elsewhere, Proclus understands both "knowledge" (γνώσις) and "contact" (συναφή) as stages in prayer. See In Tim., I, 211, 8 ff.; cf. fr. 121 and notes.

Fr. 42

2. δεσμῷ ἔρωτος ἀγῆτοῦ: Cf. πῦρ συνδέσμιον, infra, l. 3 (= v. 1); δεσμὸν πυριβριθῇ ἔρωτος, fr. 39 and notes.

ἐκ νόου ἔκθορε πρῶτος: Eros is the first issue from the Paternal Intellect, even prior to the Ideas, as his binding quality is an essential ingredient if the Ideas are to function properly in their capacity as connective entities. See Lewy, pp. 127-128 and n. 233.

3-4. κέρασση πηγαίους κρατῆρας: A quasi-mythological image depicting Eros as actively working on (or "mixing") the Ideas (= "Source Craters"). Cf. ἐκέρασεν, fr. 29 and notes; κράσας, fr. 44.

4. πυρὸς ἄνθος: Cf. ibid., frs. 34, 35, 27.

Fr. 43

1. ἔρωτι (μὲν) βαθεῖ: codd.; τὰ βαθή, cj. Saffrey-Westerink, who suggest that the βαθεῖ of the codd. is a corruption "by iotacism" caused by the falling away of τά and the attraction of ἔρωτι; see notes ad loc. But as Des Places notes (p. 131), the substitution of τὰ βαθή violates the meter.

2. ἀναπλήσας τὴν ψυχὴν: codd.; ἀναπλώσας τῆς ψυχῆς, cj. Saffrey-Westerink (based on the ms. archetype). Thus, argue S.-W., the object of ἀναπλώσας would be τὰ βαθή, and the expression would parallel that of fr. 112: οἰγνύσθω ψυχῆς βάθος ἄμβροτον. Although this is an excellent conjecture, the problem of meter still necessitates the reading of the codices (and so the edition of Portus). In the context of Proclus, the soul is "filled with deep love" in an anagogic context. Cf. fr. 44; Lewy, p. 128 and n. 238.

Fr. 44

3. ψυχαῖον σπινθῆρα: The notion of a "soul spark" which is akin to the Divine is pervasive in the Platonic tradition. See, e.g., Tardieu, "ΨΥΧΑΙΟΣ ΣΠΙΝΘΗΡ," pp. 225-255 for numerous parallels. Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 562: σπινθῆρα νόον. In the Chaldean system, the "spark of soul" is equivalent to the "fire/flame of mind" (e.g., frs. 1, 34, 35, 37, 42, 49).

κράσας: Cf. ἐκέρασεν, fr. 29; κεράσση, fr. 42.

4. νώ; νεύματι; ἔρωτα: The problem here is νεύματι. Schol. paris. gr. (loc. cit.) has πνεύματι (which Kroll had already conjectured; and so Festugière, Rév., III, pp. 57-58). On the basis of this evidence, Saffrey ("Nouveaux Oracles chaldaïques," p. 62) affirms πνεύματι as the correct reading. But Saffrey then does not make it clear whether he understands the fragment as referring to the composition of the World Soul or the human soul. Kroll argued for the former, as did Festugière, the latter identifying "Breath" (πνεύματι) with Eros (and, thus, suggesting a four-fold hierarchy in the Chaldean system; i.e., Father, Intellect, Breath-Eros, Hecate-World Soul). But both Theiler and Lewy understand the oracle in terms of the human soul. Theiler, however, (see "Porphyrios und Augustin," 1933, pp. 51-52 = 1966, pp. 224-225), conjectures νώματι (= νοήματι) and sees a probable influence on the mens, amor, notitia triad of Augustine (as mediated through Porphyry). Hadot ("L'image de la Trinité," pp. 436-437) agrees with Theiler. But Lewy (I think rightly; see p. 180 and cf. p. 179, n. 8) prefers to keep the reading of Lydus and sees Kroll's and Theiler's conjectures as "unnecessary." In Lewy's summation (p. 180): "The Spark gives it (sc. the human soul) immortal life, the Intellect, the ability to think divine things, Will, the decision to descend to earth and to return from there to the realm of the noetic beings; finally, Eros, who binds together the parts of the soul, keeps alive the nostalgia for the divine." (Des Places, pp. 131-132, also keeps the reading of Lydus, but is then uncertain as how to interpret the oracle.)

But the oracle must refer to the human soul. If this is granted, then the reading πνεύματι becomes problematic, as this term is elsewhere identified with the soul's vehicle (cf. fr. 104 and notes) which is acquired in the soul's descent to earth (cf. fr. 61 and notes) and not as the result of any direct act on the part of the Father, which would be the case if πνεύματι is retained here. (Cf. Tardieu, "ΨΥΧΑΙΟΣ ΣΠΙΝΘΗΡ," pp. 243-245, who would also keep the reading πνεύματι and thus see ψυχή, νοῦς, and πνεῦμα as components of the human soul analogous to a similar triad of soul elements found in various Gnostic sources. But πνεῦμα, as a Gnostic term, is understood as the "spiritual" element of the soul (its highest part), not as the soul's "breath" or vehicle, as is the case with the Oracles.) Thus the evidence from paris. gr. is not conclusive. The copyist most likely miscopied Lydus' mss. here, and did not (as Saffrey suggests), find it "elsewhere" (either in the "original collection" of the Oracles or in a "lost citation" of another Neoplatonist). Such conjectures are unwarranted.

5. συνδετικόν: Cf. συνδέσμιον, fr. 42.

ἐπιβήτορα: Cf. ἐπιβήτορες, fr. 216.

Fr. 45

2. πνιγμόν: The image is that of being "stifled" by the passions of the body (τὸν ὑβριστὴν ἔρωτα) under the influence of evil demons. See Lewy, pp. 264-265 and n. 17.

ἔρωτος ἀληθοῦς: This "true love" applies to the intelligible world. See Festugière, Rép., III, p. 305, n. 2.

Fr. 46

2. πίστιν καλήθειαν καὶ ἔρωτα: This triad comprises the chief virtues of the Chaldean system. As cosmic entities, Psellus (Hypotyp. 11) locates this triad just below the ἀμειλικτοί. Lewy (pp. 144-148 and notes 291-295; see, also, Cremer, pp. 56-60; 139-143) equates each of these virtues with the three Teletarchs: i.e., Faith with the Material Teletarch; Truth with the Ethereal Teletarch; Love with the Empyrean Teletarch. As such, each of these cosmic virtues has an added anagogic function (cf. fr. 48 and notes), as these three Rulers aid the ascent of the soul (cf. frs. 85 and 86). In this light, these Chaldean virtues should not be confused, e.g., with the Pauline triad of spiritual virtues (Faith, Hope, Charity). See discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 47

2. ἐλπίς: This is a fourth virtue which probably formed a tetrad with Faith, Truth, and Love. Cf., e.g., Porphyry, Ad Marc. 24, who designates πίστις, ἀλήθεια, ἔρωτος, ἐλπίς, as τέσσαρα στοιχεῖα. (Proclus, In Tim., I, 212, 21-22, also adds ἐλπίς to the verse cited supra, fr. 46.) In addition, Lewy (p. 147 and notes 296-298) suggests that this virtue may have an eschatological referent; i.e., the initiate into the Chaldean rites "hopes" (as in the terminology of the Mysteries) for a blessed after-life.

πυρρόχοτος: As a cosmic virtue, Hope ultimately derives from the Primal Fire or First Intellect (i.e., ἀπὸ νοῦ κατιούσαν). Cf., also, πυρρόχον, fr. 65.

Fr. 48

1. ἐν τρισὶ τοῖσδε: i.e., in the three virtues of fr. 46.

κυβερνᾶται τε καὶ ἔστι: In the context of Proclus, these three virtues are not only instrumental in founding the universe, but are responsible for turning all things back to the Divine. This is particularly the case with Eros: "Proclus' account of love...distinguishes two forms of love; the normal, Platonic 'ascending' form, motivating lower principles to aspire toward their superiors, and a 'descending' or 'providential' form, prompting these superiors to care for their products" (see Wallis, Neoplatonism, p. 154). Proclus' distinction, of course, derives from the Oracles; cf. frs. 42-44.

2-3. διὰ τῆς τριάδος ταύτης κτλ.: For Proclus, then, the three virtues perform a unifying or theurgic function. Cf., e.g., Th. pl., I, 25; 113,3-8, S.-W.: πίστις καὶ ἀλήθεια καὶ ἔρως. Σώσεται δὲ πάντα διὰ τούτων καὶ συνάπτεται ταῖς πρωτουργοῖς αἰτίαις, τὰ μὲν διὰ τῆς ἐρωτικῆς μανίας, τὰ δὲ διὰ τῆς θείας φιλοσοφίας, τὰ δὲ διὰ τῆς θεουργικῆς δυνάμεως, ἡ κρείττων ἐστὶν ἀπάσης ἀνθρωπίνης σωφροσύνης καὶ ἐπιστήμης. However, unlike the Oracles, Proclus sees πίστις (not ἔρως) as the highest unifying or theurgic virtue. Cf., In Alc., loc. cit., l. 13: ἡ πίστις ἰδρύουσα τῶν ὄντων ἕκαστον ἐν τῷ ἀγαθῷ. See, also, O'Neill, Proclus: Alc. I, p. 33 and n. 106; Rosan, Philosophy, pp. 214-215; Rist, Plotinus, pp. 231-246.

Fr. 49

1. πατρογενὲς φῶς: A designation for Aion (or Eternity) who functions as the motion (= light) of the Highest God. (See Lewy, p. 101.) Lewy equates Aion with Chronos throughout the Chaldean system, but such an equation is problematic; see ἀκοιμήτου χρόνου, fr. 37 and notes. For Proclus, Aion was equated with the δύναμις or second moment of the Father (as a triadic Monad) and situated at the level of the second intelligible triad. See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 483. Cf., also, Lydus, De mens., II, 12; 36, 13-14 W.: τὸ ἀρχέτυπον εἶδος τοῦ νοητοῦ καὶ πατρογενοῦς αἰῶνος. See Hadot, Porphyre, I, pp. 385-386 and n. 1. Cf. πατρογενοῦς Ἑκάτης, fr. 35.

2. τὸ ἐνοποιὸν φῶς: Cf. (τὸ) ὄλον φῶς, fr. 59.

3. ἀλκῆς: Cf., esp., fr. 1, 2, 32, 82.

4. δρεψάμενος νόου ἄνθος: Cf. δρεπτόμεναι πυρὸς ἄνθος, fr. 37.

πατρικὸν νοῦν: Cf. fr. 39, 108, 109.

5. πηγαῖς: i.e., the sum of the Ideas considered as a whole; cf. πηγαίους κρατήρας, fr. 42. See Lewy, p. 111, n. 178.

ἀρχαῖς: i.e., the particular or divided world-shaping Ideas; cf. fr. 40; κρηνήϊος ἀρχή, fr. 74.

6. δινεῖν: Aion's function here is to keep the Ideas in constant motion. See Lewy, p. 100 and n. 143.

αἰεῖ τε μένειν ἀόκνῳ στροφάλιγγι: Cf. ἀκοιμήτῳ στροφάλιγγι, fr. 87, where this same expression applies to the Iynges (which are equated with the Ideas in the Chaldean system). Cf., also, στρόφαλον, fr. 206 and notes; μένειν αἰεὶ τῇ ἀόκνῳ στροφάλιγγι, fr. 12 (Damascius' commentary).

Fr. 50

2. μέσσον τῶν πατέρων: Festugière, Rév. III, p. 57 (based on Neoplatonic exegesis), understands Hecate's position here as situated between the Paternal and Demiurgic Intellects (and thus equivalent to the δύναμις of the primordial triad); cf. τῶν πατέρων, fr. 16. Cf., also, Proclus, In Tim., II, 129, 25-27: μέσσην γὰρ καὶ ἐν τοῖς θεοῖς ἔχει χώραν ἢ τῆς ψυχῆς αἰτία θεός, ὡς δοκεῖ καὶ τοῖς θεολόγοις συναγωγὸς οὖσα τῶν δύο πατέρων. Lewy, however, (p. 142 and n. 283), understands τῶν πατέρων here as referring to the "Rulers" or "Fathers" of the three worlds. In this context, he identifies Hecate with the moon: "Hecate is named instead of the moon, her intramundane abode. The verse must, accordingly, be understood as identifying the 'center' of the moon with the 'midmost' of the three 'Fathers' (cf. fr. 73), that is to say, with the Ruler of the sun." Tardieu ("Oracles chaldaïques," pp. 214-215) appropriates both interpretations and demonstrates how the metaphysical interpretation (Father/Power/Intellect) is based on the physical model (Empyrean/Ethereal/Material Worlds). But to conclude, as does Tardieu, that the Chaldean structure is dependent on a similar Valentinian model is surely rash. A common Middle Platonic milieu best accounts for similarities here.

Ἑκάτης κέντρον: For Proclus, the "center of Hecate" designates ἡ ζωογόνος θεά (cf. fr. 32), the second term of Proclus' intellectual order. See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 484; cf. p. 142, n. 283. Elsewhere in the Oracles, κέντρον is associated with the sun; e.g., frs. 70, 111, 167. Cf., also, Synesius, esp. H. 2(4), 99-100; 3(5), 65, where κέντρον is identified with the Holy Spirit as πνοιά (= Chaldean δύναμις).

Fr. 51

2. ἡ πηγὴ τῶν ψυχῶν: Here, πηγὴ designates the World Soul (= Hecate). Cf. ibid., fr. 56.

3. δεξιτερῆς μὲν γὰρ λαγόνος περὶ χήραμα χόνδρων: The image is obscure. Lewy (pp. 88-89 and n. 83) suggests an allusion to Hecate's statue on which hollows were depicted on both hips. Cf. Proclus, In Tim., II, 260, 24-261, 15; Festugière, Tim., III, p. 304 and n. 3. See, also, Lewy, pp. 361-364 re the symbolic interpretation of statues.

4. βλύζει: Cf. ἔβλυσε, fr. 37.

5. ἐμψυχοῦσα: "Ensouling" is characteristic of Hecate; cf. ψυχοῦσα, fr. 53. In fr. 25, however, ἐφύχωτο is attributed to the Father, the ultimate source of all generation.

φάος πῦρ αἰθέρα κόσμους: Simplicius (In phys., 613, 1-5) equates these terms, respectively, with the Paternal Monad, Empyrean, Ethereal, and Material Worlds (contra Proclus, who had interpreted the last three terms in apposition to φάος; cf. Des Places, "Notes," p. 325). Although Lewy (p. 89, n. 84) accepts Simplicius' interpretation, he argues that φάος must be equated with Aion and not the First God, as the latter generates the World Soul, and, thus, cannot be "ensouled" by her (as the oracle suggests). Tardieu, on the other hand ("Oracles chaldaïques," pp. 204-209), questions Lewy's "insertion of a mythological entity" (i.e., Aion) into a progression of physical elements. Tardieu prefers to combine the terms in this fragment with the list of elements in fr. 67 (fire, water, earth, air) to depict a descending progression from light to matter, with a mixture of fire, water, air, and earth between these two extremes.

Tardieu also demonstrates how both the Valentinian Gnostics, as well as the Chaldeans, developed numerous metaphysical patterns of structural oppositions based on this physical model. A case in point is the βυθός/βάθος equation of fr. 18 and 163. Cf., also, Hadot, Porphyre, I, pp. 396-398, who equates this progression of physical elements with a hierarchy of mythic powers (e.g., gods, angels, demons, heroes) who inhabit various levels of the physical universe.

Fr. 52

1. ἀρετῆς: In Lewy's interpretation (pp. 88-90), a cosmic power associated with the moon (cf. ἀρετή, fr. 107) and thus with Hecate, whose dwelling place is the moon. By remaining "within," "virtue" remains uncontaminated by the Material World.

πέλε: Common to the Oracles; cf. fr. 69, 97, 214.

2. τὸ παρθένον: Cf. Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 275 and n. 6, who points out the "paradoxical" virginal/maternal nature of Hecate. Psellus, P.G., 1136 b 9-10, alludes to Hecate's statue: ζωστήρι κοσμηθεῖσα παρθενικῶ. Cf. ὑπεζωκῶς, fr. 6 and notes.

Fr. 53

1. τὰς μεριστὰς τοῦ δημιουργοῦ νοήσεις: "Division" is characteristic of the Ideas. Cf. ἐμερίσθησαν and μεμερισμέναι, fr. 37.

2. πατρικὰς διανοίας: Cf. ἔννοιαι νοεραί, fr. 37; ἔννοια πατρός, fr. 38. But cf. Festugière, Rév., III, p. 58 who equates this expression with the "Fathers" of fr. 50 (and not with the Ideas).

3. ψυχῇ: i.e., the World Soul, whose position here mediates between the intelligible and sensible realms. See Lewy, p. 85 and n. 70.

θέρμη: Cf. fr. 123, where "heat" is said to be an anagogic power. Hecate's "heat," of course, derives from the noetic fire of the Father.

ψυχούσα: Lewy, op. cit., sees a play on words here between θέρμη and ψυχούσα, as the latter can also mean "to cool." Cf. Iambl., De myst., II.6: ἡ μὲν τῶν θεῶν παρουσία...τὸ μὲν ψυχρὸν ἐν ἡμῖν...ἀφανίζει, τὸ δὲ θέρμον αὖξει. See Cremer, pp. 50-51.

Fr. 54

1. θεολόγοι: i.e., the Juliani. However, this term is also used by the later Neoplatonists when referring to the Orphic tradition. See Lewy, Exc. I, p. 444 d.

τῇ ζωογόνῳ...θεῶ: Cf. τὸν ζωογόνον κόλπον (of Hecate), fr. 32; τῆς ζωογόνου πηγῆς Ῥέας, fr. 56, intro.

ὑπέστησαν: cj. Kroll; προϋπέστησαν, cj. Cousin.

2. φύσις: Although Lewy (pp. 90 and n. 91; 95-96) equates Hecate with Nature, it is more precise to think of Nature as proceeding from Hecate. Cf., e.g., Proclus, In Tim., I, 11, 19-20: τοιαύτη οὐσα (ἡ φύσις) προελήλυθεν ἀπὸ τῆς ζωογόνου θεᾶς. See, also, Festugière, Tim., I, p. 38 and n. 1. Cf., also, forms of φύσις in fr. 70, 88, 101, 102, 106.

Fr. 55

1. χαῖται μὲν γὰρ ἐς ὀξύ κτλ.: Lewy (pp. 90-91 and notes 94-96) suggests that this verse alludes to a popular notion that Hecate's hair was made up of snakes, and attempts to connect this interpretation with his understanding of εἰλυμένον in fr. 38. Festugière, Rép., I, p. 156, n. 4, prefers to emend the text to: χαῖται μὲν γὰρ ἐς ὀξύ πεφρικότα φῶτα βλέπουσιν and translates: "sa chevelure semble celle d'un homme aux cheveux hérissés."

Fr. 56

1. τῆς ζωογόνου πηγῆς 'Ρέας: Here, it is Rhea who functions as a generative, World Soul figure. Elsewhere, both ζωογόνος (fr. 32 and 54) and πηγῇ (fr. 52) are descriptive of Hecate.

3. 'Ρεῖη: Lewy (p. 84, notes 65 and 66, contra Proclus) argues that this term does not refer to Rhea, but is the feminine of ῥᾶδιος (and so the pun ῥεῖη/ῥοή). For Lewy, "Rhea does not figure in the Chaldean pantheon." (Cf., Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 396, n. 2, who agrees with Lewy.) Lewy translates v. 1 as: "The Source and Stream of the spiritual Blessed ones is easy-flowing." But Festugière (Tim., V, p. 117, n. 1) argues that "le sens ne peut être que Rhea, et, s'il y a erreur, elle aura consisté à prendre pour chaldaïques des λόγια orphiques." Rhea, of course, figures in a number of Orphic fragments. See Kern, Orph. Frag., Index III. Of particular interest is frag. 132: ἐν τοῖς κόλποις τῆς 'Ρέας. Damascius (II, 277, 5), who cites this fragment, attributes it to Orpheus. Although Kroll, loc. cit., and Des Places, p. 134, argue for a Chaldean origin (and, to be sure, the vocabulary of the oracle certainly fits a Chaldean milieu), an unqualified acceptance of Rhea as a bona-fide Chaldean deity remains problematic. Psellus, for example, only mentions Hecate, not Rhea, in his summary of the Chaldean system.

νοερῶν μαχάρων: According to Lewy (p. 159, n. 350), a reference to the planetary gods. Cf. fr. 140 and 160.

ῥοή: This image of "streaming" or "flowing" is frequent in the Oracles in a variety of contexts. Cf. ῥέει, fr. 31; ῥεύσωμεν, fr. 171; ῥοιζαῖον, fr. 146; ἐρρολίζησε and ῥοιζοῦνται, fr. 37; ῥοῖζον, fr. 107; ῥοαί, fr. 61.

4. πρώτη δυνάμει: Elsewhere, Power is assigned the median role in the primordial triad and is equated with Hecate. Cf. fr. 4, 50, 96 and notes. Lewy, however, (p. 159, n. 350), understands πηγῇ...πρώτη δυνάμει as referring to the Paternal Intellect from which the planetary gods emanate (based on his translation of v. 1; see supra). Lewy identifies the "Source and Stream" with the Paternal Intellect.)

κόλποισιν: This term is associated both with the World Soul (e.g., fr. 32, 35, 37, 96) and the fecundating power of the Father (e.g., fr. 28; cf. μήτρα, fr. 30).

5. πᾶν: Cf. τὰ πάντα, fr. 23 and notes.

προχέει: Cf. ἐπιρρεῖ, fr. 32 and notes.

τροχάουσιν: Cf. τροχάζει, fr. 13.

Fr. 57

2. ἐπὶ τὰ στερεώματα κοσμῶν: The seven planetary spheres. Psellus, P.G., 122, 1149 c, apparently conflates these spheres with the three worlds and comes up with ἐπὶ τὰ σωματικούς κόσμους: i.e., 1 Empyrean, 3 Ethereal, 3 Material. Cf., also, Damascius, II, 88, 21-24; Lewy, p. 123 and notes 218-219.

ἐξώγκωσε: A vivid description of the world-shaping activity of the Second Intellect. Lewy (p. 123) translates "set up on high;" Des Places (p. 81) prefers "souffla." Cf. C.H. X.15: ὀγκωτο; ὀγκωμένου (with reference to the "volume" of the soul as it descends through the planetary spheres).

πατήρ: Here, the Second or Demiurgic Intellect. Cf. πατέρων, fr. 16 and 50.

Fr. 58

1. ἐμεσεμβόλησεν: Cf. μεσεμβολήσας, fr. 200.

4. κραδίης τοπῶ: In Chaldean cosmology, the sun was situated in the middle of the seven spheres as the "heart" or "center" of the Universe. Cf. κέντρον, fr. 70; κέντρῳ, fr. 111. See, also, Lewy, pp. 124, n. 221 d; 409-413; Des Places, p. 82 and "Notes," p. 325; Geudtner, pp. 55-56; Tardieu, "Oracles chaldaïques," p. 195 ff. As such, the Chaldean order of the planets follows the "new cosmology" developed during the Hellenistic period. See, e.g., Nilsson, Greek Piety, pp. 96-103.

Fr. 59

1. οἱ...μυστικώτατοι τῶν λόγων: A circumlocution for the Oracles; see Lewy, Exc. I, p. 444 e.

ἐν τοῖς ὑπερκοσμίσις (κοσμοῖς): (= fr. 209). For the later Neoplatonists, the term "supermundane" could apply both to the Empyrean and/or Ethereal Worlds. Cf. τὸν ὑπερουράνιον τόπον, fr. 16, intro.; ὑπέρχοσμον πατριχὸν βύθον, fr. 18. Cf., also, fr. 193 and notes.

3. (ὁ) ἡλιακὸς κόσμος (καὶ τὸ) ὄλον φῶς: Synonymous expressions for the transmundane sun of the intelligible world (= Aion). As such, this noetic sun is the transmundane "copy" on which the visible sun is patterned. See Lewy, pp. 151-152 and n. 313. See, also, Proclus, El. Th., prop. 52: πᾶν τὸ αἰώνιον ὄλον ἅμα ἐστίν. In Dodds' words: "Wholeness is intermediate in the logical order of universality, and therefore for Pr. [sic] in the metaphysical order also...It is associated with eternity...which occupies a similar intermediate position between Being and the eternals." See Dodds, Proclus: El. Th., p. 239; cf. Festugière, Tim, IV, p. 110, n. 5.

Fr. 60

2. πρὸς ἐξοχέτευμα: A reference to the rays of the sun, which function in both a physical as well as anagogic sense in the Oracles. Cf. ἐμπυρίοις ὀχετοῖς, fr. 2; πυρήοχον, fr. 65; ὀχετῶν, fr. 66.

4. ταμίαν: The visible sun is the "dispenser" of heat and light for the earth. In hymns to Helios, ταμίης is used regularly with either πῦρ or φῶς. (See, Lewy, pp. 154-155 and notes 324-329, who sees such hymns as influencing the Oracles.) Cf., also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 36, 693; 2(4), 182; 8(9), 71; 9(1), 53.

Fr. 61

3. δρόμος: A technical term for the movement of the stars. Cf. fr. 70 and 73; infra, l. 18 (= v. 11). Cf., also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 31: μάνας τε δρόμοι. See Lewy, p. 140, n. 276.

5. ἡέριοι τε ῥοαί: i.e., the winds. Cf. ἡέρος ἀγοί, infra, l. 7 (= v. 3); Synesius, H. 2(4), 35: ἀνέμων ῥοίζος. See, also, ῥοή, fr. 56 and notes.

7. πνεῦμα σελήνης: Cf., esp., fr. 35 and notes, where πνεῦμα is associated with the World Soul (or Hecate, whose abode is the moon).

ἡέρος ἀγοί: i.e., the winds. Lewy (p. 185 and n. 35) sees this verse as the beginning of a ὕμνος κλητικός. In this regard, cf. fr. 216.

9. μηναίων καναχισμῶν: Cf., esp., μήνης ῥοίζον, fr. 107.

10. κόλπων τ' ἡέριων: Cf. κόλποι ἡέριοι, fr. 216.

12-15. αἰθήρης...συννήχονται: These verses refer to the raiments (ethereal, solar, lunar, aerial) acquired by the soul in its descent to earth. These raiments make up the "vehicle" of the soul. And so Proclus, In Tim., III, 234, 26-30: καὶ δοκοῦσιν ἐπεσθαι τοῖς λογίοις ἐν τῇ καθόδῳ τὴν ψυχὴν λέγουσι συλλέγειν αὐτὸ (i.e., τὸ ὄχημα τῆς ψυχῆς) λαμβάνουσιν "αἰθήρης μέρος ἡελίου" κτλ. On the "vehicle" of the soul, see fr. 104, 119-120, 129, 158, 210 and notes (as well as sources cited in n. 84 of Introduction). Cf., also, Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 182 and n. 1.

14. {μέρος}: As Des Places notes (p. 134), μέρος here does not fit the meter.

18. μηναιῶς τε δρόμος: Cf. μηναιῶν τε δρόμημα, fr. 64.

Fr. 62

This fragment (as well as fr. 91 and 208) is now attributed to Damascius, not Olympiodorus. See Westerink, Greek Comm., II, p. 15 ff.

2. τῶν στοιχείων: The stars. Cf. κόσμου στοιχεῖα, fr. 39; Lewy, p. 97, n. 131. In the context of Damascius, however, the "elements" mentioned here refer to water and air.

αἰθέρες: A possible allusion to the ethereal raiments of the soul. Cf. fr. 61; Lewy, p. 193, n. 64. Westerink, however, note loc. cit., suggests that the word αἰθέρες alludes here to the "highest heavens" or Empyrean World, and that Damascius has transferred this expression to the elements, water and air, "to denote the highest and most refined part of each." Westerink also thinks it is doubtful that the terms στοιχεῖα and αἰθέρες were ever connected in the Oracles, citing Proclus, In Tim., II, 57, 12-14 as evidence.

3. ἐκεῖ: In the context of Damascius, ἐπ' ἄκρων τῆς γῆς.

Fr. 63

2. κυρτῶ σχήματι: In the context of Damascius, a possible allusion to the magical characters or signs used during some of the theurgic rites. (See Lewy, p. 252, n. 91.) Proclus (In Tim., I, 317, 22-25) also appropriates this expression, but in a cosmological context: δοκεῖ μὲν οὖν ὅσα τῷ τρίτῳ τῶν ἀρχικῶν ὁ θεουργὸς ἀνατίθῃ, ταῦτα καὶ οὗτος τῷ κόσμῳ διδόναι καὶ δημιουργεῖν μὲν τὸν οὐρανόν, "κυρτῶ σχήματι" περικλάσας. See Festugière, Tim., II, 175, n. 1, who draws a parallel with Plato, Tim. 33 b.

συρομένην: Cf. fr. 34, 164.

Fr. 64

3. μηναιῶν τε δρόμημα: Cf. μηναιῶς τε δρόμος, fr. 61.

ἀστέριον προπόρευμα: Cf. ibid., fr. 107. Proclus uses our fr. 64 to support Plato's theory concerning the forward motion of the fixed stars in contrast to the forward and retrograde movements of the planets.

Fr. 65

Lewy (pp. 153-154 and notes 320-328) understands these obscure verses as referring to the activity of the visible sun: "The five attributes prove that this fire designates the sun. For this luminary is situated in the fifth of the spheres, if these, including that of the fixed stars, are counted from above; it is the mid-most of the seven planets, in contradistinction from the noetic fire, it is called the other; it contains the transcendental fire, it is life-bringing... This solar fire descends from the transcendent fire in channels which attain the region of the material world and bring through their warmth life to the earth."

1. κέντρου: Cf. forms of κέντρον in fr. 50 (with reference to Hecate); fr. 70, 111, 167 (with reference to the sun).

ζωογονίας: Cf. ζωογόνον, fr. 32 (with reference to Hecate); ζωογόνου, fr. 56 (with reference to Rhea).

4. ἄλλο πυρήοχον: The term "other" characterizes the "fire" (or sun) of the material world as distinguished from its noetic counterpart. Cf., similarly, πῦρ ἕτερον, fr. 6; πυρὸς ὄγκος... ἕτερος, fr. 68. Cf., also, πυρήοχον, fr. 47 (with reference to the virtue "Hope").

5. ὕλαίων ὀχετῶν: i.e., the rays of the mundane sun which reach the earth. Cf., also, fr. 2, 66, 110 where forms of ὀχετός are used in an anagogic sense.

ζωηφόριον πῦρ: Cf. πυρὸς ζωηφόρου, fr. 32 (with reference to the Paternal Intellect). Cf., also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 601-602: φωτὸς ζωηφορίου (in an anagogic context). See, also, Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 402 and n. 11.

Fr. 66

1. μιγνυμένων δ' ὀχετῶν: i.e., a "mingling" of the ascending soul "spark" or "channel" with the mystic rays of the sun. Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 720: φωτὶ μιγῆναι; 727: φωτὶ μιγεῖσαν; 3(5), 47: μιχθῆναι ψυχᾶς παγᾶ. Cf., also, μιγῆναι, fr. 6 (in a cosmic context).

πυρὸς ἀφθίτου ἔργα: An allusion to the sacred activity of the theurgist. Cf. ἔργον, fr. 110 and notes; πυρὸς ἔργα, fr. 133. Cf., also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 639-641: πυρίων δ' ἔργων. Lewy (pp. 196-197 and notes 79-83) understands this verse as referring to the final purification of the soul; i.e., that of the higher or rational soul (via the "divine work" of the theurgist). But this assessment must be qualified by the noetic language of, e.g., fr. 1, which suggests some form of genuine contemplative activity (free of external manipulation) at the level of the higher soul. See notes to fr. 1 and detailed discussion in Introduction.

2. (ἡ ἀκροτάτη ζωή): In the context of Proclus, it is a matter of the poetic life (ἡ ποιητικὴ ζωή) at its most perfect level; i.e., when the soul is "filled with the Divine" (πλήρης τῶν θείων). See A. Sheppard, Studies on the 5th and 6th Essays of Proclus' Commentary on the Republic, esp. pp. 171-182, for an excellent discussion of this material in the context of Proclus' theory of mysticism.

Fr. 67

1. ἡ τῶν Ἀσσυρίων θεολογία: Another circumlocution for the Chaldean tradition. See Lewy, Exc. I, p. 444 c.

3. πυρὸς; ὕδατος; γῆς; αἰθέρος (= ἀήρ): The four elements from which the sublunar world is fashioned. Cf. Psellus, Hypotyp. 27, where ὕλη πατρογενής signifies the primal substratum, and τέτταρα στοιχεῖα indicates the four elements from which ὁ σύμπας κόσμος is shaped. (Cf., Hypotyp. 20: τὰ δὲ ὑπὸ σελήνην ἐν τοῖς τέταρσι στοιχείοις ὑφέστηκεν). See Lewy, p. 119 and notes 202-203; Des Places, "Notes," p. 326; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 396 and n. 7; Tardieu, "Oracles chaldaïques," p. 204 ff., who constructs a structural model in conjunction with fr. 51.

Fr. 68

1 + 3. αὐτουργῶν: Cf. Numenius, fr. 16 (Des Places): ὁ γὰρ δεῦτερος διττὸς ὢν αὐτοποιεῖ τήν τε ἰδέαν ἑαυτοῦ καὶ τὸν κόσμον δημιουργὸς ὢν. Cf., also, C.H. XI.14: αὐτουργὸς γὰρ ὢν, αἰεὶ ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ αὐτὸς ὢν ὃ ποιεῖ; Synesius, H. 1(3), 268: αὐτουργὲ θεῶν.

2. ὅτις πυρὸς ὄγκος ἕτερος: A reference to the mundane sun. Cf. ἄλλο πυρὸς ὄγκον, fr. 65. Lewy, however, (p. 120 and n. 205; cf. p. 154) ignores the context of Proclus and makes this phrase the subject of the fragment.

3. σῶμα τὸ κοσμικόν: The "world body" comprised of the four elements. Cf. κόσμου περὶ σώμασιν, fr. 37.

4. μὴ φαίνεθ' ὑμενώδης: In other words, the visible world (as opposed to the intelligible world) must be solid and corporeal, a notion derived from a similar description in Plato, Tim., 31 b. In both instances, it is the element of fire which makes the world invisible. See Lewy, p. 120 and n. 206. Cf. ὕμην, fr. 6.

Fr. 69

1. (ὁ οὐρανός): Although Proclus, loc. cit., equates ὁ οὐρανός with ὁ κόσμος (based on his interpretation of Plato, Tim., 28 b), in the Oracles, "sky" is more properly the region of the fixed stars or Ethereal realm. Cf. οὐρανός, fr. 70; Lewy, pp. 125-126 and notes 225-227.

σῶμα ἔχων: Cf. ibid., Plato, Tim., 28 b.

2. νοῦ μίμημα: i.e., the corporeal sky is patterned after its intelligible copy. Cf. Plato, ibid.

πέλει: Common to the Oracles; cf., e.g., fr. 52, 97, 214.

3-4. τι/σώματος: As a visible entity, the sky (= Ethereal World) is involved in matter, although not to the extent of the sublunar world, which is characterized as μισοφαής (fr. 134 and 181) and μελαναυγής (fr. 163).

Fr. 70

2. ἀπηρωρῆσθαι: Cf. ἡώρηται, fr. 54.

3. φύσις: Lewy (pp. 95-96 and n. 126) identifies "Nature" with Hecate. However, as Festugière suggests (see fr. 54 and notes), it is better to think of Nature as deriving or proceeding from Hecate (or "suspended from the great Hecate" as stated here).

κόσμων: i.e., the stars. Cf., e.g., κόσμοις, fr. 8; Festugière, Tim., I, p. 38, n. 3.

ἔργων: i.e., visible creation as a whole. Cf. αἰσθητοῖς ἔργοις, fr. 40; Lewy, p. 96, n. 128. Festugière, ibid. (and thus Des Places), translates "toute creature." See, also, Proclus, In Tim., I, 11, 28-30, where the first two verses of this oracle are also quoted.

4. οὐρανός: The region of the fixed stars. Cf. fr. 69; Lewy, p. 96, n. 129.

δρόμον: This term is regularly applied to the movement of the stars. Cf. δρόμος, fr. 61 and notes for parallels.

κατασύρων: Cf. συρόμενος, fr. 34 and notes for parallels. See, also, Lewy, p. 96, n. 130.

5. κέντρον: Here, a reference to the sun's position in the "center" of the universe. Cf. frs. 111 and 167; κραδής, fr. 58. Lewy (pp. 96-97) thinks the term "center" here refers to the earth, but κέντρον is never used in this sense in any of the extant fragments.

Fr. 71

1. (Ἀπόλλων): Synonymous with Helios.

2. ἁρμονία: Cf. Proclus, H. I.4 (εἰς Ἥλιον): ὑψόθεν ἁρμονίης ῥύμα πλούσιον ἐξοχετεύων. Cf., also, ἁρμονίαν, fr. 97; Synesius, H. 1(3), 341; 8(9), 37. In Lewy's words (p. 200 and n. 100): "According to the Chaldean doctrine, the sun, as the center of the planetary world, holds the spheres together with its rays, and thereby watches over the harmonious relationship of the revolving spheres."

Fr. 72

2-3. πανοπλία παντελεῖ κεκοσμημένην: The reference is to Plato, Laws, VII, 796 c 1, where this expression is descriptive of Athena. See Lewy, p. 95 and n. 118.

4. Ἥκα θεοίη: The "goddess" of the oracle is undoubtedly Hecate, who has been conjured by the theurgist (and was often depicted as armed). Cf. frs. 219, 221-223; Lewy, p. 95 and n. 119.

Fr. 73

1. οὗτος ὁ Ζεὺς: In the context of Damascius, a reference to ὁ ἀρχικὸς Ζεὺς. The passage as a whole is a commentary on Plato, Phaedrus, 246 e-247 a.

2. τρεῖς πατέρας: Equivalent to ἀρχαῖς τρισί, infra, l. 5 (= v. 3), as a probable allusion to the Rulers of the three worlds. See Lewy, pp. 138-139.

3-4. ἱερός πρῶτος δρόμος, ἐν δ' ἄρα μέσσω ἡέριος, τρίτος ἄλλος ὃς ἐν πυρὶ τὴν χθόνα θάλπει: These three "courses" have been subject to various interpretations. Kroll, for example, loc. cit., was puzzled by these lines, so emended the text to read: ἔστι γὰρ αἰθέριος πρῶτος δρόμος, ἐν δ' ἄρα μέσσω ἡέριος, τρίτος ἄλλος, etc. (based on Damascius' introductory comments. Cremer, p. 39, also accepts Damascius' interpretation of the "first course" as "heavenly" = ethereal.) However, Kroll's emendations (among other problems), eliminate the crucial ἱερός in v. 1 which, as Lewy points out (p. 140, n. 277), has a transmundane or noetic (not ethereal) association. But Lewy (pp. 139-140 and n. 275), although noting this, leaves out a crucial comma after ἡέριος and thus understands the "third course" (and not the "middle course") as "airy." In doing so, Lewy extends the meaning of the second verse to read: "The third, airy course heats the earth in the fire (of the second course)." In addition, Lewy connects the "sacred course" with Aion (= transmundane sun), the "median course" with the mundane sun, the "airy course" with the moon. Although Lewy's general association of the three courses with the three worlds is undoubtedly correct, his translation of the fragment is unnecessarily forced. (Note that Des Places, p. 136, accepts Lewy's interpretations, but then does not suppress the comma after ἡέριος!)

Tardieu, on the other hand ("Oracles chaldaïques," pp. 213-214), translates the fragment in the most obvious way (i.e., a "first, sacred course;" a "median" airy course; a "third course which heats the earth in fire"), but then mistakenly connects the "airy course" with the Ethereal World and the "third, other course" with the Material World (the problem Lewy attempted to correct with his translation). In the extant fragments, "airy" is regularly associated with the moon and, thus, with the Material (not Ethereal) World. (Cf., e.g., the sequence in fr. 61: ether, sun, moon, air.) Similarly, the "third, other course which heats the earth in fire" must allude to the sun, which rules the Ethereal (not Material) World. (Cf. ἄλλο, fr. 65; ἕτερος, fr. 68. But Tardieu's understanding of Chaldean cosmology as based on the Stoic doctrine of "three fires" may well be correct.) Thus, none of the solutions so far proposed is entirely satisfactory. The fragment, as it stands, remains a puzzle.

5. ἀρχαῖς γὰρ τρισὶ ταῖσδε κτλ.: For Lewy, ἀρχαῖς τρισὶ is analogous to τρεῖς πατέρας (see supra, l. 2). Cremer, however (p. 73, n. 294), challenges this interpretation and translates ἀρχαῖς as "Principles" (with an allusion to the Iynges). But Cremer's interpretation is erroneously based on Damascius, II, 201, 2-4 (see fr. 78 and notes). As Lewy has correctly shown (p. 140, n. 274), the verb δουλεύει demands the sense of "ruler" here, and not "principle."

Fr. 74

1. ἀπορρεῖν: Cf. ἐπιρρεῖ, fr. 32; προχέει, fr. 56.

2. κρηνηῖος ἀρχή: Cf. Psellus, Hypotyph. 28: ἐκάστης δὲ σειρᾶς ἡ ἀκρότης πηγὴ ὀνομάζεται, τὰ δὲ προσεχῇ κρῆναι. All of these expressions—πηγαί (see fr. 49); ἀρχαί (see fr. 40, 49); κρῆναι—ultimately refer to the Ideas. See Lewy, pp. 115-116 and notes 192-193.

3. ὁμνεῖται: Evidently the fragment constituted part of a Chaldean hymn.

Fr. 75

2. αὐταῖς: The feminine here alludes to the Iynges (αἱ ἱγγες; cf. fr. 76; and so Des Places, p. 136; cf. Chaignet, Damascius, II, p. 281) and not the Teletarchs (οἱ τελετάρχαι; cf. fr. 85 and 86) as Lewy thought (p. 141, n. 281, who translates the verse as: "The ruling path subject to the Teletarchs").

ἀρχικός: cf. Des Places; ἄρχιος, codd. Cf. Chaignet, ibid., n. 1: "genitif d'un nom ἄρχις, pour ἀρχή ou ἀρχικός."

αὐλών: According to Lewy (op. cit.), synonymous with δρόμος as a technical term for the movement of the stars (cf. δρόμος, fr. 61). But αὐλών is not attested elsewhere in this sense. The fragment remains obscure.

Fr. 76

1. τὰς ἱγγας: Here, the Iynges function as noetic entities equivalent to the Thoughts or Ideas of the Father (cf. fr. 77). As noetic entities, Proclus locates αἱ ἱγγες at the first level of the νοητὴ καὶ νοερά διάκοσμος. See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 483. Elsewhere (e.g., fr. 206), this term refers to the "magic wheels" used in the theurgic rites. See discussion in Introduction.

2. ἐπεμβαίνουσι: Cf., nomen agentis, ἐπιβήτορα, fr. 44 (with reference to Eros). Both the Iynges and Eros function as "binding" entities in the Chaldean system. See Geudtner, pp. 42-47 and discussion in Introduction. Cf., also, ἐπιβήτορες, fr. 216 (here, with reference to lunar demons).

3. κόσμοις ἐνθρόνισκousai: Cf. κόσμων ἐνθρόνισκων, fr. 34; κόσμοις ἐνθρόνισκων, fr. 87; ἐκθρόνισκousιν, fr. 35. Thus the Iynges, like the Ideas (as "thunderbolts"), "leap into the worlds" as fiery entities.

3-4. ἀκρότητες τρεῖς: According to Lewy (p. 156; cf. p. 134, n. 256), another term for the Iynges, who were associated with the three world circles. Cf. ἀκρότητας, fr. 82.

4. <πυρίη γ' ἡδ' αἰθερίη καὶ ὑλώδης>: cj. Lewy, p. 132, n. 250. Cf. Psellus, Hypotyph. 3: μεθ' ἣν τρεῖς ἐτέρας (sc. Ἰγγας) πατρικὰς καὶ νοητὰς καὶ ἀφθέγκτους, διαιρούσας τοὺς κόσμους τριχῇ κατὰ τὸ ἐμπύριον καὶ τὸ αἰθέριον καὶ τὸ ὑλαῖον. Cf., also, Hypotyph. 5.

Fr. 77

1. αἶ γε: cj. Lewy; Ἰγγες, codd. But it is Psellus who has introduced Ἰγγες here. See Lewy, p. 132, n. 249.

νοούμεναι <ἐκ> πατρόθεν: ἐκ, cj. Lewy; cf. ἐκ πατρόθεν, fr. 130. As Ideas, the Iynges are "thought" by the Paternal Intellect.

2. βουλαῖς ἀφθέγκτοις: Cf., esp., ἀκμάδι βουλῇ, fr. 37; πειθηνίδι βουλῇ, fr. 81; αἰδίῳ βουλῇ, fr. 107.

κινούμεναι: The "movement" of the Iynges is their "leap" into the worlds (see fr. 76). This movement is a circular motion away from and back towards the Father (cf. fr. 87) and, as such, constitutes their "thinking." See Geudtner, p. 43.

Fr. 78

1. οἱ ἐπὶ μαγειῶν πατέρες: i.e., the Teletarchs or Rulers of the three worlds who play a role in the theurgic rites (ἐπὶ μαγειῶν). See Lewy, p. 139 and n. 274.

3. διαπόρθμιοι: These "couriers" are the Iynges. (Cf. Proclus, In Crat., 33, 14: τὸ διαπόρθμιον ὄνομα τῶν Ἰγγων.) Damascius, however, has mistakenly applied this term to the "three fathers." (See Lewy, p. 133 and n. 254.) Cremer, however (pp. 73-74 and notes 295-296), accepts Damascius' interpretation. (See, also, notes to fr. 73.) As "couriers," the Iynges transmit messages between the intelligible and sensible worlds (τῷ πατρὶ καὶ τῇ ὕλῃ). But these messages are none other than their own magical names. (Cf. ὄνομα σεμνόν, fr. 87.) See, also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 105-107: μελέτω προπόλοις/πορθμεῦσι σοφοῖς/ἀγίων ὕμνων; Geudtner, pp. 44-45.

Fr. 79

1. πᾶς κόσμος: Either a reference to the three worlds (cf. παντὶ ἐν κόσμῳ, fr. 27) or, more likely, to the stars (cf., e.g., κόσμοις, fr. 8 and 76). See Lewy, p. 135, n. 259. Psellus, however, loc. cit., understands the "universe" in a general sense.

ἀνοχῆας: Noetic entities associated with the Iynges. Cf., e.g., Proclus, In Crat., 33, 14-15: τὸ διαπόρθμιον ὄνομα τῶν Ἰγγων, ὃ πάσας ἀνέχειν λέγεται τὰς πηγὰς. As such, these "Supports" play a crucial role in maintaining the regular movement of the spheres.

ἀκαμπεῖς: Cf. ἄγναμπτον, fr. 36.

Fr. 80

3. ὑλαίοις συνοχεῦσιν: These "Material Connectors" are equivalent to the rays of the mundane sun. See Lewy, pp. 131, n. 246; 155-156.

δουλεύει: Common to the Oracles; cf. frr. 73, 81, 184.

Fr. 81

1-2. τῆς νοητῆς ἐκεῖνης καὶ νοερᾶς τάξεως: For Proclus, the median order (or ὁ δεύτερος διάκοσμος) situated between the intelligible and intellectual orders (see Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 483). In the context of Proclus, the operative principle (for which he cites the oracular fragment) is that of dominance and dependence, i.e., each entity or divine being dominates the principle below it but, at the same time, is dependent or subservient to the principle above it.

3. πυρὸς νοερῷ: Here, apparently the Father or First Intellect. But cf. νοερῷ πυρί, fr. 37, where this term indicates the Second Intellect.

νοεροῖς πρηστήρσιν: The Ideas; cf. πρηστήρ, fr. 34; πρηστήρσιν, fr. 82.

4. δουλεύοντα: Since this verb is used supra (fr. 80) in connection with the Connectors, it is possible that the "Lightning-bolts" can be assimilated to the Connectors in some sense. (Cf. fr. 82.) In the last analysis, the συνοχεῖς, πρηστήρες, ἀμειλικτοί, ἀνοχῆεις, and ὕγγες all function as diverse aspects of the class of Ideas. See Lewy, p. 156.

πειθηνίδι βουλῇ: Cf. πειθῷ, fr. 14; βουλῇ, fr. 37 and notes.

Fr. 82

3. φρουρεῖν πρηστήρσιν: This function of "protecting" is also assigned to the Connectors and Implacables. Cf., e.g., Psellus, Hypotyp. 10: οἱ δὲ ἀμειλικτοί, ὑποδεχάμενοι τὴν πρηστήριον τῶν συνοχέων δύναμιν, φρουροῦσι τὰς ὑπάρξεις ἄνωθεν τῶν πατέρων.

ἀκρότητας: The "summits" are associated with the Iynges. Cf. ἀκρότητες, fr. 76.

4. ἐγκεράσας: This "mixing" metaphor is common to the Oracles; cf. frr. 29, 42, 44.

ἀλκῆς: "Strength" is a regular epithet of the Father; cf., esp., frr. 1, 2, 32, 49.

ἴδιον: Cf. ibid., fr. 3, where this term is similarly descriptive of the Father.

συνοχεῦσιν: Here, probably analogous to πρηστήρσιν, supra, 1. 3 (= v. 1).

Fr. 83

2. ὀλοποιοί: Lewy (p. 155, n. 331) understands this term as a Chaldean neologism comprised of ὄλος + ποιῶ and thus translates as "endowed with quality entire." As such, Lewy wants to see a parallel with ὄλον φῶς in fr. 59 and thus understand the Connectors as the originators of the "entire light" of Aion. (Cf., in this regard, Proclus, In Tim., III, 18, 4-5: ὁ αἰὼν...ὥς συνοχεὺς καὶ φρουρός.) But in the context of Damascius, ὀλοποιοί must be understood as constructed from ὄλος + ποιῶ.

Fr. 84

Des Places, p. 87, following Kroll and Lewy, had originally cited only the second hemistich of this verse as oracular, but now affirms Tardieu's reconstruction (following Saffrey-Westerink) and would replace it in his text as fr. 23 bis. See "Notes," p. 324.

1. πάντας: cj. Saffrey-Westerink, causa metri; πάντα, codd.

2. (ὁ πρῶτος συνοχεύς): i.e., the Father or Highest God, understood here as the ultimate source of the Connectors. Cf. Julian the Chaldean's prayer to τὸν συνοχεά τοῦ παντός as reported by Psellus, De aurea catena (ed. Sathas, Annuaire...des études grecques, IX, 1875, p. 217, 2 ff.). Cf., also, συνοχεύς, fr. 207.

3. ἔξω ὑπάρχει: Cf. ibid., fr. 1 and notes. See Hadot (Porphyre, I, p. 306 and n. 4): "L'Un ou Père représente le moment de la concentration, de l'union, dans lequel préexistait, sous un mode caché, non déployé, seminal, toutes les déterminations ultérieures." This expression thus describes the essentially ineffable nature of the First God before he is even deployed triadically. Hadot, ibid., cites Proclus, Th. pl., 268, 34 (Portus) as a parallel to this idea: ὠδινε μὲν ὁ πρῶτος (πατήρ) τὴν τῶν ὧλων ἀπογέννησιν. Cf., also, frs. 3, 18, 191 and notes; Lewy, p. 129 and n. 240.

Fr. 85

1. ὁ πρῶτος (τελετάρχης): The "first Teletarch" is the Ruler of the Empyrean World (identified with the transmudane sun or Aion). See Lewy, p. 149 and n. 305; Saffrey-Westerink, notes ad loc.

2. ταρσὸν τοῦ πυρός: i.e., the soul. This image reflects Plato, Phaedrus, 246. During the anagōgē, it was the function of the first Teletarch to conduct the soul upward (probably under the influence of Eros). Cf. fr. 46; Synesius, H. 9(1), 118-119: ...ταρσοῖς/ἀναγωγίων ἐρώτων; 1(3), 617-618: νοερούς ταρσοὺς; 2(4), 285: ταρσὸς ψυχᾶς; 3(5), 67: ψυχᾶς ταρσοὺς, and passim.

3. ὁ δὲ μέσος...τελειοῖ...τὸν αἰθέρα: A reference to the Ruler of the Ethereal World (identified with the mundane sun).

ὁ δὲ τρίτος...τὴν...ὕλην τελειοῖ: i.e., the Ruler of the Material World (identified with the moon). Cf., also, Psellus, Hypotyp., 5: προσεχεῖς δὲ τοῖς συνοχεῦσι τοὺς τελετάρχας τιθέασιν τρεῖς καὶ αὐτοὺς ὄντας· ὧν ὁ μὲν ἐμπύριος, ὁ δὲ αἰθέριος, ὁ δὲ ὑλάρχης. Proclus locates the Teletarchs at the third and last level of the intelligible-and-intellectual order. See Lewy, Exc. VII, pp. 483-484.

Fr. 86

2. ψυχοκράτωρ: i.e., the second Teletarch or Ruler of the Ethereal World. In the context of Proclus, "soul" is associated, in general, with the Ethereal World, "intellect" (ὁ νοῦς) with the Empyrean World. As the "Ruler of souls," the sun draws the soul upward on its rays. See Lewy, p. 149 and n. 304; Des Places, "Notes," p. 326.

3. ἐπιβεβηκώς: Cf. ἐπιμβαίνουσι, fr. 76.

Fr. 87

1. αἱ...φῆμαι: Proclus uses this term exclusively of oracles derived from individual inspiration (such as the Chaldean Oracles), in contrast to οἱ χρησμοί, or oracles received at established places such as Delphi. However, Porphyry, Damascius, and others make no such distinction. See Lewy, Exc. I, p. 446 p.

2. ὄνομα σεμνόν: Equivalent to the Iynges as voces mysticae (and thus equated as well with the συνθήματα/σύμβολα which are "sown" throughout the world; cf. fr. 108). Cf. Proclus, In Tim., I, 274, 16-18: διὸ καὶ τοῖς θεουργοῖς ὀνόματα θεῖα κοσμικὰ παραδέδοται, τὰ μὲν ἄρρητα καλούμενα, τὰ δὲ ῥητὰ παρ' αὐτοῖς. See Lewy, p. 134 and n. 256.

ἀκοιμήτω στροφάλιγγι: Cf. ἀκων στροφάλιγγι, fr. 49. This expression conveys the image of the Iynges as moving out from and back towards the Father in a ceaseless, circular motion. Cf., also, στρόφαλον, fr. 206, with reference to Hecate's "magic wheel."

3. κόσμοις ἐνθρῶσκον: Cf. κόσμοις ἐνθρῶσकुσαι, fr. 76. It is from the vantage point of the stars (or κόσμοι) that the Iynges communicate their magical names back and forth between the sensible and intelligible worlds.

Fr. 88

1. [ἡ φύσις]: As Kroll suggests, loc. cit., ἡ φύσις is probably introduced here by Psellus from a preceding paragraph. Following Des Places, then, I have bracketed this term. Lewy, however, (p. 263, n. 14), following the parallel of Synesius (see infra), prefers to bracket εἶναι.

τοὺς δαίμονας: In the Chaldean system, the sublunar world was believed to be inhabited by various demonic powers who pervaded all aspects of Nature. Cf., e.g., frs. 90-92, 216. In addition to demons, there were "orders" (τάξεις) of gods, angels, and probably heroes. Cf., e.g., Psellus, Hypotyp., 20-21: εἰσὶ δὲ θεῖαι τάξεις καὶ γένη περὶ ἕκαστον τῶν στοιχείων· μεθ' οὓς οἱ τῶν θεῶν ὁπαδοὶ ἄγγελοι ἐφ' οἷς αἱ τῶν δαιμόνων ἀγέλαι...καὶ μετὰ τούτους οἱ ἥρωες. Cf. Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 397 and notes 2-4, who suggests that the order of heroes may well have been introduced by Porphyry. But Cremer, p. 39, thinks that the series including heroes is based on a Chaldean Vorlage. Cf., also, Festugière, Rév., III, p. 263, who is of the same opinion. Synesius, H. 5(2), 52-53, alludes to this verse: ἵνα δαιμόνων ὁμιλον/φύσις ἰξάνοισα τίχτει. See Lewy, p. 263; Geudtner, pp. 59-60.

2. κακῆς ὕλης: In the Chaldean system, matter is viewed as an aggressive, evil force and thoroughly demonized, a notion prominent in the Platonic "underworld." However, unlike most of the Gnostic and Hermetic systems, this hylophobia does not extend to the Ethereal World or region of the fixed stars. In this regard, cf. esp. fr. 153 and notes and see discussion in Introduction.

τὰ...βλαστήματα χρηστὰ καὶ ἐσθλά: The "offspring" here are evil demons associated with the earth. Cf. the χθόνιοι κύνες of frs. 90 and 91. In the extant fragments, there are no "good" demons per se, although Psellus (Hypotyp. 23) mentions such a class. It is likely that these so-called "good" demons (who aid the ascent of the soul) are to be classed with the ministering angels of the Chaldean system. (See Lewy, pp. 260-261 and discussion in Introduction.) In the context of Psellus, this oracular fragment as a whole is directed toward placating evil demons during the course of a theurgic initiation. Lewy (p. 269 and n. 36) adds that the fragment probably constituted part of a "placatory prayer" aimed at preventing these demons from despoiling the "chief theurgical action of conjuring 'Nature'" (which Lewy identifies with Hecate). But Nature, more properly, should be identified as deriving from Hecate. Cf., esp., fr. 54 and notes.

Fr. 89

2. θηροπόπλον: Cf. θηρες χθονός, fr. 157; χθόνιοι κύνες (and variations), fr. 90, 91, 135; κυνῶν ἀλόγων, fr. 156. Thus, the "beastly" nature of evil demons lures the soul to a similar "animal" life.

ἀναιδής: Cf. ἀναιδεῖς, fr. 135 (as descriptive of the χθόνιοι κύνες). In Antiquity, "shameless" was a common description for the nature of dogs. See Lewy, p. 217, n. 41, who notes that the term ἀναιδεία was regularly associated with the Cynics and their self-designated "dog-like" existence.

Fr. 90

1-2. κόλπων γαίης: Cf., esp., χθόνιοι κόλποι, fr. 216. The "hollows of the earth" are the specific location of terrestrial demons. Cf. Psellus, Hypotyp. 23, where evil demons are similarly said to be ἐν τῷ κοιλώματι. Lewy (p. 308, n. 186; cf. p. 259, n. 3) sees a possible allusion to the caverns of Tartarus.

2. θρώσκεισιν: Cf. forms of ἐνθρώσκω, fr. 14, 34, 76, 87; ἐκθρώσκω, fr. 35, 37, 42.

χθόνιοι κύνες: Cf. fr. 91, 135, 156; Synesius, H. 1(3), 96-97: φυχοβόρους κύνας; 2(4), 245-247: σεῦε δ' ἀναιδῆ/κύνα τὸν χθόνιον/δαίμονα γαίης; Proclus, In rem p., II, 337, 17-19: ὃ δὴ καὶ τὰ λόγια "κυσὶν" ἀπεικάζειν εἴωθεν (sc. τὸ δαιμόνιον γένος) καὶ "πηρὸν" ἀποκαλεῖν ὡς νοῦ καὶ διανοίας ἅμοιρον. See Geudtner, pp. 56-63.

2-3. ἀληθὲς σῆμα: During the course of the theurgic rites, "true signs" (such as the fiery apparitions described in fr. 146) preceded the arrival of the conjured god or goddess. The danger here—as the fragment warns—is the always present possibility of false or deceptive signs sent by evil demons to subvert the theurgist's "divine work." Cf. Iambl., De myst., III.5: τὰ σημεῖα τῶν ἐπιπνεομένων (i.e., the entranced medium) τὰ θεῖα τεκμήρια τῆς ἀληθινῆς ἐνθουσιάσεως.

4. τιμωροὺς τῶν ψυχῶν: This notion of "avenging demons" (which ultimately goes back to the Erinyes of Homer) is a common one, both in terms of post-mortem punishments in Hades as well as vices which afflict the body here and now. Cf., e.g., C.H. I.23; XIII.7; Asclepius, 28; Lydus, De mens., IV, 32; p. 90, 24-91, 9 W.; Iambl., De myst., II.7. See, also, Cremer, pp. 77-78; Nock-Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum I, esp. p. 24, n. 57.

Fr. 91

1. οἱ ἄλογοι δαίμονες: Cf. κυνῶν ἀλόγων, fr. 156.

2. ἐλάτειρα: A likely reference to Hecate, who is traditionally associated with dogs or hounds. Porphyry (De philos. ex or. haur., p. 151, Wolff) equates the dogs of Hecate with evil demons. Thus Hecate, as the source of demonic nature (cf. fr. 54) becomes the “driver” or mistress of these demons. See Lewy, p. 271 and n. 41, who thinks this verse formed part of a conjuration hymn.

ἡερίων...κυνῶν, χθονίων τε καὶ ὑγρῶν: i.e., demons of the air, earth, and water: Damascius, loc. cit., also mentions demons of the heavens (οὐράνιοι), ether (αἰθέριοι), and Underworld (ὑποχθόνιοι). In this regard, cf. Orph. Hymn: ΠΡΟΣ ΜΥΣΑΙΟΝ (ed. Athanassakis), 32-33: Δαίμονας οὐρανίους καὶ ἐνύδρους/καὶ χθονίους καὶ ὑποχθονίους ἡδ’ ἐμπυριφοίτους. But see Lewy, p. 268, n. 34, who argues that the classification heaven, ether, water, earth, Underworld originates with Proclus.

Fr. 92

2. ὑδροβατήρας: Lit. “water-walkers.” Cf. the κυνῶν ὑγρῶν of fr. 91. Proclus, loc. cit., also uses the more common ἑνύδρον to describe these demons. In this regard, cf. νόμφαι ἐνύδρια, fr. 216. Festugière (Tim., IV, p. 143 and n. 4) translates this expression as “qui se meuvent dans l’eau.”

Fr. 93

2. πολυχέυμονα: This term is descriptive of matter. Cf., e.g., ῥεύσωμεν χεῦμα ταπεινόν, fr. 171 and forms of ῥευστός in fr. 128 and 134.

φῦλα: i.e., evil demons. See Lewy, p. 260 and n. 4.

Fr. 94

3. νοῦν μὲν ψυχῇ: Here, the World Soul. The locus classicus is Plato, Tim., 30 b 4: νοῦν μὲν ἐν ψυχῇ, ψυχὴν δὲ ἐν σώματι συνιστάς τὸ πᾶν συνετεκταίνετο. See Lewy, p. 182 and n. 24. Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 340, n. 5, sees this passage of Plato’s as “the point of departure” for later speculation about the vehicle of the soul.

<ψυχὴν δ’>: cj. Kroll (and so Des Places).

3-4. ἐνὶ σώματι ἀργῶ ἡμέας ἐγκατέθηκε: Here (in contrast to Plato), the oracle is describing the particular souls of generation weighed down by the material or “sluggish” body (or, perhaps, more specifically, the vehicle of the soul; cf. e.g., the use of σῶμα in fr. 128). Cf., also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 564-568: Σὺ γὰρ ἐν κόσμῳ/κατέθου ψυχάν,/διὰ δὲ ψυχᾶς/ἐν σώματι νοῦν/ἔσπειρας, ἄναξ. See Geudtner, p. 70, n. 302; Theiler, 1942, p. 29 = 1966, p. 287.

4. πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε: In the context of Proclus, a reference to the Demiurge, identified with Zeus. Cf. In Tim., I, 408, 23-24: περὶ τοῦ μεγίστου Διὸς τὸ πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε. See, also, Festugière, Tim., II, pp. 176 and n. 1; 282. The Chaldean reference, however, is to the Highest God as Pater. Cf., e.g., fr. 25 and 115.

Fr. 95

1. τοῦτον χαρακτῆρα: According to Plato (Tim., 36 b-d), the World Soul had the shape of a Chi (X), the axes of which were bent and joined together to form semi-circles. In Chaldean thought—since particular souls were patterned on the World Soul—they, too, had the same configuration. In the context of Proclus, knowledge of this “character” had magical significance, permitting the theurgist to invoke the souls of certain heroes (e.g., Heracles, Pentheus) and even Plato himself. In this latter regard, cf. Psellus, De aur. cat. (as cited by Lewy, p. 253, n. 96): καὶ ὅτι (Ἰουλιανὸς ὁ Χαλδαῖος) ταύτην (τὴν τοῦ Πλάτωνος ψυχὴν) ἐποπτεύων ἔκ τινος τέχνης ἱερατικῆς ἐπυνθάνετο περὶ ὧν ἐβούλετο. Cf., also, Proclus, In Tim., III, 6, 13-15: διὰ χαρακτήρων καὶ ὀνομάτων ζωτικῶν τελοῦντες τὰ ἀγάλματα καὶ ζῶντα καὶ κινούμενα ἀποτελοῦντες. (See Festugière, Tim., IV, p. 22 and n. 2; cf. Tim., III, 299 and n. 1.) As such, these “characters” and “names” can be equated with the “tokens” and “symbols” of Chaldean terminology as voces mysticae.

2. ἐγκάρδιον: i.e., the soul. Cf. Iambl., De myst., II.7, where the expression ἐγκαρδιαῖον φῶς refers to the “inner light” of purified souls evoked during an autoptic rite. (See Cremer, pp. 97-98.) Cf., also, καρδιά, fr. 211; κραδίης, fr. 58 (here, a reference to the sun as the “heart” of the universe).

Fr. 96

1. ψυχῇ, πῦρ...οὔσα φαεινόν: In the context of Psellus, a reference to the World Soul (and so Lewy, p. 86 and n. 75; cf. p. 87, n. 76). Festugière, however, (Rév., III, p. 58, and thus Des Places, p. 90), understands a reference to the human soul. Cf., in this regard, Kroll, loc. cit.; Theiler, 1942, p. 33 = 1966, p. 291 and n. 129. But in either case, both the World Soul and particular souls (as fiery entities) ultimately derive from the Primordial Fire or Father.

δυνάμει πατρός: “Power” is regularly associated with the Highest God. Cf. fr. 1, 3, 4, 5, 56, 136.

2. ζωῆς δεσπότις: As “Mistress of Life,” the World Soul animates the sensible world. Cf., e.g., fr. 32, 54, 56. Kroll, however, loc. cit., understands here the particular soul which animates the body.

3. ἰσχει: Cf. ibid., fr. 79.

πολλῶν πληρώματα κόλπων: Cf. τὸν ζωογόνον πληροῦς ‘Ἐκάτης κόλπον, fr. 32. In Gnostic sources, pleroma is a technicus terminus designating the “fullness” of the Divine world as a whole.

Fr. 97

1. θεὸν ἄρξει: According to Lewy (p. 98 and n. 88), analogous to ἐν θεῷ κεῖνται, fr. 130. (Psellus, loc. cit., paraphrases: τὸ θεῖον...πῦρ ἢ ψυχὴ βιάζεται εἰς ἑαυτήν.) Thus, for Lewy, God—in the absolute sense—refers here to Aion as the ultimate “resting place” of the elevated soul. (See esp. pp. 20, 28, 104.) But fr. 1 suggests that, in addition to this ascent to Aion (= the “light” of the Father; cf. fr. 49), there was a further ascent to the Father himself via some form of genuine contemplative activity (and not just externally manipulated theurgic ritual, as Lewy suggests. See detailed discussion in Introduction.)

2. οὐδὲν θνητὸν ἔχουσα: i.e., the soul can now be considered free of all the material defilements associated with corporeality. But whether, as Lewy suggests (e.g., pp. 198-199), this expression refers to the “final purification of the soul” is problematic. It may well allude just to the purification and “salvation” of the lower soul/ὄχημα-πνεῦμα (see fr. 129 and notes) in preparation for the contemplative purging of the higher or rational soul.

μεμέθυσται: i.e., the "drunkenness" of "sober intoxication," a common expression to describe ecstatic experience. (Psellus, loc. cit., paraphrases: ἐξίσταται αὐτῆς.) Cf., e.g., Philo, De opif., 71: μέθη νηφαλίῳ κατασχεθεῖς (sc. ὁ νοῦς). But note that here, ὁ νοῦς is seized by "sober intoxication" when it perceives the Forms or Ideas; beyond this point, according to Philo, there is a further ascent to "the Great King Himself." In the Oracles, it may well be that the ascent to Aion similarly permitted perception of the Ideas (cf. fr. 49) in a moment of "sober intoxication," prior to the ascent to the Father. (Cf. Plotinus, Enn. VI.7.35 where, similarly, prior to the ascent to the One, the elevated soul experiences itself as "nous in love," this state described by Plotinus as one of divine "drunkenness".)

3. ἁρμονίαν: i.e., the cosmic harmony of the Ethereal World dominated by Apollo-Helios (cf. fr. 71). Lewy (p. 200, n. 102) suggests that the "paean" mentioned in fr. 131 may have been a hymn in which the soul exalted her "union with the harmony of the universe." Cf., also, C.H. I.25 re the ascent of the soul διὰ τῆς ἁρμονίας.

Fr. 98

Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) considers this fragment "dubious." (It is cited neither by Kroll nor Lewy.) Bieler, however, (Boethius, loc. cit., ad not.), suggests a possible Chaldean origin: "hexameter alios ignotus ex oraculo quodam Chaldaico fortasse sumptus est." Des Places (p. 139) thinks the "sense" of the fragment is close to that of fr. 94 and 130.

2. ἀνδρὸς ἱεροῦ δέμας: Cf. δέμας, fr. 163 and 224. Des Places thinks the use of this term further affirms a possible Chaldean origin for this fragment (despite Tardieu's objection). See "Notes," p. 326.

αἰθέρες: Perhaps an allusion to the ethereal raiments which make up the vehicle of the soul. Cf. fr. 62 and notes.

Fr. 99

1-2. (τὴν γένεσιν) θηπεύειν: Cf. σώματι θητεύσασα, fr. 110; Synesius, De insomn., 139 c: θῆσσα γὰρ κατιοῦσα τὸν πρῶτον βίον ἐθελοντῆς ἀντὶ τοῦ θητεῦσαι δουλεύει (sc. ἡ ψυχῇ); H. 1(3), 571-574: κατέβαν ἀπὸ σοῦ/χθονὶ θητεῦσαι, ἀντὶ δὲ θήσας/γενόμεν δούλα. This "service" and "enslavement" properly constitute two phases in the descent of the soul. See, e.g., Theiler, 1942, p. 32 = 1966, p. 291; Cremer, p. 91 ff.; Geudtner, pp. 27-29; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 186 and n. 2; Lewy, p. 189 and n. 45.

2-3. ἀδαμάστω τωύχένι: The soul which serves generation with an "untamed neck" does not yield to the temptations of material existence, i.e., it does not become enslaved by matter. Its reward is an immediate return to its Divine home after death. See Lewy, p. 189 and n. 45.

Fr. 100

2. αὐχμηράν: Lewy (p. 297, n. 143, following the gloss of Proclus) translates this term as "arid." Cf. Festugière, Rép., III, p. 101, n. 2: "αὐχμηρός = évidemment 'qui a perdu sa fraîcheur, son éclat, qui est ternie, desséchée, comme une femme stérile.'" Des Places, however (p. 91), prefers a more ambiguous "sale," noting that matter properly contains a humid element.

Fr. 101

1. φύσεως...αὐτοπτον ἄγαλμα: In the context of Psellus, it is a matter of aporritions, in general, evoked during the theurgic rites. Cf., in this regard, αὐτόπτοις, fr. 142; Iambl., De myst., II.4: αὐτοφανῶν ἀγαλμάτων; II.10: αὐτοπτικά ἀγάλματα. See Cremer, pp. 45; 143-144. But the original Chaldean context may well have been a specific reference to Hecate, who is connected both with Nature and the moon. Cf., e.g., Proclus, In rem p., II, 133, 1-18: εἰς τὴν σεληνιακὴν...σφαῖραν, ἐν ἣ τῆς γενέσεως αἰτία πάσης καὶ, ὡς φησὶν τις ἱερὸς λόγος, τὸ “αὐτοπτον ἄγαλμα τῆς φύσεως” προσλαμβάνει; In Tim., III, 69, 15-16: σελήνη μὲν αἰτία τοῖς θνητοῖς τῆς φύσεως, τὸ “αὐτοπτον ἄγαλμα” οὕσα τῆς πηγαίας φύσεως. Lewy (pp. 98, n. 134; 271) connects this fragment with fr. 102-103 and 107 as interdictions against invoking Hecate “face to face,” in order to avoid attacks of demons (which Hecate controls; cf. fr. 91). Cf., also, Festugière, Rép., III, p. 77, n. 6; Tim., IV, p. 94 and n. 5.

Fr. 102

1. ἡ γὰρ τῆς φύσεως πηγὴ: An allusion to Hecate as the “source” of material generation or “Nature.” Cf., esp., the role of Hecate in fr. 51-54.

2. φύσιν/εἰμαρμένον: Here, “Nature” and “Destiny” are equated. Cf. Proclus, In Tim., III, 271, 16-17: ἐμβλέψασαι (αἱ ψυχαί) εἰς...τὴν φύσιν ἐαυτὰς εἰμαρμένη συντάττουσιν; Synesius, H. 1(3), 603-608: ἵνα χεῖρα φύσιν/οὐκ ἐπιβάλλει, ὅθεν οὐκέτι γὰ, οὐ μοιραία/κλῶσις ἀνάγκας/παλινόρσον ἄγει. See Theiler, 1942, pp. 33-34 = 1966, p. 291. In the context of the theurgic rites, “gazing” (ἐμβλέψης) at “Nature/Destiny” (or Hecate) is to invite the danger of demonic attack. Cf. fr. 101 and notes; εἰμαρμένον, fr. 103; εἰμαρτής, fr. 130; εἰμαρτήν, fr. 153. See, also, Lewy, p. 98, n. 134.

Fr. 103

1. συναυξήσης: Cf. Proclus, De prov., 164, 8: “neque coageas fatum, cuius finis...” Kroll (p. 50, n. 1) reconstructs the Greek as: μηδὲ συναυξήσης τὸ πεπωμένον, οὐ τέλος <οὐδὲν>. See, also, Lewy, p. 266, n. 23, who conjectures “Αἰδης as the missing predicate noun.

εἰμαρμένον: cj. Des Places (cf. fr. 102); τὴν εἰμαρμένην, codd. Thus, the oracle admonishes “not to increase” or “add to” the influence of demonic Destiny which infects all aspects of material creation or φύσις.

Fr. 104

1. μὴ πνεῦμα μολύνης: According to Westerink (Greek Comm. Phaedo, II, Damascius p. 193, note), only these three words belong to the Oracles and should come after fr. 105 with the following reconstruction: ζηλὸν τε φθόνον τε/ἔχβαλε, μηδὲ φρενὶ σβέσσαι, μὴ πνεῦμα μολύνης. Westerink argues that Psellus “may unwittingly have added some extraneous material to the Oracles, as he did in other cases.” Des Places, however, notes that Proclus elsewhere attests to the second half of the verse (e.g., In rem p., II, 52, 5) as does Hermias (In Phaedrum, p. 130, 28 ff.), and would thus keep the verse as is. See, “Notes,” p. 327 and testimonia to fr. 104, p. 92. In the context of the Oracles, πνεῦμα is synonymous with ὄχημα as a term for the “vehicle” of the soul. The ὄχημα-πνεῦμα, then, would be comprised of quasi-material accretions from the ether, sun, moon, and air. (Cf. fr. 61. See, also, frs. 120, 128, 129, 158, 201 and notes.) The oracle warns against “defiling” or “soiling” the vehicle; i.e., becoming totally immersed in matter (and thus subject to demonic temptation). This Chaldean expression is also familiar to Synesius: e.g., H. 1(3), 56: πνεῦμα μολύνει; 547-548: καὶ πνεῦμα σάου/ἀμόλυντον, ἀναξ; De insomn., 151 d: ἡ μὲν (sc. ψυχὴ) ἤττον, ἡ δὲ μᾶλλον, ὡς ἐκάστη ῥοπῆς ἐδυστύχησε τὸ πνεῦμα ἐμόλυνεν. See Geudtner, pp. 13-15; Theiler, 1942, p. 37 = 1966, p. 297; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 187, n. 3; Lewy, p. 184 and n. 29.

1-2. μηδὲ βαθύνης/τούπιπεδον: cj. Kroll (and thus Lewy and Des Places) to fit the meter; τὸ ἐπίπεδον, codd. Kroll’s reconstruction is rejected by Westerink, ibid., who argues that the sentence is not a verse but only has the “look” of a hexameter and that it is μολύνης which properly ends the line (see preceding note). As for the terminology, ἐπίπεδον is a geometric term borrowed from Pythagorean speculation. In Lewy’s words: “The...fragment...is explicable on the ground of the Pythagorean interpretation of the plane as the number three...The number three is in the Oracles the measure of the noetic and therefore the purport of the oracular warning is that the mortal should not ‘materialize’ his mental substance by extension into the realm of the somatic” (see p. 396 and notes 311-313). Cf. Proclus, In rem p., II, 52, 5 and In Tim., I, 146, 14-15, where ἐπίπεδον is equated with material creation. Psellus, however, understands this term as referring to the “luminous garment” (αὐγοειδῆ χιτῶν) of the soul as distinct from the πνεῦμα. But this subtlety is a Neoplatonic, not Chaldean, distinction. See, e.g., I. Hadot, Le Problème du Néoplatonisme Alexandrin, pp. 99-106.

Fr. 105

3. φρενὶ μὴ σβέσαι: Lewy (p. 265, n. 18) suggests as objects either τὸν ἀγνὸν ἔρωτα, τὸν ψυχαῖον σπινθήρα (cf. fr. 44), or τὸ ψυχῆς ὄμμα (cf. fr. 112). Cf., also, fr. 45, where the descent to matter is said to “stifle” the “true love” of the Divine. Kroll, loc. cit., compares this fragment to the series of injunctions enumerated by Proclus in De prov., 175 (144, 16-18 B.): “Te ipsum videns, verere! et, iterum: Cognosce te ipsum! iam institit, et in aliis: Extra corpus esse te ipsum crede, et es!” Kroll believes this last injunction is drawn from the Oracles. Cf. comments of Westerink in notes to fr. 104, supra.

Fr. 106

1. τολμηρᾶς: In the context of Psellus, man is “impudent” because he deigns to comprehend the workings of Nature. (Cf. fr. 107; Lewy, p. 254, n. 98.) Lewy (p. 55, n. 175) suggests that the admonition was preceded by σιγά (as in fr. 132). In Gnostic and Hermetic sources (as well as Numenius and some early passages of Plotinus), τόλμα generally describes the soul’s descent into matter as an ambitious act of self-will. But as Dodds has shown, the later Plotinus, in reaction to Gnostic thinking, views the soul’s direct descent as an inner necessity, free of deliberate willfulness. See Dodds, Pagan and Christian, pp. 23-26; Festugière, Rév., III, p. 83 ff.; Zandee, Terminology, pp. 26-28.

Fr. 107

The oracle enumerates various types of divination, all of which are to be rejected in favor of theurgy. In Lewy's words (p. 257): "As Iamblichus contends (e.g., De myst., III. 27-28; 31) theurgy is the only legitimate form of divination, as it is bound up with the apprehension of the noetic powers which are the real rulers of the Universe."

2. ἀληθείης: "Truth" is associated with the sun. See Lewy, p. 146 and n. 293; cf. p. 49, n. 158, where Lewy cites examples of Apollo's (= the sun's) association with "truth."

3. μέτρον ἡελίου κανόνας συναθροίσας: Cf. Proclus, In Tim., I, 202, 17: μετρῶν δρόμον ἡελίου κανόνας συναθροίσας. Festugière, Tim., I, p. 261, n. 1, understands κανόνας as referring specifically to astronomical or chronological "tables."

4. αἰδίῳ βουλῇ πατρός: Cf. ἀκμάδι βουλῇ (of the Father), fr. 37; βουλαῖς ἀφθέγκτοις (of the Father), fr. 77; πατρός πειθηνίδι βουλῇ, fr. 81. Cf., also, <πρωτίστου πατρός> αἰδίου νῶ, fr. 22.

5. ῥοῖζον: Cf., esp., ῥοή, fr. 56 and notes, for parallels.

6. ἀστέριον προπόρευμα: Cf. ibid., fr. 64. The entire verse is cited verbatim by Proclus, In Tim., III, 124, 31 in conjunction with fr. 64.

8. οὐ θυσιῶν σπλάγχχνων κτλ.: Cf. Synesius, De insomn., 135 c, who cites this verse verbatim as a λῶγιον.

9. φεῦγε: Common to the Oracles. Cf. fr. 130, 134, 213.

10. εὐσεβίης ἱερὸν παράδεισον: A reference to the Chaldean abode of the blessed. Cf., esp., παράδεισον, fr. 165 and notes.

11. ἀρετή: "Virtue" is an appellation of the moon. Cf. ἀρετῆς, fr. 52; Lewy, p. 221 and n. 181.

σοφία: "Wisdom" is associated with the planet Mercury. See Lewy, p. 221 and notes 183 and 184.

εὐνομία: "Good order" is an attribute of the fixed stars. See Lewy, p. 221 and n. 182.

Fr. 108

2. σύμβολα: These "symbols" are equivalent to the "tokens" (συνθήματα; cf. fr. 2, 109) as voces mysticae. This expression also designates the sacred materia (e.g., stones, herbs, scents) handled by the theurgist during some of the Chaldean rites. In this regard, cf. Psellus, P.G., 122, 1132 a; Proclus, De Magia, p. 151, 10 ff.; Bidez. For further details, see discussion in Introduction.

πατρικὸς νόος: Here, the Father or Highest God. Cf. ibid., fr. 39; πατρικὸς νοῦς, fr. 109.

ἔσπειρεν κατὰ κόσμον: "Sown in the cosmos," the symbola can be equated with the Platonic Forms (and thus with the Iynges; cf. fr. 76-78). In addition, these "symbols" are also said to be "sown in the soul" (as voces mysticae). Cf. Proclus, In Tim., I, 211, 1-2: συμβόλοις ἀρρήτοις τῶν θεῶν, ἃ τῶν ψυχῶν ὁ πατήρ ἐνέσπειρεν αὐταῖς; Psellus, P.G., 122, 1141 a: Σύμβολα πατρικὸς νόος ἔσπειρε ταῖς ψυχαῖς. See Festugière, Tim., II, p. 32, n. 1. Cf., also, ἔσπαρται, fr. 28; ἐνέσπειρεν, fr. 39 and notes.

3. τὰ νοητά: The "intelligibles" are the Ideas. Cf. ibid., fr. 8, 31, 40.

κάλλη ἄφραστα: Descriptive of the Ideas. Cf., e.g., Philo, De Opif., 71: τὰς ἰδέας θεασάμενος, ὑπερβάλλοντα κάλλη. See Lewy, p. 191 and n. 55. The vocabulary goes back to Plato, e.g., Phaedrus, 250 b-d.

Fr. 109

1. τὸ θέλειν: Cf. τὸ θέλειν κατένευσε, fr. 22 (but here, as an act of the Father); Cremer, p. 98 and n. 506.

πατρικὸς νοῦς: Cf. fr. 39 and 108.

2. λήθης: i.e., the "forgetfulness" of the soul after it has "fallen" into the body. Cf. ἐκ λήθης, fr. 171. The image is common, going back to Plato, e.g., Phaedrus, 248 c; 250 a. See Lewy, p. 190 and n. 53 for numerous parallels in a variety of sources.

ῥῆμα: Analogous to the συνθήματα/σύμβολα as well as to the ἱερῶ λόγῳ of fr. 110. Cf. Psellus' commentary, loc. cit.: συνέστη γὰρ ἡ ψυχὴ ἀπὸ τῶν ἱερῶν λόγων καὶ τῶν θεῶν συμβόλων.

3. πατρικοῦ συνθήματος ἄγνοῦ: Cf., esp., τριάδος σύνθημα, fr. 2, as a possible allusion to the triadic nature of the Highest God. "Remembering" or "focusing" on this token (= ἄνθος νοῦ? cf. notes to fr. 110) serves as an anagogic device to prod the soul upward. See further discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 110

1. ψυχῆς ὀχετόν: i.e., the "channel" or solar "ray" on which the soul both descends into the body and then ascends on high during the theurgic rites. Cf., esp., ἐμπυρίοις ὀχετοῖς, fr. 2; ὀχετῶν, fr. 66. This term is also analogous to both ἀκτῖνας, fr. 34 and αὐγὰς, fr. 115. Cf. Lewy, p. 189 and n. 45.

1-2. ἔν τινι τάξει/ἐπὶ τάξιν: For the later Neoplatonists, the term τάξις is used interchangeably with σειρά (cf. fr. 203; Bidez, C.M.A.G., IV, 1928, p. 144 and n. 1; Dodds, Proclus: El. Th., pp. 208-209). Lewy (p. 190, n. 47) sees these two prepositional phrases as referring, respectively, to the initial descent of the soul via the ether, sun, moon, and air (cf. fr. 61) and to the Ethereal order where the soul desires to return. In this latter sense, Lewy (ibid.) understands μερίς in fr. 158 as referring to the τάξις where the soul ascends. See, also, Geudtner, p. 73 and n. 316; Tardieu, "Oracles chaldaïques," pp. 200-201. Cf., also, Disc. 8-9, NHC VI, 52,7-8, where τάξις refers to the "order" of the tradition, understood here as the proper "order" of ascent through the eighth and ninth spheres, or highest levels of spiritual attainment.

2. σώματι θητεύσασα: Cf. (τὴν γένεσιν) θητεύειν, fr. 99 and notes.

<ὑπέβη καὶ πῶς>: cj. Lewy, p. 189, n. 45, based on Psellus' paraphrase.

3. αὖθις: In Tardieu's view ("Oracles chaldaïques," pp. 203-204), this term (analogous to πάλιν) underscores the "renewal," "rebirth," and "regeneration" of the soul.

ἱερῶ λόγῳ: Psellus (loc. cit.) equates this term with the ἄνθος νοῦ as ἡ ὑψηλότερα δύναμις τῆς ψυχῆς. If this equation is valid, then the function of the ἄνθος νοῦ (as a "sacred word" or synthēma; cf. ὄνομα σεμνόν, fr. 87) must, in some sense, be theurgic (and not solely contemplative, as suggested in fr. 1). See detailed discussion in Introduction.

ἔργον: i.e., the sacred activity of the theurgist. Cf. ἔργα, fr. 66 and 133. Psellus (loc. cit.) specifically understands here the material rites (τῶν ὑλικῶν τελετῶν) aimed at purifying the vehicle of the soul: οἶεται γὰρ καθαίρεσθαι τὴν ψυχὴν λίθοις καὶ πόαις καὶ ἐπωδαῖς, καὶ εὐτροχον εἶναι πρὸς τὴν ἀνάβασιν. Thus, it is both "word" and "action" which prods the soul upward. Cf., in this regard, Iambl., De myst., II.11: ἡ τῶν ἔργων τῶν ἀρρήτων καὶ ὑπὲρ πάσαν νόησιν θεοπρεπῶς ἐνεργουμένων τελεσιουργία ἢ τε τῶν νοούμενων τοῖς θεοῖς μόνον συμβόλων ἀφθέγχτων δύναμις ἐντίθησιν τὴν θεωρητικὴν ἔνωσιν.

4. παρήχθη: Tardieu ("Oracles chaldaïques," p. 201) suggests that this term properly conveys the sense of "de-rangement" (παράνοια) or "de-viation" (παρέχθασις) as found frequently in various Gnostic sources with regard to the "fall" of the soul. Cf. Des Places, "Notes," p. 327, who continues to prefer his translation of "a été produite," contra Tardieu.

5. ἀναστησάμενος: cj. Tardieu (ibid.) as a probable gloss on the part of Psellus. But Des Places, "Notes," p. 327, still prefers the reading ἄνευ κρίσεως as attested in Vaticani graeci, V, 1026, f° 227 v° and v, 573, f° 96 v°. Migne reads (mistakenly?) ἀνακτησάμενος.

διὰ τῶν τελεστικῶν ἔργων: i.e., the various material rites of a theurgic initiation. See, esp., Lewy, Exc. X, pp. 495-496.

Fr. 111

1. εὐτροχον δὲ τὸ νοερὸν: In the context of Proclus, the "intellectual faculty" of the soul is "well-wheeled" in terms of its ability to "revolve" around the Intelligible through various "perfective" means of intellection. Psellus, on the other hand, uses the expression εὐτροχον in connection with the vehicle of the soul and its ascent (see supra, notes to ἔργον, fr. 110).

2. κέντρῳ ἐπισπέρχων: An allusion to the sun as the "center" (cf. κέντρον, fr. 70) or "heart" (cf. καρδίας, fr. 58) of the planetary spheres and, thus, the "center" of the anagōgē as well. In Tardieu's words, the sun functions as a "veritable ἀναγωγεύς." See "Oracles chaldaïques," p. 204, where Tardieu compares Gos. Truth, NHC I, 45,36-39 (although here, the solar imagery is applied to Christ). Cf., also, fr. 174 re the "seven-rayed god." The literary model, however, is Il. 23, 429 ff.: Ἀντίλοχος δ' ἔτι καὶ πολὺ μᾶλλον ἔλαυνε κέντρῳ ἐπισπέρχων. See Festugière, Tim., III, p. 358, n. 2; Lewy, p. 195 and n. 75, who equates ἐπισπέρχων with ἐπιφοιτᾶν στιβαρηδόν, fr. 2; Theiler, 1942, p. 20, n. 6 = 1966, p. 276, n. 87.

φωτὸς κελάδοντος: Here, a reference to the sun. But cf. ibid., fr. 2, where this expression apparently refers to the "rushing" sound of the celestial spheres.

Fr. 112

1. ψυχῆς βάθος ἄμβροτον: Equivalent to the "eye of the soul." See Lewy, p. 169 and n. 388; cf. ὄμμα ψυχῆς, fr. 1; 213. Psellus, however, loc. cit., understands this expression as referring to the "triple powers" or "faculties" of the soul; i.e., αἱ νοεραὶ, αἱ διανοητικαί, αἱ δοξαστικάι. Psellus' explanation derives from Proclus. Cf. Exc. chald., III; p. 193, 1 Pitra, where ψυχῆς βάθος is similarly interpreted in terms of these three faculties.

ὄμματα πάντα: Again, an allusion to the "eye of the soul." According to Lewy, the hyperbolic πάντα (in an anagogic context), "is intended...to hinder the formation of any concrete association" (see pp. 373-374 and notes 235-239, where Lewy cites numerous parallels to this "eye of the soul" expression in a variety of sources). Cf., also, fr. 1, where the ἄνθος/φλόξ νοῦ terminology similarly alludes to an immediate, intuitive apprehension of the Divine, free of concrete images. In Psellus' interpretation, ὄμματα refers to the γνωστικαὶ ἐνέργειαι of the three soul faculties cited supra. Psellus goes on to say that the "eye" is the σύμβολον γνώσεως.

2. ἐκπέτασον ἄνω: Analogous to ἐκτείνας νοῦν, fr. 128; cf. τεῖναι κενεὸν νόον, fr. 1. See Lewy, p. 170. The metaphor is also found, e.g., in C.H. X.5: ἀναπετάσαι ἡμῶν τοὺς τοῦ ὀφθαλμοῦς; Philo, De Plant., 58: τῷ διανοίας ὅμματι...ἀεὶ ἀναπεπταμένῳ καὶ εὐθυτενῶς βλέποντι. For Psellus, the faculties of the soul are "stretched" towards Christ.

Fr. 113

2. χρὴ δὲ χαλινῶσαι ψυχὴν: i.e., to keep the passions in check. Cf. σώματος...μέγα βρίθοντα χαλινά, fr. 213.

3. ὅφρα μὴ ἐγκύρση χθονὶ δυσμόρῳ: Cf. Synesius, De insomn., 140 c: μέχρις ἐγκύρση τῷ μελαναυγεί (cf. μελαναυγέα, fr. 163) καὶ ἀμφικνεφεῖ (cf. ἀμφικνεφής, fr. 163) χωρῷ; H. 1(3), 660-661: μέχρις ἐγκύρση (sc. ἡ ψυχὴ)/φθονεῖ μερίδι. The fragment refers to the soul's entrapment in matter. Lewy (p. 172, n. 402, following Lydus), cites Plato, Phaedo, 81 c as the locus classicus; Geudtner (p. 13, n. 59, following Wuensch), prefers Phaedrus, 253 ff.

σαωθῇ: Cf. σῶμα σαώσει, fr. 128.

Fr. 114

2. βαπτισθεῖσα: The image is common. Cf., e.g., C.H. XII.2: σώματος γὰρ συνθέτου ὥσπερ χυμοὶ ζέουσιν ἢ τε λύπη καὶ ἡ ἡδονή, εἰς ἃς ἐμβᾶσα ἡ ψυχὴ βαπτίζεται; Synesius, Dio, 6, 1129 B: τὸ ἐν λόγοις κάλλος...οὐ βαθύνεται πρὸς ὕλην οὐδὲ ἐμβαπτίζει τὸν νοῦν ταῖς ἐσχάταις δυνάμεσι. See, also, Lewy, p. 277 and notes 76-77 for additional parallels; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 404 and n. 2.

χθονὸς οἶστροις: Analogous to χθονίων παθέων, fr. 213.

Fr. 115

1. χρὴ σε σπεύδειν πρὸς τὸ φάος κτλ.: Cf. Iambl., De myst., II.6: τοὺς ἐπὶ τὸ πῦρ σπεύδοντας; Synesius, H. 1(3), 687: ἐς τὸν ἀκηδῆ/λειμῶνα (cf. παράδεισον, fr. 165) πατρός/σπεύδω...; M. Victorinus, H. II. 46: "Propero, si iubes redire, nostri salvator, deus." Cf., also, ΔΕΠΗ, Ap. Jas., NHC I, 7,10-12; 37-38; Tri. Trac., NHC I, 123,5-11, and the famous Valentinian Gnostic formula—ποῦ σπεύδομεν—Exc. Theod. 70.2. The theme of "haste" to the Divine world is a constant in the religious traditions of this period and parallels the theme of "flight." Cf. forms of φεύγειν, in fr. 107, 130, 134, 213. The locus classicus is Plato, Theat., 176 a-b: χρὴ...φεύγειν ὅτι τάχιστα. See, also, Lewy, p. 171 and n. 396; Cremer, p. 80; Geudtner, p. 71; Hadot, Marius Victorinus, II, p. 1074; Tardieu, "Oracles chaldaïques," p. 203.

σπεύδειν: Cf. ibid., fr. 134; σπεύδοντα, fr. 6; σπεύδουσι, fr. 116.

φάος: Cf. forms of φῶς, passim.

αὐγάς: Cf. ibid., fr. 213; αὐγῆς, fr. 35. Festugière, Rév., III, p. 59, n. 1 suggests αὐλάς; similarly, Theiler, 1942, p. 35 = 1966, p. 294. Cf. αὐλή, fr. 202.

2. πολὺν ἐσσαμένην νοῦν: According to Lewy (p. 180 and n. 14; cf. p. 171, n. 396), "Intellect" is the "first constituent of the soul," followed by "Will," and "Eros," which are contained in νοῦς. Cf., esp., fr. 44 and 94. As for πολὺν, Des Places translates "multiple;" Festugière (Rév., III, p. 59), "puissant." Griffiths (CR, 25, 1975, pp. 241-242, following Merkelbach), would substitute τορὸν for πολὺν. Although this reading is plausible, forms of τορός are not attested elsewhere in the extant fragments, whereas forms of πολὺς are frequent. Cf., also, ἐσσάμενον, fr. 2; ἐσσάμενος, fr. 42.

Fr. 116

1. βροτοῖς τοῖς σῶμα νοοῦσιν: i.e., those who think in terms of sensible rather than intelligible realities. Lewy (p. 278, n. 80; cf. pp. 170-171 and n. 395) identifies the σῶμα νοοῦντες with the φιλοσώματοι of Plato, Phaedo, 68 c, who are “incapable” of φρονεῖν ἀθάντα καὶ θεῖα (cf. Tim., 90 c).

2. γυμνήτες: The “naked” soul is one that is free of its material accretions (or vehicle). The image is common. Cf., e.g., Proclus, In Alc., 63 [138, 18 Cr.] W.; 83 [180, 2 Cr.] W.; Plotinus, Enn. I.6.7.7; C.H. I.26; X.17; XIII.6; Pr. Paul, NHC I, 14, 35-36; Ap. Jas., NHC I, 20, 30-32: βαψ or καακ “αζηογ. For a general discussion, see Rist, Plotinus, pp. 188-198.

ἄνω σπεύδουσι πρὸς ὕψος: Cf., esp., fr. 115, v. 1.

Fr. 117

3. σωζόμεναι δι’ ἐῆς ἀλκῆς: Here, “strength” refers to the divine “soul spark” or “flower/flare of mind” which has the power of theurgically uniting the soul to God and thus effecting its “salvation.” In the context of Proclus, only certain exceptional individuals can be “saved” via this divine ἀλκή (cf., similarly, fr. 118). In terms of the Chaldean tradition, these “more vigorous natures” (to borrow Proclus’ phrase) would be the class of θεουργοί. Cf. Proclus, In rem p., II, 120, 3-4: δηλοῦν ἡμεῖς γε φήσομεν τὴν δι’ ἐῆς ἀλκῆς εἰς θεοῦς ἀνάτασιν τῆς τοιαύτης ψυχῆς; ibid., 112, 21-25: καὶ ψυχὴν ἔχων σώματος ὑπερορῶσαν καὶ πρὸς τὸ ἄνω βλέπειν ἐπιτηδεῖαν καὶ δι’ ἧς ἀλκῆς, κατὰ τὸ λόγιον, χωριζομένην ἀπὸ τῶν ὑλικῶν ὀργάνων καὶ εἰς τὸ ἄναντες εὐθὺ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ χωροῦσαν. See Lewy, p. 194 and n. 67: “In these passages, ἀλκή means the noetic power of the soul delivered from matter.”

Fr. 118

2. σπέρμα: Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 559-561: Σὸν σπέρμα φέρω/... σπινθηρὰ νόου; 580-581: οὐκω πᾶσαν/ἔσβεσεν ἀλκάν; 597-598: σπέρμα.../αὔξων ἐν ἐμῷ; De insomn., 138 c: τὸ νοερὸν ἐν ἡμῖν σπέρμα. This “intellectual seed,” “strength,” or “spark,” then, is that divine element within, which is freed once the vehicle of the soul is purified. It is this element (= the ἄνθος/φλόξ νοῦ; ὄμμα ψυχῆς) which has the power to elevate the soul as well as ultimately unite or “bind” it to God. See, esp., Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 183, n. 4; Geudtner, pp. 50-53.

3. φάους γνῶρισμα: According to Geudtner (p. 52), this expression is equivalent to the συνθήματα/σύμβολα. Lewy, however (p. 242 and n. 56), equates it with σημεῖα; i.e., those “signs” which precede the apparition of a deity during the theurgic rites. Cf. ἀληθὲς σῆμα, fr. 90 and notes; Iambl., De myst., II.3: γνωρίσματα θεῶν καὶ δαιμόνων; III.2: τὰ ἀληθινὰ γνωρίσματα (here, as with Synesius, in connection with dream divination).

4. ἐῆς ἀλκῆς: Cf., esp., δι’ ἐῆς ἀλκῆς, fr. 117 and notes.

Fr. 119

1. τοῦ αὐγοειδοῦς σώματος: i.e., the “vehicle” of the soul. See fr. 120 and notes. Although both Hierocles and Psellus (e.g., P.G., 122, 1137 c; see fr. 104 and notes) distinguish between a “luminous” and “pneumatic” vehicle of the soul, this distinction is Neoplatonic, not Chaldean, in origin. See Dodds, Pro- clus: El. Th., p. 320. See, also, Iambl., De myst., III.11; 14; V.26, where the terms ἀυγοειδοῦς and αἰθερωδεις are used in connection with both πνεῦμα and ὄχημα, but without the precision of Proclus. See Cremer, pp. 136-139.

τῆς τῶν ὑλικῶν μολυσμῶν: Cf. fr. 104: μὴ πνεῦμα μολύνῃς.

2. τῶν ἱερῶν καθαρμῶν: The vehicle of the soul is purified via various "material" rites. Cf., e.g., Psellus, P.G., 122, 1132 a: ὁ δὲ Χαλδαῖος οὐκ ἄλλως φησὶν ἡμᾶς ἀνάγεσθαι πρὸς θεόν, εἰ μὴ δυναμώσομεν τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ὄχημα διὰ τῶν ὑλικῶν τελετῶν. See discussion in Introduction.

4. θεοσυνδέτου ἀλκῆς: Hierocles, loc. cit., equates this expression with λύσις ψυχῆς. (See Lewy, p. 194 and n. 66.) Both expressions allude to the unfettered "soul spark" free of its vehicle. Once this stage of the ascent is achieved, the soul's "strength," "spark," "flower/flame of mind" can theurgically unite (or "bind") with God. Cf., similarly, fr. 117 and 118 and discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 120

2. ψυχῆς λεπτόν ὄχημα: i.e., the quasi-material "vehicle" of the soul made up of accretions from the ether, sun, moon, and air (see fr. 61). Although Lewy (p. 178, n. 7) accepts this fragment as genuine, he notes that Kroll (p. 47) doubted the existence of an authentic Chaldean text containing the word ὄχημα. But the use of this term (plus the doctrine associated with it) can be confidently assumed for the Chaldean tradition. See discussion in Introduction and cf. fr. 104, 128, 129, 158, 210 and notes.

Fr. 121

1 + 2. ἡ ἐμπέλαισις/ἐμπελάσας: In the context of Proclus, "approaching" is the fourth degree of prayer and precedes the fifth and final degree of ἔνωσις ("union"). The first three degrees are γνῶσις ("knowledge"), οἰκείωσις ("attraction"), and συναφή ("contact"). These five degrees are part of the ascent process and are based on a similar doctrine in Iambl., De myst., V. 26, where three degrees of prayer are mentioned; i.e., συναγωγόν, συνδετικόν (cf. θεοσυνδέτου, fr. 119), and ἡ ἄρρητος ἔνωσις. Dillon (Iamblichus Fragmenta, p. 411, n. 1) suggests that Iamblichus' theory of prayer may have had a Chaldean origin, but admits the impossibility of "secure evidence on this point." See, also, Lewy, pp. 173-174 and n. 406; Bremond, "Un Texte de Proclus," pp. 448-462.

2. τῷ πυρὶ γὰρ βρότος κτλ.: Des Places' text inadvertently omits θεόθεν from this line, although Des Places correctly translates "de Dieu". (See "Notes," p. 328, where Des Places now makes the appropriate correction in the text.) According to Lewy (pp. 173-174 and n. 406), "fire," "light," and "god" in this line all refer to Aion and not, contra Proclus, to the "light of the gods" in general. Thus the fragment describes, in Lewy's words, "the movement of the cognizer towards the noetic goal." Although "fire" and "light," in the Oracles, can refer specifically to the "intelligible light" of the Highest God and/or Aion (cf. φῶς and πῦρ in fr. 3, 5, 6, 49, 59, 115; see, also, Geudtner, pp. 66, n. 277; 77), these terms can also refer to the apparitions of various gods evoked during autoptic experiences. In this regard, cf. the use of φῶς and πῦρ in fr. 145-148. Thus, Lewy's interpretation, which is based on Theos. 13, 10 ff. (in Dodds' words, "a very weak" Chaldean source; see "New Light," p. 266 = Lewy², p. 695) is problematic.

Fr. 122

1. ἡ δὲ τῶν ἀγγέλων μερίς: i.e., the angelic order is one of the “chains” linking various aspects of the cosmos. Cf. ἀγγελικῶ χώρῳ, fr. 138; μερίς, fr. 158; τάξις, fr. 24, 110; σειρά, fr. 203.

2. τὴν ψυχὴν φέγγουσα πυρί: i.e., once the soul is filled with “divine fire” it is no longer weighed down by matter. This anagogic function of the angelic order parallels that of fr. 123.

3-4. τοῦ ἀχράντου πυρός: In later Neoplatonic interpretation, the ἄχραντοι made up a specific class of angels who dwelled permanently in the supermundane regions. See Lewy, p. 261, n. 8.

4-5. οὐκ ἐκροῖζεῖται εἰς τὴν ὑλικὴν ἀταξίαν: Forms of ῥοιζεῖν (in connection with matter) are common in the Oracles. See, esp., fr. 56 and notes to ῥοή for parallels.

5. συνάπτεται: For Proclus, “contact” (συναφή) is the third degree of prayer. See notes to fr. 121.

Fr. 123

1. ἀμιγῇ: The notion of “mixing/unmixing” intellect/soul and matter (in both cosmological and soteriological contexts) is familiar to Platonism, Hermeticism, and Gnosticism alike. See Zandee, Terminology, p. 22, for several parallels. Cf. Jonas, Gnostic Religion, p. 58 ff.

2. πνεύματι θερμῷ: In the context of Proclus, “heat” and “breath” are anagogic powers. Cf., similarly, Hermias, In Phaedrum, 197, 2 C: θέρμην γὰρ καλεῖ τὴν ἀναγωγὸν δύναμιν. See, also, Proclus, Exc. chald., II; 193,14-15 P., where “heat” and “cold” are contrasted in an anagogic context: τῷ θερμῷ προσδράμωμεν, τὸ ψυχρὸν ἐκφυγόντες. See, also, Iambli., De myst., II.6; Cremer, pp. 50-51. Elsewhere in the Oracles, “heat” and “breath” are associated with the World Soul (or Hecate) as the source of life. Cf., esp., fr. 35, 53.

3. κουφίζουσα: i.e., to “lighten” the soul from the weight of matter so that it is free to ascend. This fragment as a whole may well allude to a breathing technique of some sort. Cf. fr. 124, 130 and notes. See Lewy, p. 278 and n. 81.

Fr. 124

1. ψυχῆς ἐξωστῆρες: Psellus, loc. cit., rightly adds: ἀπὸ τῆς σωματικῆς φύσεως. ἀνάπνοοι: A possible allusion to a breathing technique as a means of suppressing the senses. Cf., e.g., Mithras Liturgy (ed. Meyer), p. 7: ἔλκε (cf. ἔλκουσαι, fr. 130) ἀπὸ τῶν ἀκτίνων πνεῦμα (cf. πνεύματι, fr. 123) γ’ ἀνασπῶν, ὃ δύνασαι, καὶ ὅψη σεαυτὸν ἀνακουφίζόμενον (cf. κουφίζουσα, fr. 123) καὶ ὑπερβαίνοντα εἰς ὕψος, ὥστε σε δοκεῖν μέσον τοῦ ἀέρος εἶναι. Cf., also, C.H. XIII.7: ἐπίσπασαι εἰς ἑαυτὸν...κατάργησον τοῦ σώματος τὰς αἰσθήσεις.

εὐλυτοί: i.e., “free” from material constraints and thus able to ascend. Lewy (p. 206, n. 124) understands this term to mean that “the purified soul is easily attracted by the ray of the sun.” Cf. Proclus, Exc. chald., II; 193,15-16 P.: ἔχομεν εὐλυτον ὁδὸν εἰς ἀνέλευσιν. Πατὴρ ὁδηγεῖ, πυρὸς ὁδοῦς ἀναπτύξασθαι. Cf., also, εὐλυτα φέγγη, fr. 125 and notes.

Fr. 125

1. ὁ δις ἐπέκεινα: i.e., the Second or Demiurgic Intellect. Cf. fr. 169 and notes.

3. εὖλυτα φέγγη: Here, according to Lewy (p. 119, n. 201), synonymous with οἱ ἀμείλικτοι κεραυνοί (cf. fr. 35 and 36) as a designation for the Ideas. Des Places, however (p. 142, following Jahn), suggests a reference to the stars.

Fr. 126

2. πυρσὸν ἀνάψασα: An allusion to the “kindling” of the “soul spark” or “flower/flame of mind.” Cf. πυρσούς ἀχμαίους, fr. 130; τοὺς πυρσούς ἀνάπτουσαι τοὺς ἀναγωγούς, fr. 190; Synesius, H. 1(3), 124: ἐπὶ σοὺς πυρσούς. See Lewy, p. 261, n. 7 d.

Fr. 127

1. ἀπλάστω ψυχῇ: Lewy (p. 171, n. 400) agrees with Psellus’ interpretation that the “unformed soul” is ἀπλουστάτην and καθαρωτάτην (cf. ἐκ καθαρῆς ψυχῆς, fr. 213) but not that it is ἀμόρφωτον and ἀδιατύπωτον.

πυρὸς ἡνία τεῖνον: Psellus interprets the “reins of fire” correctly as τῆς τοιαύτης ψυχῆς τῆς θεουργικῆς ἐστὶ ζωῆς ἢ εὖλυτος (cf. εὖλυτοι, fr. 124) ἐνέργεια ἀνατείνουσα τὸν νοῦν τὸν πύρινον εἰς αὐτὸ τὸ θεῖον φῶς. Cf. ἐκτείνας πύριον νοῦν, fr. 128; τεῖναι κενεὸν νόον, fr. 1. Cf., also, τὸ ταρσὸν τοῦ πυρός, fr. 85, as an expression equivalent to πυρὸς ἡνία. The locus classicus of this imagery is that of the charioteer in Plato, Phaedrus, esp. 246 and 253. See Lewy, p. 171 and n. 398.

Fr. 128

1. ἐκτείνας πυρίον νοῦν: Cf. νόου ταναοῦ ταναῇ φλογί and τεῖναι κενεὸν νόον, fr. 1 and notes; πυρὸς ἡνία τεῖνον, fr. 127 and notes. The “fiery intellect” of this fragment, then, is the equivalent to the “flower/flame of mind” and “spark of soul” (cf. fr. 44). See Lewy, p. 169 and n. 387; Hadot, Porphyre, I. p. 296 and n. 3.

2. ἔργον ἐπ’ εὐσεβείης: According to Psellus, αἱ τῶν τελετῶν μέθοδοι; i.e., the theurgic rites. Cf., in this sense, ἔργα, fr. 66 and 133; ἔργον, fr. 110. Cf., also, εὐσεβείης, fr. 107.

ῥευστόν: “Flowing” is characteristic of matter. Cf., esp., ῥευστά, fr. 134; ῥόθιον, fr. 186. See, also, Iren., Adv. Haer., 1.5.5: ἀπὸ τοῦ κεχυμένου καὶ ῥευστοῦ τῆς ὕλης; Tri. Trac., NHC I, 104,4: †ΖΥΓΗ ΕΤΖΕΤΕ (as cited by Tardieu, “Oracles chaldaïques,” p. 218).

σῶμα σαώσεις: In Lewy’s interpretation (p. 216 and notes 157-158, following Psellus), it is a matter of “saving” the fleshly “body” from disease or demonic infection (and not an allusion to some form of corporeal “resurrection” in the Judeo-Christian sense as Kroll, loc. cit., had suggested). In this regard, cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 544-546: καὶ σῶμα σάου/ἀρτεμές, ἐχθραῖς/ἄβατον λώβαις; 2(4), 275-276: Σῶμα δὲ σώζοι/καθαρὸν νοῦσων. But, elsewhere, Synesius uses the word σῶμα to designate the vehicle of the soul; e.g., De insomn., 136 a: σῶμα πρῶτον ψυχῆς. Cf. τὸ αὐγοειδὲς σῶμα, fr. 120. Cf., also, the subsequent lines to the hymns of Synesius cited supra; 1(3), 547-548: καὶ πνεῦμα σάου/ἀμόλυντον, ἀναξ (cf. μὴ πνεῦμα μολύνῃς, fr. 104); 2(4), 277-278: πνεῦμα δὲ σώζοι/καθαρὸν λώβας. See, also, σώζετε περίβλημα, fr. 129 (which the emperor Julian equates with σώματα) and the use of εἶδωλον in fr. 158. With this evidence, then, the oracle may well be advising “to save” the vehicle of the soul and not the fleshly “body” as such. And so Geudtner, pp. 20-24; cf. Theiler, 1942, p. 37 = 1966, pp. 296-297; Hadot, Porphyre, I, pp. 342-344 and n. 11. Such a position would accord with Iamblichus; see discussion in Introduction. One might also compare Marsanes, NHC X, 5,15-16, where “the entire defilement” (πχωρῶν τήρη) is said to be “saved.” Although, as Pearson suggests (Nag Hammadi Codices IX and X, notes ad loc.), “defilement” here may allude to the “sense-perceptible world” (αἰσθητὸς κόσμος) as a whole (which in lines 24-26 is specifically said to be “worthy of salvation”), it may also refer to the “soul garments” (ἡζβρω ψυχη) mentioned in lines 7-8. (In this regard, cf., again, fr. 104: μὴ πνεῦμα μολύνῃς. The verb μολύνειν is the equivalent of the Coptic χωρῶ.) Thus, in both instances, the notion of “defilement” can be connected with the “vehicle” of the soul (as πνεῦμα or the “soul garments” of Marsanes). If this connection is valid, then the “salvation” of the soul’s vehicle would be a doctrine common to both. On this notion, see further infra.

Fr. 129

3. σώζετε καὶ τὸ...περίβλημα βρότειον: Here, the reference more clearly refers to “saving” the vehicle of the soul (contra Lewy, who again thinks in terms of “saving the mortal body” in a medical sense; see p. 214 and n. 151 and his similar interpretation of fr. 128). Cf., in this regard, C.H. X. 17-18, where the terms περίβολαιον, ἐνδύνατα, χιτῶνα, and πνεῦμα are all used to describe the material vestitures (or “vehicle”) of the soul. Cf., also, Proclus, El. Th., prop. 209: χιτῶνων ἐνυλοτέρων. Although in the context of Julian, σώματα may have a fleshly, corporeal referent (and so the interpretation of Lewy; but cf. the use of σώμα in fr. 128), the περίβλημα of this fragment must surely refer to the vehicle of the soul. See Geudtner, pp. 20-24; cf. Tardieu, “Oracles chaldaïques,” pp. 202-203. See, also, the “soul garments” of Marsanes, as cited supra, fr. 128. The locus classicus of these ideas is Plato, Crat., 400 c: τοῦτον δὲ περίβολον ἔχειν, ἵνα σώζεται (in reference to the Orphic σώμα-σῆμα equation.)

πικρὰς ὕλης: Cf. ζητεῖ δὲ φυγεῖν τὸ πικρὸν χάος, Hipp., Elenchos, 5.10.2; p. 103, 15 W. (as cited by Tardieu, ibid., p. 207, who also contrasts the “bitterness” of matter with the “sweetness”—ζλαδ; μῆντζλδε—of the Father in various Valentinian sources). Cf., also, Plotinus, Enn. II.3.17.24-25: ὕλης...πικρὰς καὶ πικρὰ ποιούσης.

Fr. 130

1. νοήσασαι τὰ ἔργα τοῦ πατρός: A reference to the intelligible perception of the Ideas. Cf., esp., ἔργα νοήσας, fr. 39 and notes. Lewy (p. 212, n. 142) suggests this line may have made up the first verse of the oracle and proposes the following reconstruction: ὅσσοι δ’ αὖ πατὸς ἔργα νοήσασαι εὐλαβέονται. (In the context of Proclus, however, the fragment is cited in the context of his discussion of Plato, Tim. 41 e ff., re the demiurgic creation of souls and their “star” vehicles prior to embodiment.)

2. μοίρης εἰμαρτῆς τὸ πετρὸν φεύγουσιν ἀναιδῆς: The literary model is Il. 4, 488: μοῖραν δ’ οὐ τίνα φημὶ πεφυγμένον ἔμμεναι ἀνδρῶν. In the Oracles, it is the theurgist who escapes Fate (cf. fr. 153). Cf., also, Proclus, De prov., 164,27-28; p. 130,15-16 B.: "Quicumque, aiunt, patris opera intelligentes reverendi fient, sortis fatalem alam effugiunt." See Lewy, ibid.; Festugière, Tim., V, p. 141 and notes 1-2; Theiler, 1942, p. 33 = 1966, p. 292.

ἀναιδές: Elsewhere (cf. fr. 89, 135), descriptive of evil demons which, of course, pervade Nature/Destiny.

4. ἐν θεῷ κεῖνται: According to Lewy (p. 198, n. 88), analogous to θεὸν ἄγχει, fr. 97. Thus, in both instances, θεός (in Lewy's interpretation) refers to Aion. (See Lewy, esp. p. 201 ff.) The expression "to rest in God" is common. Cf., e.g., Synesius, Dio, 7, 46 B; Iambl., De myst., V.26; Plotinus, Enn. IV.2.1.9. Cf., also, Augustine, Conf. 1.1: "Donec requiescat in te," and the eschatological "rest" (ἀνάπαυσις) of Marsanes, NHC X, 2,16. See Lewy, p. 197, n. 86; Cremer, p. 46 ff.; Geudtner, 76-77; Zandee, Terminology, pp. 33-38. Cf., also, the recent study of J. Helderman, Die Anapausis im Evangelium Veritatis, (Leiden, 1984).

πυρσούς ἀκμαίους: An allusion to the noetic or intelligible "rays" of the Highest God, which correspond to the "flower/flame of mind" in the human soul. Cf. πυρσόν, fr. 126; τοὺς πυρσούς τοὺς ἀναγωγούς, fr. 190.

ἔλκουσαι: Perhaps an allusion to a breathing technique of some sort. Cf. notes to ἀνάπνοοι, fr. 124. This verse is also repeated verbatim by Damascius (Comm. Phaedo I, § 169, but substituting ἔλκοντες for ἔλκουσαι). Westerink (notes ad loc.) suggests that the proper sense here is that of "breathing," "drinking," or "feeding" on sunlight.

5. ἐκ πατρόθεν: Cf. πατρόθεν, fr. 37; <ἐκ> πατρόθεν, fr. 77.

6. ἐμπυρίων δρέπεται καρπῶν...ἄνθος: The "flower of fiery fruits" is equivalent to the "flowering flames" (supra) as the noetic/empyrean source of the "flower/flame of mind." Cf. δρεπτόμεναι πυρὸς ἄνθος, fr. 37; δρεφάμενος νόου ἄνθος, fr. 49; Proclus, In Tim., III, 82,12: πληροὶ δὲ τὰς ψυχὰς τῶν ἐμπυρίων καρπῶν; Exc. chald., I; p. 192,20-21 Pitra: τέλος δὲ τῶν ἀνόδων ἡ μετουσία τῶν θείων καρπῶν; Synesius, H. 1(3), 639-641: πυρίων δ' ἔργων/καὶ τῇδε διδου/μάρτυρα καρπόν. As a whole, the fragment suggests that the "rest" in Aion prepares the "flower/flame of mind" for the contemplative perception of the Highest God (such as described in fr. 1). See further discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 131

2. τὸν Παῖνα: In the context of Damascius, a reference to Asclepius Paean. Lewy, however (p. 200, n. 102), suggests that a "paean" or hymn was sung by the ascending soul to praise the harmony of the universe. (Cf. ἁρμονίαν fr. 97 and notes.) The singing of hymns (in both the ordinary and "ineffable" sense) is a common element in anagogic experiences. See discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 132

1. καὶ...ἐνεδείξατο: This line constitutes fr. 191.

2. σῴγ' ἔχε: In the context of Proclus, the initiate is counselled to be "silent" in the presence of the "ineffable" order of the intelligible or Empyrean World. (See fr. 191 and notes.) "Silence" is not only the proper response of the initiate at this point, but characterizes the supercelestial realm as a whole. Cf., e.g., σιγή τῶν πατέρων, fr. 16 and notes. "Silence" (interspersed with prayers and/or hymns) is also a common feature of both Hermetic and Gnostic patterns of ascent. See, e.g., C.H. XIII.16; Disc. 8-9, NHC VI, 58,20-25; 59,19-22; 60,1-5; Steles Seth, NHC VII, 127,13-16; Allogenes, NHC XI, 60,15-18. Cf., also, Synesius, H. 2(4), 82-86; Mithras Liturgy (ed. Meyer), pp. 9; 13; 21.

μύστα: Cf. Proclus, In Tim., III, 271, 24-25: κατὰ τὴν θεῶν αὐτῶν φήμην, ἣν τοῖς αὐτῶν “μύσταις” παρέδοσαν. See Lewy, p. 177, n. 2, who suggests that this comment points to the existence of a “mystery cult” in connection with the Chaldean rites.

Fr. 133

3. ιερεὺς: Equivalent to ὁ θεουργός.

πυρὸς ἔργα: i.e., the theurgic operations. Here, perhaps, an epoptic experience; cf. fr. 146 re the “fiery” apparitions of Hecate. Cf., also, πυρὸς ἀφθίτου ἔργα, fr. 66.

4. κύματι...ἄλμης: Purifications via sea-water were widely practiced in Antiquity. Marinus (Vita Procli, 18) tells us that Proclus indulged in numerous καθαρμοί (both Orphic and Chaldean), including bathing in the sea at least once a month. Cf., also, Proclus, De Magia, 151,10-12 Bidez, where Proclus mentions purifications via περιρραίνοντες θαλάττη and ἀσφάλτῳ (“sulphur”).

Fr. 134

2. μηδὲ σπεύδειν: One “hastens” or “flees” to the world of light, not to the material world of darkness. Cf., esp., χρῆ σπεύδειν πρὸς τὸ φάος κτλ., fr. 115; χρεὼ φεύγειν, v. 5. Cf., also, μηδὲ κάτω νέυσης, fr. 163 and 164.

ἐπὶ μισοφαῖ κόσμον: The material world is described as “light-hating” because it is the farthest removed from the intelligible world of light. Cf. ὁ μισοφαῖς κόσμος, fr. 181; τὸν μελαναυγέα κόσμον, fr. 163; Psellus, P.G., 122, 1149 c 3-4: ὁ ἔσχατος χθόνιος εἴρηται καὶ μισοφαῖς, ὅστις ἐστὶν ὁ ὑπὸ σελήνην τόπος.

λάβρον ὕλης: Matter is “boisterous” because of its passionate element. Cf., ibid., fr. 180.

4. αὐχμηραί: Cf. αὐχμηράν, fr. 100.

ἔργα ῥευστά: “Flowing” is characteristic of matter. Cf., esp., ῥευστόν, fr. 128 and notes. See, also, the discussion of Saffrey, loc. cit. and p. 65, who suggests that the inclusion of this line verbatim in Empedocles, καθαρμοί (fr. 121, Diels), is not part of the original text but a later interpolation based on our fragment.

5. πατὴρ νοῦ: Equivalent to πατρικὸς νόος; cf. fr. 39, 49, 108, 109. As a whole, then, the oracle underscores the importance of disengaging oneself from the thrall of matter if the anagōgē to the intelligible world is to be successful.

Fr. 135

3. πρὶν σῶμα τελεσθῆς: A probable reference to the type of lustrations described in fr. 133 (see Lewy, p. 227, n. 1). Another possibility, however, is that the term σῶμα here may allude to the vehicle of the soul (cf. the use of σῶμα in fr. 128 and notes), and thus the initiation mentioned here would include the various “material” rites specified, e.g., by Psellus, P.G., 122, 1132 a 11-12. See notes to ἔργον, fr. 110.

4. ὄντες γὰρ χθόνιοι...κύνες εἰσὶν ἀναιδεῖς: Cf. χθόνιοι κύνες, fr. 90 and ἀναιδέες, fr. 89, as similarly descriptive of evil demons.

5. προστίθαι: Saffrey, loc. cit., suggests that the use of this verb indicates that the first and third verses (as cited by Proclus) were part of the same oracle. He reconstitutes the oracle by adding δαίμονες as part of a missing first verse, keeping verses one and two as is, and replacing τάς with καί in verse 3.

6. τάς ψυχὰς θέλγοντες: Cf. Psellus, Hypotyp., 23: καὶ θέλγον τὰς ψυχὰς ἢ κολάζον τὰς ἐρήμας ἀπολειφθείσας τοῦ θεοῦ φωτός (with specific reference to the demons described in fr. 89). See Lewy, p. 264 and n. 15.

Fr. 136

2. ἐν τάξει: Cf. ἐν τινι τάξει, fr. 110 and notes.

4. ζώση δυνάμει: Cf. ἐν δυνάμει ζῶν, fr. 137 (with reference to the angelic order). But the reference here is obscure. Lewy, p. 263 and n. 11, sees an allusion here to Hecate as δύναμις, but such a possibility is unlikely; and so Cremer, p. 64, n. 227.

κενεὰς ἐπὶ πέμπει ἀταρπούς: In other words, if the proper order of ascent is not followed, the initiate is led astray by God (Aion?) himself via demonic temptation. See Lewy's discussion, pp. 262-263.

5. ἀτάκτως καὶ πλημμελῶς: Cf. fr. 2, where the initiate is analogously counselled to approach the "empyrean channels" μηδ'...σπόραδην...ἀλλὰ σιβαρηδόν.

Fr. 137

1. ἄγγελος: Angels made up one of the "orders" or "chains" (see fr. 138) of the Chaldean hierarchy and performed an anagogic role during the Chaldean rites (cf. fr. 122 and 123).

ἐν δυνάμει ζῶν: Here, "power" is clearly connected with the angelic order (in contrast to the more ambiguous use of ζώση δυνάμει, supra, fr. 136).

2. ιερατικός: Another designation for theurgy (cf. διὰ τῆς ιερατικῆς θεουργίας ἀναβαίνειν, Iambl., De myst., VIII.4), although the term has a broader application. Among the later Neoplatonists, Iamblichus is regularly regarded as the first hieratikos. See Lewy, Exc. IV, p. 464; Cremer, pp. 24-25.

Fr. 138

3. ἀγγελικῶ ἐνὶ χώρῳ: In the context of Olympiodorus (which is a commentary on Phaedo, 72 b 1-3), the point is that the post-mortem soul of the theurgist chooses to descend from the intelligible to the material sphere (via the angelic order), presumably to aid the ascent of souls (cf., in this regard, fr. 122, 123). See, also, Porphyry, De philos. ex or. haur.; Wolff, pp. 144-145, where Porphyry distinguishes a class of angels which remain in the presence of the Father (and, thus, remain in the intelligible realm), and those which function as ministering angels apart from the Father (see further discussion in Introduction). The implication, then, is that the theurgist (as a member of the "angelic" chain)—although not compelled to reincarnate (cf. fr. 160 and notes)—might choose to do so in order to help others. In this regard, cf. Psellus' report in De aurea catena (as cited by Lewy, p. 224 and n. 125) that Julian the Chaldean "prayed" that his son-to-be (Julian the Theurgist) would receive the "soul" of an "archangel." The figure of Osiris in Synesius' De Providentia is undoubtedly based on this notion. See Hadot, Porphyre, I, pp. 394-395 and notes 2-3; Cremer, pp. 64-67; Smith, Porphyry's Place, p. 132 and n. 18; Westerink, loc. cit., ad not.

Fr. 139

2-3. τὴν πυριθαλπῇ ἔννοιαν: A reference to the “kindling” of the “spark of soul,” or “flower/flare of mind” (see Festugière, Tim., II, p. 33, n. 1; cf. πυρσὸν ἀνάψασα, fr. 126). Lewy, however (p. 87, n. 77), thinks this expression refers to the World Soul as a specific object of worship, but this is unlikely. Note, also, that Lewy mistakenly reads περιθαλπῇ here, a textual error repeated by Des Places.

4. πρωτίστην...τάξιν ἐν τῇ ἱερᾷ θρησκείᾳ: In the context of Proclus, a reference to the first stage of prayer (see fr. 121 and notes) which comprises knowledge (γνώσις) of all the classes of the gods.

Fr. 140

2. δηθύνοντι: The proper sense of this verb is problematic. Lewy (p. 42 and n. 132, following Kroll) equates this fragment as a whole with fr. 141 (but in a positive sense) to mean that the “mortal” is “slow” to free the god in a mediumistic trance. Festugière (Tim., II, p. 34, n. 1) notes rightly that Lewy’s interpretation does not fit Proclus’ context and, thus, prefers to translate: “Les Bienheureux sont prompts à frapper le mortel lent à prier” (and so Des Places). But Festugière’s “à frapper” is gratuitous. In addition, since the context of Proclus is that of “continuous” (ἀδιαλείπτως) worship, then the sense of δηθύνοντι—with regard to prayer—must have the sense of “tarrying” or “prolonging” prayer (rather than “slow to pray” as Festugière suggests). Thus, the sense of the fragment must be that the gods or “blessed ones” are quick to respond on behalf of those who “tarry” or “linger” in prayer. Cf., also, in a slightly different sense, the translation of Bremond, “Un Texte de Proclus,” p. 454: “Si le mortel tarde de prier, les dieux bienheureux sont prompts à achever.”

κραιπνοί: Cf. κραιπνήν, fr. 87.

μάκαρες: Cf. νοερῶν μακάρων, fr. 56; μακάρων, fr. 160.

Fr. 141

2. ἔκλυσις...θεοῦ: i.e., the “freeing” or “loosing” of the god bound by the medium. “Binding” and “loosing” are common magical techniques. See Lewy, p. 42 and n. 132 and discussion in Introduction.

νωθρὸς βροτός: i.e., the mortal weighed down by matter.

ἐς τὰδε νεύων: cj. Cousin; ἐς τὰδ’ ἔχων, codd. In the Oracles, forms of νεύειν (cf. fr. 163 and 164) describe the turning of the soul towards matter. Thus, the fragment states that the medium who is unable to concentrate on his divine work (because of material distractions) “loosens” the conjured diety, thus negating the theurgic act. Cf., in a similar sense, fr. 211 and notes. In the context of Proclus, however, this verse is integrated into a discussion of the via negativa approach to the One (where it seems awkwardly out of place). Cf. Morrow-Dillon, p. 442, n. 74.

Fr. 142

2. σώματα: The apparitions of the gods were not necessarily in human form but could assume various symbolic shapes. Cf. the apparitions described in fr. 145-148 and see Lewy, pp. 246-247 and n. 68.

αὐτοπτοῖς φάσμασιν: Cf., esp., Marinus, Vita Procli, 28 (with regard to Hecate): ἐν τάξει (cf. fr. 110) ὁ φιλόσοφος (sc. Proclus) τοῖς Χαλδαίκοις καθαρμοῖς καθαιρόμενος (cf. fr. 133), φάσμασι μὲν Ἑκατικαῖς φωτεινέσι αὐτοπτουμένοις ὠμίλησεν. The terms αὐτοπτός, αὐτοφία, and αὐτοφανεία all comprise the vocabulary of divine self-manifestation. See Eitrem, "La Théurgie," p. 56 ff. and discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 143

2. σώματα...ὕμῶν ἔνεκεν ἐνδέδεται: Cf. ibid., fr. 142.

4. σωματικὴν εἰς ἣν ἐνεκεντρίσθητε φύσιν: A reference to the soul's entrapment in matter. Cf. Synesius, De insomn., 138 c: φύσιν δὲ ἔχει τὴν ἄπαξ ἐγκεκεντρισμένην εἰς αὐτὸ ψυχὴν ἢ ὁμορροθεῖν ἢ ἔλκειν ἢ ἔλκεσθαι. See Lewy, p. 246 and n. 68.

Fr. 144

1. ἐν τουτῷ (φῶτι): For Simplicius, a reference specifically to τὸ φῶς τὸ ὑπὲρ τὸ ἐμπύριον μονάδα (= Paternal Monad; see notes to φαός, fr. 51).

2. τὰ ἀτύπωτα τυποῦσθαί: According to Simplicius, it is in the supra(!)-Empyrean light of the Highest God that the gods take shape as τὰ αὐτοπτικὰ θεάματα. Elsewhere, however (616, 18-20), Simplicius suggests that this "forming" process takes place within the Ethereal World. See Lewy, p. 244, n. 63.

Fr. 145

2. μορφὴν φωτός: Another reference to a luminous apparition of one of the gods (perhaps Hecate). See Lewy, p. 244, n. 63.

3. ἄνω: In the context of Proclus, a reference to the Empyrean (or intelligible) World. Cf., similarly, the use of ἄνω in fr. 112, 116.

ἀμόρφωτος: Cf. ἀτύπωτα, fr. 144; πῦρ ἀτύπων, fr. 146; μορφῆς ἄτερ, fr. 148.

διὰ τὴν πρόοδον ἐγένετο μεμορφωμένη: In Proclus' interpretation, the "forming" or "shaping" of the gods takes place as a result of "procession;" i.e., the second movement of the process μονή, πρόοδος, ἐπιστροφή. But this is a Neoplatonic, not Chaldean, doctrine. See Hadot, Porphyre, I, pp. 379 and n. 4; 407. Theiler, 1942, p. 18 = 1966, p. 273, cites Synesius H. 3(5), 59: χαῖρος, ὡς πατὴρ μορφά (with reference to Christ as the "Son") as a reflection of this fragment. Similarly, cf. M. Victorinus, H. III, 151 ff.: "Forma filius...omnis forma Christus est."

Fr. 146

1. ἡ μυσταγωγία: A reference to the Chaldean tradition. Cf., e.g., Iambl., De myst., I.11: τῆς ἱερατικῆς μυσταγωγίας. See Lewy, Exc. I, p. 444 e.

θεοπαράδοτος: Again, an expression associated with the Oracles. Cf. Marinus, Vita Procli, 26: τὰ θεοπαράδοτα λόγια. See Lewy, ibid.

2. ταῦτ' ἐπιφωνήσας: The "invocation" alluded to here probably consisted of uttering nomina barbara combined with the offering of sacred materia to the god invoked (in this case, Hecate). See Lewy, p. 240, n. 52.

παιδί: According to Lewy (p. 241), the various παῖδες of this fragment refer to discarnate souls deprived of proper burial rites and who traditionally accompanied Hecate on her nighttime wanderings.

3. πῦρ: The fiery apparitions of this fragment again suggest that the deity invoked is Hecate. Lewy (p. 241, n. 53) cites as a parallel, PGM IV. 2727: Δεῦρ', Ἐκάτη, τριοδίτι, πυρίπνοα φάσματ' ἔχουσα. As such, these fiery apparitions preceded Hecate's epiphany.

σκιρτηδόν: Cf. ibid., fr. 148.

4. πῦρ ἀτύπων: Cf. τὰ ἀτύπωτα, fr. 144.

φωνήν: Cf. πυρὸς φωνήν, fr. 148 and notes.

5. ἀμφὶ γῆν: Lewy (p. 241, n. 53) suggests that the conjuration of Hecate took place in the open countryside. Cf. fr. 224 in this regard.

ῥοιζαῖον: Common to the Oracles. Cf., esp., ῥοή, fr. 56 and notes for parallels.

6. ἵππον: Horses were traditionally associated with Hecate. See Lewy, p. 242 and n. 55.

7. ἐποχούμενον: Here, literally; but cf. frs. 36 and 193, where this term is used in a metaphysical sense.

9. τοξεύοντα: In Lewy's interpretation (p. 242, n. 54), the "archer" here represents those unburied heroes who have suffered a violent death; therefore, like the παῖδες, they were doomed to accompany Hecate on her various wanderings.

Fr. 147

1. μοι: The speaker is Hecate; see Lewy, p. 242, n. 57.

πάντα λέοντα: codd. But Lewy, (ibid., following Lobeck, Aglaoph., 104) prefers the reading πάντ' ἀχλύοντα and thus understands the oracle as referring to various cosmic perturbations that preceded the manifestation of Hecate. In Psellus' interpretation, however, λέοντα is understood as a zodiacal reference. For Psellus, the fragment as a whole alludes to the invocation and manifestation of this "leonine source" during the course of a Chaldean rite. But a "leonine" allusion to Hecate is also possible. Cf. Kroll, p. 30: "Leones autem matris magnae curram vehunt."

2-4. οὔτε γὰρ οὐράνιος...χθὼν οὐχ ἔστηκεν: Cf. Iambl., De myst., II.4: καὶ τὸν ἥλιον καὶ τὴν σελήνην τε γῆν μηκέτι δύνασθαι ἐστάναι αὐτῶν κατιόντων (sc. τῶν θεῶν). This is a paraphrase of our fragment. See Lewy, ibid., who also notes that Hecate, in the Chaldean tradition, was regarded as a celestial, not chthonian deity. Cf., e.g., frs. 219 and 221.

4. κεραυνοῖς: Elsewhere, descriptive of the Ideas. Cf. fr. 35.

Fr. 148

1. μορφῆς ἄτερ: Analogous to ἀτύπωτα, fr. 144; ἀτύπων, fr. 146. Cf., also, μορφήν, fr. 145.

εὐτερον πῦρ: Descriptive of the Empyrean World. Cf., e.g., ἱερός, fr. 73 and notes. See, also, fr. 144 and notes, where Simplicius states that the gods are formed in the Empyrean light of the Father. In Psellus' interpretation, this fire is "very holy" ὡς ἐν καλῷ τοῖς ἱερατικοῖς ἀνδρασιν (sc. τοῖς θεουργοῖς) ὁρώμενον.

2. σκιρτηδόν: Cf. ibid., fr. 146. Psellus paraphrases this term as ἰλαρῶς καὶ χαρίεντως.

κατὰ βένθεα κόσμου: Here, the "depths" of the terrestrial world. Cf., in this sense, the use of βυθός and βάθος in fr. 163 as descriptive of τὸν μελαναυγέα κόσμον. Cf., also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 631; 5(2), 49: βένθεα κόσμου. Lewy (p. 244 and n. 63), citing Iambl., De myst., II.7 (ψυχῆς δὲ τῆς μὲν ὅλης... πῦρ ὁράται ἀνείδειον περὶ ὅλον τὸν κόσμον) equates the World Soul of this similarly worded passage with Hecate, and thus understands this fragment as an invocation of the goddess. See, also, Cremer, pp. 99-100.

3. κλῦθι πυρὸς φωνήν: Cf. πῦρ ἀτύπωτον, ὅθεν φωνήν προθέουσιν, fr. 146. Evidently Hecate communicated with the theurgist from the midst of her fiery apparition. Cf., esp., C.H. I.4: φωνῇ πυρός. See Nock-Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum, I, notes ad loc.

Fr. 149

1. δαίμονα πρόσγειον: An evil demon. Cf. the χθόνιοι κύνες of fr. 90, 91, and 135. Psellus adds that such demons are τῆς ἀφεγγοῦς ὕλης ἀναπεπλησμένοι.

2. λίθον μνίζουριν: Offering the mnizouris stone (derivation conjectural; see Lewy, p. 290, n. 117; Des Places, p. 103) was a means of placating hylic demons during the course of a theurgic rite. Elsewhere, Psellus (P.G., 122, 1132 a 11-12), indicates that the offering of λίθοις also helped purify the ὄχημα τῆς ψυχῆς.

Fr. 150

1. ὀνόματα βάρβαρα: The nomina barbara had magical efficacy in the sacred rites, and can be equated with the συνθήματα/σύμβολα. (See, also, the discussion in Iambl., De myst., VIII.4-5 and C.H. XVI.2 on this same subject.) Unfortunately, however, the extant fragments do not preserve any of these magical formulae. But such strings of vowel and consonant sounds are preserved in numerous parallel sources. Cf., e.g., Gos. Eg., NHC III, 66,8-9 = IV, 78, 11; 66,13-20 = 78,17-19; Disc. 8-9, NHC VI, 56,17-21; 61,10-15; Mithras Liturgy (ed. Meyer), passim. See Lewy, pp. 239-240 and notes; discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 151

2. συνοχηῖδας: Although Proclus uses this term here in a mathematical context, as a Chaldean expression it is analogous to forms of συνοχής. Cf. fr. 32, 80, 82, 177, 207. See Lewy, p. 109 and n. 173. Kroll, loc. cit., suggests an allusion to "figuras magicas."

Fr. 152

1. (ὁ) ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα: i.e., the Father or Highest God. See fr. 169 and notes.

2. ἀμιστύλλευτος: This expression underscores the unity of the Highest God, who is not subject to any form of division. (Cf. Damascius, II, 43, 23, who equates this term with ἀμερής.) The process of division begins only at the level of the Second God; cf., e.g., μετρεῖται, fr. 31 and notes. See, also, Lewy, p. 81, n. 56; Des Places, p. 145; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 296 and notes 8-10.

Fr. 153

1. ταύτη (sc. τῇ πεντάδι): In the context of Lydus, the equation of the number "five" with Heimarmene is also cited as a Pythagorean doctrine.

τὰς ἀποκαθισταμένας ψυχάς: This expression alludes to the Neoplatonic doctrine of the re-establishment or re-integration of souls at the end of a world-cycle (see Dodds, Proclus: El. Th., p. 302.) But Lydus' use of this terminology in connection with the number "five" (as equivalent to Heimarmene) is unclear.

3. ὕφ' εἰμαρτήν: In a Chaldean context, a reference to the corruption of material nature. (Cf. fr. 102 and 103, where εἰμαρμένη and φύσις are equated.) Thus, the fragment states that the theurgists are not subject to the passions of nature. Cf., Iambli., De myst., V.18: ἡ πολλὴ μὲν ἀγέλη (see infra) τῶν ἀνθρώπων ὑποτέτακται ὑπὸ τὴν φύσιν...συνπληροί τε τῆς εἰμαρμένης τὴν διοίκησιν. See Lewy, p. 212 and n. 143. Cf. Tardieu, "Oracles chaldaïques," pp. 222-225, who argues, contra Lewy, that this verse reflects the idea of astral fatalism, a view now accepted by Des Places ("Notes," p. 328). Cf., also, fr. 130, v. 1.

ἀγέλην: Cf. ἀγγελιδόν, fr. 154. In the passage cited supra, Iamblichus distinguishes three classes of men: a) the "herd" (ἡ ἀγελή), or the mass of men dominated by the passions; b) the "few" (οἱ ὀλίγοι), or those men "separated" from the passions; c) the "ones in between" (ἐνιοὶ δὲ μεταξύ), or those who—in Iamblichus' words—are "between" ἡ φύσις and ὁ καθαρὸς νοῦς. Cremer (pp. 123-130) believes this tripartite distinction may well have originated with the Chaldean tradition (with the "few" equivalent to the theurgists). See further discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 154

1. φευκτέον: Cf., esp., χρεὼ φεύγειν, fr. 134.

2. ἀγγελιδόν: Cf. ἀγέλην, fr. 153. In the context of Proclus, the "herd" is comprised of those men who are embroiled in "opinions" as well as "irrational pleasures." See Lewy, p. 55 and n. 171.

Fr. 155

2 + 4. δύσκαμptos καὶ ὀπισθοβαρής...φωτός: Kroll, loc. cit., (following Schoell) believed this verse to be authentic. (Schoell reconstructed the hexameter by placing φωτός before ἄμιρος; and so Des Places, p. 104.) However, Lewy (p. 278, n. 77) rejects a Chaldean origin, noting that ὀπισθοβαρής is a Plotinian term (e.g., Enn. VI.9.4.22) and that Proclus, elsewhere, never uses the expression ὡς εἰπεῖν to introduce Chaldean terms. But cf. Geudtner, p. 12, n. 56, who suggests that the phrase "ἐμβριθεῖς καὶ ὀπισθοβαρεῖς" (used by Proclus, In Crat., 69,10) may have been the beginning of a Chaldean hexameter. Since Synesius (who antedates Proclus) uses similar terminology (e.g., H. 1(3), 523: βρίθει; 2(4), 289: τοὺς χθονοβριθεῖς; 5(2), 88: ἐπιβρίση; De insomn., 138 c:...βρίθον...βαρυνθῆαι), a Chaldean origin must still be considered a likely possibility for our fragment. Cf., also, βρίθοντα, fr. 213. The locus classicus of this terminology is Plato, e.g., Phaedo, 81 c; Phaedrus, 246 d. In this regard, Festugière (Rév., III, p. 53, n. 7) suggests that Plotinus and the Chaldeans would be utilizing this common Platonic vocabulary, since it is doubtful that Plotinus ever directly borrowed from the Oracles. See, also, the similar remarks of Hadot, "Bilan et perspectives," Lewy², pp. 709-711.

Fr. 156

1. κυνῶν ἀλόγων: i.e., evil demons. Cf. fr. 90, 91, 135; Proclus, In Tim., III, 157,27: εἴπερ γάρ εἰσιν δαίμονες, ὡς οἱ θεουργοὶ λέγουσιν. See, also, Lewy, p. 264 and n. 16.

2. οἱ ζῶντες πονηρὰν ζωὴν: Equivalent to the "herd" of fr. 153 and 154.

Fr. 157

1. ἀγγεῖον: Psellus correctly interprets this term (albeit circuitously) as referring to the human body. The image of the body as a "vessel" is common. Cf., e.g., Philo, Post. Cain., 137; Migr. Abr., 193; 197. See, also, κύτος, fr. 186 and notes; Lewy, p. 265 and n. 19.

θῆρες χθονός: Again, evil demons. Cf., esp., θηροπόλον, fr. 89 and notes.

Fr. 158

1. (τὸ πνεῦμα): i.e., the vehicle of the soul. Cf., esp., πνεῦμα, fr. 104 and notes.

4. τὸ τῆς ὕλης σκύβαλον: In the context of Synesius, an equivalent term for the πνεῦμα or vehicle of the soul. Psellus, however, loc. cit., mistakenly interprets this term as referring to the body (σῶμα) as a whole (influenced here by the Jewish parallels of Elijah and Enoch, who were "translated" bodily to Heaven; this notion of a "corporeal" resurrection is also the opinion of Kroll, loc. cit.). Lewy (p. 213 and notes 144-146), although rightly rejecting the idea of a "corporeal" resurrection as an authentic Chaldean teaching, nonetheless still understands τὸ σκύβαλον as referring to the fleshly body and not the vehicle of the soul. Lewy's interpretation is based on his erroneous understanding of σκύβαλον and εἰδῶλῳ as contrasting rather than equivalent terms (see infra).

κρημνῶ: In Psellus' interpretation, a reference to the Material World (cf. κρημνός, fr. 164). Although Lewy (ibid.) thinks that this term refers specifically here to Tartarus (in the Underworld sense), the Chaldean conflation of Tartarus with the world of matter (see fr. 164 and notes) makes such a singular judgement problematic.

5. εἰδῶλῳ: In Synesius' interpretation, equivalent to τὸ τῆς ὕλης σκύβαλον as descriptive of the πνεῦμα or vehicle of the soul. Cf. Porphyry, Sent. 29; p. 18 [13,7-14,1 M.], 3-12 L., where εἰδῶλον and πνεῦμα are similarly equated. (See Lacombrade, Synésios, pp. 156; 164-169; Geudtner, p. 22; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 343, n. 11; Dillon, Iamblichii Fragmenta, 373, n. 1; Des Places, p. 155, who all agree with Synesius' interpretation.) Since Psellus equates εἰδῶλῳ here with the irrational soul (ἡ ἄλογος ψυχή) and not the vehicle per se, it is possible that the Chaldeans may well have conflated the two without clear distinctions.

Lewy, however (p. 219), interprets εἰδῶλῳ here as referring to the soul in general, contrasting εἰδῶλῳ (as soul) with τὸ σκύβαλον (as body). According to Lewy, the oracle as a whole promises the Chaldean initiate that his "body" (or "the dregs of matter") will be saved from post-mortem demonic persecution, while his "soul" (or "image") will travel upward. However, the oracle is not contrasting but equating τὸ σκύβαλον and εἰδῶλῳ. Thus, the oracle promises the initiate that his vehicle (= "the dregs of matter" and "image") will also be saved (cf. fr. 128, 129 and notes in this regard). Since Lewy (p. 219, n. 168, following Dodds) rejects the possibility that the Chaldeans taught the post-mortem survival of the soul's vehicle, he is necessarily driven to this particular reading of the fragment. But the majority of more recent scholars (see supra) accepts Synesius' interpretation of this fragment as an accurate reflection of Chaldean teaching.

μερίς: Equivalent to τάξις. Cf. Synesius, ibid., 141 b: ἔχει γὰρ τινα, φησίν, ἐν αὐτῷ μερίδα, τοῦτ' ἔστιν ἐν τάξει τινι τοῦ κυκλικοῦ γίνεσθαι. Cf., also, fr. 110 and notes.

εἰς τόπον ἀμφιφάοντα: Descriptive of the Empyrean or intelligible World (cf. ἀμφιφαοὺς, fr. 1 and notes). In Synesius' interpretation (141 b), the vehicle of the soul (here, τὴν μέσσην φύσιν) becomes situated at the "summit of the elements" where it γέυσται ἂν τοῦ ἀμφιφαοῦς (of the intelligible order). In Psellus' interpretation, it is the irrational soul which finds a place "above the moon." Thus, in both instances, the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα and/or irrational soul finds a permanent post-mortem dwelling place at the level of the Ethereal order.

Fr. 159

1-2. βίη...κατάρατοι: This fragment is particularly difficult and has been variously emended and interpreted. Psellus, for one, interprets the fragment in a Christian context and sees an allusion to Christian martyrs whose violent deaths render their souls "purer" than those who have died by illness. Lewy (p. 205 and n. 122) keeps Psellus' reading of καθαρώταται (although omitting ἀνθρώπων) and translates: "The souls of those who have left their bodies violently are the purest." For Lewy, this statement refers to a "mystic voluntary suicide" on the part of the Chaldean initiate. But such a conjecture is gratuitous. As Dodds ("New Light," p. 269 = Lewy², p. 698 and n. 21) points out, "Olympiodorus" (= Damascius, In Phaed., 369 (243, 4-6 N.) W.) distinguishes a "theurgic" death from that by suicide or violence. Dodds prefers Kroll's emendation of κατάρατοι (and sees a reference here to the βαιοθάνατοι; i.e., the ghosts of those improperly buried, such as those killed in battle, who are doomed to restlessly wander the earth). I would agree with this interpretation and see a connection with fr. 146, where various ghostly apparitions are associated with Hecate.

However, another interpretation has been suggested by M. L. West (CR, N.S. 18, 1968, pp. 257-258) and subsequently adopted by Des Places. West has restored the second verse by using the line found in Schol. Arr. Epict., IV, 7, 27, p. 422 Schenkl²: ψυχὰι ἀρῆϊφατοι καθαρώτεραι ἢ ἐπὶ νοούσις. However, the supposition that this is a Chaldean verse is unwarranted. The idea that death on the battlefield is superior to death by illness cannot be supported elsewhere as a Chaldean belief. (I am grateful to H.-D. Saffrey for this observation.)

M. Marcovitch (AJP, 96, 1975, p. 30) has also found problems with West's emendation. His objection is to ἀρῆϊφατοι, which Marcovitch finds redundant after βίη. Marcovitch prefers to eliminate ἀρῆϊφατοι and keep the ἀνθρώπων of the better class of Psellus' manuscripts. On this last point, I would agree. However, Marcovitch would keep the reading καθαρώτεραι and supplement <ἢ ἐν νοούσις> (following West). But this reading still assumes that death by force (whether by suicide or other means)—as preferable to death by natural causes—is a Chaldean tenet. Once again, this is a dubious assumption. Therefore, Kroll's emendation (with Dodds' interpretation) remains the preferred reading of this admittedly problematic bit of verse.

Fr. 160

3. θεσμὸν...ἄλυτον: According to fr. 138, the souls of the theurgists are seemingly exempt from this "law" of transmigration (unless they "choose" to reincarnate). Cf. C.H. X.19: οὐδὲ θέμις ἐστὶν εἰς ἀλόγου ζώου σῶμα ψυχὴν ἀνθρωπίνην καταπεσεῖν. θεοῦ γὰρ νόμος οὗτος φυλάσσειν ψυχὴν ἀνθρωπίνην ἀπὸ τῆς τοσαύτης ὕβρεως. But cf. X.7; 8, where the opposite view is expressed. See Nock-Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum, I, notes ad loc.; Lewy, p. 222 and n. 190.

μακάρων: i.e., the gods. Cf., esp., μάκαρες, fr. 140.

5. οὐκ ἐπὶ θηρῶν: Cf., on the other hand, Plotinus, e.g., Enn. III.4.2; IV.3.12, who asserts that a soul might be reborn in either animal or vegetable form as a consequence of yielding to its irrational nature. Porphyry (under the influence of the Oracles, no doubt) rejected this type of transmigration (see, e.g., De regressu an., p. 38*, 10-15, Bidez; Lewy, p. 454, and n. 21). Porphyry, contra Plotinus, also seemingly maintained that the soul which had attained the intelligible order (via philosophical purification) would no longer be subject to reincarnation at all. This would also be true of the theurgists; see fr. 138 and notes. But Proclus (following Plotinus) rejected the permanent release of the soul (e.g., El. Th., prop. 206), but with the qualification that certain outstanding souls might spend several world-cycles in the intelligible order (e.g., In Crat., p. 68, 10-69, 3). See the discussion in Smith, Porphyry's Place, p. 56 ff.

Fr. 161

1. ποιναὶ μερόπων ἄγκτειραι: In Psellus' paraphrase: αἱ τιμωρητικαὶ τῶν δαιμόνων φύσεις καὶ βάσκανοι τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων ψυχῶν, ἐνδεσμοῦσι ταύτας τοῖς ὕλικοις πάθεσι καὶ οἷον ἀπάγχουσι. Lewy, however (p. 298, n. 151), understands ποιναὶ as a general, not personified, reference to post-mortem punishments in Hades. But either interpretation is plausible, as the Chaldeans conflate Hades with the Material World. In this regard, cf. C.H. I.23, where the "avenging demon" (τιμωρῶ δαίμονι) chastises via τὴν ὀξύτητα τοῦ πυρός (in a post-mortem context) as well as "attacking" αἰσθητικῶς. See Nock-Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum I, notes ad loc., for additional parallels in a variety of sources. See, also, notes to τιμωροὺς τῶν ψυχῶν, fr. 90.

Fr. 162

1. κατωρύεται: Lewy (p. 299 and n. 158) cites the "roaring" Erinyes in Eurip., Iph. Taur., 293; Kroll, loc. cit., refers to the "roaring" chasm of Tartarus mentioned in Plato, Rep. X, 615 e.

χθών: In the context of Psellus, a reference to Hades; i.e., ὁ ὑπὸ γῆν τόπος.

ἐς τέκνα μέχρις: Cf. Plato, Rep. II, 366 a, where retribution in Hades extends up to the third generation. See Lewy, pp. 298-299 and notes 153-154; Des Places, pp. 182-183, for additional parallels.

Fr. 163

2. μηδὲ κάτω νεύσης: Cf. ibid., fr. 164; τὸ κάτω, fr. 34; ἐς τάδε νεύων, fr. 141. Forms of νεύειν are used regularly in both Middle Platonic and Neoplatonic sources to describe the fall of the soul into matter. See, e.g., Lewy, p. 294 and n. 136, for several parallels. Cf., also, Cremer, p. 82 and n. 371; Hadot, Porphyre I, p. 185 and n. 5. Occasionally, however, νεύειν also describes the turning of the soul above. Cf., e.g., Plotinus, Enn. IV.4.8.54: πρὸς ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ νεύσει. (Cf., also, VI.6.1.13; 9.9.11.) See, also, Synesius, Dio, 45 A; 50 B: ἐπὶ τὰ ἄνω νεύσαι. See Geudtner, p. 10 and n. 47.

τὸν μελαναυγέα κόσμον: Descriptive of matter. Cf. ἐπὶ μισοφαῇ κόσμον, fr. 134; ὁ μισοφαῆς κόσμος, fr. 181; Synesius, H. 1(3), 297-300: ψυχὰ τ' ἀκλινῆς/καὶ κλινομένα (cf. ἐπεγκλίνης, fr. 1)/ἐς μελαναυγεῖς/χθονίους ὄγκους. See Lewy, pp. 295-296 and notes 137-138.

3 + 5. βυθός/βάθος: Here, identified with matter. Cf., e.g., Synesius, H. 1(3), 562: ἐς βάθος ὕλας; 2(4), 54-55: βάθη...κόσμου; Psellus, P.G., 122, 1149 c 5: τὴν ὕλην ἣν καλοῦσι βυθόν. Cf., also, βένθεα κοσμοῦ, fr. 148 and notes; Lewy, p. 296, n. 139.

3. ἄμορφος: Dam.; ἄπιστος, Synesius. The idea of matter as "unformed" or "formless" derives from Plato, Tim., 51 a, where the "Receptacle" (ὑποδοχήν) of the "generated world" is referred to as ἀνόρατον εἶδος τι καὶ ἄμορφον (albeit μεταλαμβάνον τοῦ νοητοῦ). Similarly, in the Oracles, matter is also ἄμορφος (albeit πατρογενές; see Psellus, Hypotyp., 27). For Plotinus, both the One and matter are similarly "unformed;" however, with Plotinus, the One is understood as being beyond form, whereas matter, in contrast, is devoid of form (and, consequently, needs to be informed). In this regard, cf. fr. 100, where matter is described as αὐχμηράν. See, also, fr. 18 and notes, and discussion in Introduction.

ἀειδής: Synesius, loc. cit., reads ἄδης here, but Terzaghi has emended the text to ἀειδής, based on Damascius' manuscript. (Terzaghi evidently misread Kroll here and therefore mistakenly attributed the line to Psellus.) The etymology Hades = Unseen, is based on Plato; e.g., Gorg., 493 b: ὡς τῶν ἐν Ἅιδου—τὸ ἀϊδές δὴ λέγων. Cf. Phaedo, 80 d; Crat., 403 a. See, also, Lewy, p. 296, n. 142.

4. ἀμφικνεφής: Synonymous with μελαναυγέα, supra.

ῥυπόων: According to Lewy (p. 298, n. 148), descriptive of the "filth" of the Underworld where, especially, the sinners of Orphic teaching were doomed to suffer.

εἰδωλοχαρής: In the context of Synesius, this term is equated with the (ὄχημα)πνεῦμα. (Cf., in this sense, εἰδῶλω, fr. 158 and notes.) For Synesius, these three verses describe the descent of τὸ νοερὸν σπέρμα (= "spark of soul," "flower/flame of mind") into matter. Cf., also, H. 1(3), 90-94: δαίμων ὕλας/νεφέλα ψυχᾶς/εἰδωλοχαρής/εὐχαῖς σκύλακας/ἐπιθωῦσσω. Des Places (p. 146, following Keydell, 1941) suggests that this term is descriptive of the "insubstantiality of matter;" Lewy (p. 297) sees an allusion to the "shades" of Hades.

ἀνόητος: Matter, as the antithesis of the intelligible world, is necessarily "without reason." Cf., e.g., fr. 156, where the "demons" or "dogs" of matter are similarly described as ἀλόγων.

5. κρημνώδης: Cf. κρημνῶ, fr. 158; κρημνός, fr. 164.

σκολιός: Cf. σχολιοῖσι, fr. 172; C.H. I.4: σκότος (= matter)...σκολιῶς ἐσπειραμένον, ὡς <ὄφει>. See Nock-Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum I, notes ad loc. Lewy (p. 297, n. 147) sees a further allusion to the sinuous rivers of the Underworld.

πηρὸν βάθος αἰὲν ἐλίσσων: Cf. Numenius, fr. 3 (Des Places): ποταμὸς γὰρ ἡ ὕλη ροώδης καὶ ὀξύρροπος, βάθος καὶ πλάτος καὶ μῆκος ἀόριστος καὶ ἀνήνυτος. See Lewy, p. 296, n. 143.

6. νυμφεύων ἀφανὲς δέμας: According to Lewy (p. 297, n. 145), this image is developed from those passages in Plato's Timaeus, e.g., 50 d; 51 a (see supra); 52 d, where matter is connected with female generation.

ἀργόν: Cf. ἀργῶ, fr. 94.

Fr. 164

1. μηδὲ κάτω νεύσης: Cf. ibid., fr. 163.

κρημνός: Cf. κρημνῶ, fr. 158; κρημνώδης, fr. 163. See, also, Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 84, n. 4, who cites several parallels in various Latin sources.

2. ἑπταπόρου...κατὰ βαθμίδος: In the context of Psellus, a reference to the seven planets through which the soul makes its descent to earth. Lewy, however, translates "sevenfold ladder" (see pp. 294 and n. 133; 414 and n. 50) and sees a similarity to the κλῖμαξ ἐπτάπυλος of the Mithraic mysteries (and so Dodds, "New Light," p. 272 = Lewy², pp. 700-701.) But Lewy adds (p. 414): "Whether the Oracles use this figure only as a metaphorical description of an intellectual ascent to the apprehension of the noetic world, or whether they refer thereby to a specific practice in the celebration of the mystery, which was acted out apart from the 'elevation' to the sun can no longer be known. It is not impossible that the ascent to the supramundane (the 'eighth' zone) formed the initiation of the highest class of initiates, to whose souls the final translation into the Empyrean was promised." In this latter regard, cf. C.H. XIII.9; Disc. 8-9, NHC VI, 52,13; 54,28; 63,9, where forms of βαθμός refer to the various spiritual "stages" or "degrees" of the ascent process, the final stage that of ascent to the "ninth."

σύρων: Common to the Oracles in various contexts. Cf. fr. 34, 63, 70.

Fr. 165

1. ζήτησον παράδεισον: Although Psellus cites this fragment as part of an oracular verse (and so Des Places), it is most likely a part of Psellus' commentary on fr. 107, v. 10. (See Kroll, loc. cit.; Lewy, p. 221, n. 178; Tardieu, Lewy², p. 680.) In conjunction with fr. 107, Lewy (p. 220 ff.) locates the Chaldean "paradise" at the level of the World Soul. Psellus, however, situates "paradise" at the level of the Highest God in terms of the "chorus of divine powers" which surrounds this god. Psellus, P.G., 122, 1129 b, also identifies the Chaldean "paradise" with the Homeric Elysian Fields (as a "meadow"), but for Psellus, this is clearly a "noetic" meadow: ὁ λειμῶν τῶν ὑψηλοτέρων θεωρῶν. In this latter regard, cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 687 ff., where it is the "meadow" (λειμῶνα) of the Father where Synesius yearns to go in order to join the "kingly choir" (σὺν ἀνακτι χορῶ) in "intellectual hymns" (νοερούς ὕμνους). Similarly, in C.H. I.26, the elevated soul—at the "eighth" level of ascent—joins in hymns of praise with the various powers surrounding the Father: καὶ ὁμοιωθεὶς τοῖς συνοῦσιν ἀκούει καὶ τινων δυνάμεων ὑπὲρ τὴν ὀγδοακτὴν φύσιν φωνῇ τινὶ ἡδεῖα ὕμνουσῶν τὸν θεόν. Cf. Disc. 8-9, NHC VI, 59,28-32: ΔΓΩ ΤΗΝΑΥ ΕΘΟΓΔΟΑΣ Μῆ ΝΨΥΧΗ ΕΤΗΖΗΤΩ Μῆ ΝΑΓΓΕΛΟΣ ΕΥΡΖΥΜΝΕΙ ΕΘΕΝ-ΝΑΣ Μῆ ΝΕΣΔΥΝΑΜΙC. In light of this evidence, it is probable that the Chaldean "paradise" was understood in Psellus' sense; i.e., as a "chorus of divine powers" which praise the Father with hymns.

2-3. τὰ ἐμπύρια κάλλη τῶν δημιουργικῶν πηγῶν: An allusion to the Ideas. Cf. κάλλη ἄφραστα, fr. 108 and notes; πηγαῖς, fr. 49 and notes.

Fr. 166

1-2. μὴ ἱξάξης, ἵνα μὴ τι ἔχουσα/ἐξίη: Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) does not accept this fragment as authentic, but regards it as a Porphyrian oracle which has been conflated with Plotinus, Enn. I.9: οὐκ ἐξάξεις, ἵνα μὴ ἐξίῃ· ἐξελεύσεται γὰρ ἔχουσα τι...Kroll, loc. cit., also denies the fragment's authenticity, assigning it a Pythagorean origin. In this regard, cf. Dodds ("Theurgy," 1947, p. 57, n. 26a = 1957, pp. 301-302, n. 26), who points out that the "fragment cannot come from a hexameter poem. The doctrine is Pythagorean." Lewy (p. 474) also denies the fragment's authenticity, arguing that Psellus misread his source (Proclus) at this point. According to Lewy, Proclus' attribution was to the Orphic not Chaldean tradition (the confusion resulting from the common use of the term θεολόγοι). Des Places, however (p. 165, following Psellus), accepts the fragment as authentic, but notes that this would be the only instance in the Enneads where Plotinus cites the Oracles. Finamore, (Iamblichus and the Theory of the Vehicle of the Soul, p. 8, n. 10) also argues for the fragment's authenticity, suggesting that Plotinus may well have become acquainted with "Chaldean beliefs" through his students and would not have found this particular bit of verse objectionable. But this is conjectural, as we simply have no direct evidence that Plotinus was familiar with the Oracles. (See notes to fr. 155 in this regard.) In addition, Des Places also admits that the meter is difficult, even with his transposition τι ἔχουσα (codd.: ἔχουσά τι). The best evidence, then, is that the fragment is not Chaldean in origin.

Fr. 167

My translation of this fragment and introductory material is a slightly revised version of that of Morrow, p. 123.

4. κέντρον: In the context of Proclus, it is a matter of the "mathematical center" which "typifies" πασῶν ἀρχηγὸν τῶν πεπληθυσμένων προόδων. In this sense, cf. fr. 189, where Proclus alludes to the World Soul (= Hecate) as containing τὸ κέντρον τῆς προόδου τῶν ὄντων ἀπάντων ἐν ἑαυτῇ. Elsewhere in the Oracles (see fr. 50 and notes), Hecate is also referred to as κέντρον. (In fr. 70 and 111, however, κέντρον refers to the central position of the sun.) But Lewy (p. 97, n. 130) connects this fragment with the introductory material to fr. 65 and thus understands κέντρον here as a reference to the earth. Similarly, Lewy understands κέντρον in fr. 70 as referring to the earth. In both cases, however, Lewy contradicts what he is aware of elsewhere; that it is the sun, not the earth, which occupies the central position in Chaldean cosmology.

ἄντυγος: For Proclus, this term is equated with τὴν περιφέρειαν ("circumference") in a mathematical context. Thus, for Proclus, πᾶσαι ἴσαι would refer to τὰς γραμμὰς (I. 2). Lewy, however, would equate ἄντυγος (in a Chaldean context) with the "vault" of heaven. For Lewy, then, the fragment as a whole describes the "central" position of the earth around which the planetary spheres (Lewy would supply αἱ σφαῖραι as a subject) are "equally" (πᾶσαι ἴσαι) situated "up to the vault" (of heaven). But again, this interpretation contradicts the "sun as center" cosmology of the Chaldean system. In addition, the term ἄντυγος here may not allude to the heavenly "vault" but to the "orbits" of the planetary spheres. In this regard, cf. Proclus, H. II.17: εἴτε καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ κύκλων ὑπὲρ ἄντυγας αἰθερὶ ναίεις (sc. Aphrodite). Although the fragment undoubtedly has a cosmological context, its precise meaning remains problematic.

Fr. 168

1. (Ἀπόλλων): Cf. fr. 71, where Apollo is similarly identified with the sun. τὰς ἡλιακὰς ἀρχάς: Descriptive of the Ideas. Cf. Psellus, Hypotyp. 12: καὶ ἡ τοῦ ἡλίου πηγὴ πρὸ τῶν ἡλιακῶν ἀρχῶν ἰδρυμένη· ἔστι γὰρ τῶν μὲν ἡλιακῶν ἀρχῶν ὁ δημιουργὸς αἴτιος... ἀπὸ δὲ τῆς ἡλιακῆς πηγῆς <ὁ> ἀρχικὸς ἥλιος προέρχεται καὶ ὁ ἀρχαγγελικός. But, as Lewy notes (p. 150 and n. 309), the triadic hierarchy of πηγαί, ἀρχαί, ἀρχαγγελοί (although based on Chaldean categories) is a Proclan development.

2. κατέχων τὴν τρίπτερον ἀρχήν: Cf. Proclus, In Tim., III, 62,6-9: εἰ δέ τινες ταῖς τῶν μαθηματικῶν ὑποθέσει χαίροντες μέσον τῶν ἐπὶ πλανήτων τάττειν ἀξιοῖεν τὸν ἥλιον, συνάγοντα καὶ συνδέοντα τὰς ἐφ' ἑκάτερα αὐτοῦ τριάδας. Thus, as Lewy notes (ibid.), the fragment apparently alludes to the central position of the sun surrounded on each side by three planets (cf. fr. 200 in this regard.) However, cf. fr. 8, where κατέχειν is used with reference to τὰ νοητά (= the Ideas) contained in the Demiurgic Intellect. Since the Ideas, as a whole, were conceived triadically in the Chaldean system (cf. the "measurable triad" of fr. 23; see, also, fr. 31 and notes), the fragment may well be a further reflection of this idea.

Fr. 169

2. ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα: "Once Transcendent" applies to the Supreme God or First Intellect who is monadic in nature (cf. πατρικὴ μονάς, fr. 11). In the context of Proclus, this Highest God is also described as ἀμιστύλλευτος, ἐνοειδής, ἀδιαίρετος (cf. fr. 152), and πασῶν συνοχεὺς τῶν πηγῶν (cf. fr. 207). In addition, Proclus identifies ὁ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα with Kronos. As an indivisible unity, ὁ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα is to be distinguished from ὁ δις ἐπέκεινα (or "Twice Transcendent" = Second Intellect), who is dyadic in nature: e.g., In Crat., 52, 1-3: καὶ τί δεῖ λέγειν; αὐτόθεν γὰρ αὐτόν προσαγορεύει δις ἐπέκεινα καὶ δις ἐκεῖ, καὶ ὅλως αὐτὸν διὰ τῆς δυάδος εὐφημεῖ. Cf. δυάς, fr. 8 and notes. See, also, Lewy, p. 77 and n. 43; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 262 and notes 2-3; Des Places, testimonia, p. 107, for additional parallels. Elsewhere, Proclus equates ὁ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα and ὁ δις ἐπέκεινα with the names "Ad" and "Adad" (see In Parm. VII, ed. C. Steel, p. 512, 1-7 = Kl.-Lab., p. 60, 1-9. "Adad" is an apparent corruption of the Syrian "Haddad.") As Dodds notes ("New Light," p. 272 = Lewy², p. 701), "Ad" (as an "invented name") would correspond to ἅπαξ, whereas "Ad" + "Ad" (or "Adad") would correspond to δις (ἐπέκεινα). (See, also, Theiler, 1942, p. 6 = 1966, p. 258.) Of further interest is Porphyry's identification of the δις ἐπέκεινα with the God of the Jews: ὁ μέντοι Πορφύριος ἐν τῷ ὑπομνήματι τῶν λογίων τὸν δις ἐπέκεινα τοῦτέστι τὸν τῶν ὅλων δημιουργὸν τὸν παρὰ Ἰουδαίων τιμώμενον εἶναι ἀξιοῖ, ὃν ὁ Χαλδαῖος δεύτερον ἀπὸ τοῦ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα, τοῦτέστι τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, θεολογεῖ (as cited by Lydus, De mens., IV, 53; p. 110, 18-22 W.). But whether this citation derives from Porphyry's De philos. ex or. haur., or from another Porphyrian work, is much debated. On this problem, see Lewy, p. 9 and notes 23-24; Bidez, Vie de Porphyre, p. 70*, no. 50; Dodds, "New Light," p. 267 = Lewy², pp. 696-697; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 264, n. 6.

Fr. 170

1. πνεύματος...ἀπὸ τῶν ὑπογείων τόπων: The notion that subterranean winds were the cause of earthquakes was common in Antiquity. See, e.g., Proclus, In Tim., I, 188, 1-12; Festugière, Tim., I, p. 245, n. 2; Lewy, p. 259, n. 2. For the later Neoplatonists, these "winds" became identified with subterranean demons. Cf. the χθόνιοι κύνες of fr. 90; Marinus, Vita Procli, 28.

3. αὐτάνδρους πόλεάς γ' ἀπολέσθαι: Elsewhere, similar "apocalyptic" visions are explicitly said to be the work of demons. See, e.g., C.H. XVI.10; Asclepius, 25-26; Kore Kosmou, 53; 67; Porphyry, De abst., II.40.

Fr. 171

2. μηδέ ποτ' ἐκ λήθης ῥεῦσωμεν κτλ.: Although this verse has been reconstructed by Theiler (1942, p. 32, n. 1 = 1966, p. 290, n. 127; codd.: μὴ ταπεινὸν ἐκ λήθης ῥεῦσωμεν χεῦμα), its Chaldean origin remains problematic (and so Tardieu, Lewy², p. 680.) Lewy, p. 493, conjectures that the line has been placed here by Psellus from another passage. The vocabulary, however, fits a Chaldean context.

ἐκ λήθης: An allusion to the "forgetfulness" of the soul after its "fall" into matter. Cf. λήθης, fr. 109 and notes.

ῥεῦσωμεν: Cf., esp., ῥευστόν, fr. 128; ῥευστά, fr. 134. See, also, ῥοή, fr. 56 and notes for additional parallels to this familiar term.

χεῦμα: Cf. πολυχεύμονα φῦλα, fr. 93 and notes.

Fr. 172

1-2. (τῆς ὕλης) ἥς κατασύρονται πολλοὶ σχολιοῖσι ῥεέθροις: This line has been tentatively reconstructed by Lewy (p. 303, n. 170, and so Des Places). Kroll, however, loc. cit., identified only σχολιά ρεῖθρα (of Proclus' text) as derived from a Chaldean verse. In this regard, cf. Proclus, In Crat., 104, 6: τῶν τε σχολιῶν ἀτραπῶν τῆς ὕλης ἀναρπάζουσα. See, also, Festugière, Tim., V, p. 208 and n. 1, who cites Kroll, but does not mention Lewy's reconstruction. Thus, Lewy's restoration of the verse must remain in doubt (and so Tardieu, Lewy², p. 680.)

1. τὸ λάβρον τῆς ὕλης: See fr. 134 and notes.

2. κατασύρονται: Cf., esp., κατασύρων, fr. 70.

πολλοί: Equivalent to the "herd" of fr. 153 and 154.

σχολιοῖσι: Cf. σχολιός, fr. 163; Synesius, H. 1(3), 261-265: σχολιας δ' ἀπάτας/ἀνέχεις ὁσίων/πραπίδας μερόπων,/ἐς ζόφον ὕλας/μὴ καταδῦναι. See Theiler, 1942, p. 11, n. 4 = 1966, p. 265, n. 38.

ῥεέθροις: Cf., esp., ῥευσῶμεν, fr. 171 and notes.

Fr. 173

2. τὴν πρωτογενῇ ὕλιν: Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680, following Kroll, loc. cit.) thinks this fragment is Orphic, not Chaldean, in origin. Cf., in this regard, Olympiodorus, In Alc., 15 [19,6-7 Cr.] W.: φησὶ γὰρ καὶ ὁ Ὀρφεύς: ὕλης οὐρανίης καὶ ἀστερίης καὶ ἀβύσσου (see infra). Although Aphrodite (l. 1) does not figure elsewhere in the Oracles, Proclus, H. II (εἰς Ἀφροδίτην) identifies Aphrodite with the World Soul (in the manner of Hecate). This hymn as a whole (although modeled on Orphic Hymn 55: εἰς Ἀφροδίτην) reflects a conflation of Orphic and Chaldean terminologies. However, in neither Proclus' hymn nor the Orphic hymn to Aphrodite is the goddess referred to as ἡ πρωτογενὲς ὕλη. Thus, the actual source of our fragment remains in doubt.

3. ἀστερίαν καὶ οὐρανίαν: Cf. fr. 216, where Lydus again attributes these terms to the Oracles, but Olympiodorus (see supra) to Orpheus.

Fr. 174

Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) identifies this fragment as Orphic; Des Places (p. 108), however, sees a possible Chaldean origin because of Hermias' use of the formulaic φησὶ τὰ λόγια. For Des Places, then, the fragment—in a Chaldean context—refers to the activity of Hecate as World Soul. (Kroll does not mention this fragment at all. Lewy, p. 356, n. 168, mentions this line in passing, but only as a commentary on the self-moved soul of Plato, Phaedrus, 245 c, and not as a Chaldean hexameter.) In addition, the vocabulary of this line reflects no particular Chaldean "stamp." Thus, the actual source of this fragment must remain in doubt.

Fr. 175

1. περὶ τοῦ πρωτίστου πατρός: In the context of Proclus, this expression designates the Highest God under the mode of σιγή. In this regard, cf. τῇ θεοθρέμμονι σιγῇ τῶν πατέρων, fr. 16.

2. δύναμιν πρώτην ἱεροῦ λόγου: For Proclus, descriptive of the Father before he is actualized as λόγος or Word. In this sense, δύναμις here would correspond to the second movement of the Primordial Triad (i.e., Father, Power, Intellect = Word). Cf. fr. 4 and notes; Proclus, In Tim., III, 222, 13-14: διαδέχεται γὰρ τὴν...πατρικὴν σιγὴν ὁ δημιουργικὸς λόγος. Hadot (Porphyre, I, p. 295, n. 1) notes M. Victorinus' similar use of "silentium-verbum" in Adv. Ar., III. 7.28-29 (cf. I. 13 31; 41.49), but suggests that these passages most likely reflect a conflation of Christian and Chaldean imageries. (In this regard, cf. Synesius' use of πατήρ-λόγος in H. 2(4), 129-140.) In a Chaldean context, Lewy (p. 112, n. 181) suggests that the fragment "possibly refers to the relationship between the intellection of the formation of the world and its realization" and sees a parallel with fr. 212. (Metrically, Lewy, ibid., would reconstruct the verse as: ἡδέ λόγου ἱεροῦ πρωτὴν δύναμιν...) See, also, Kroll, loc. cit., who sees a possible allusion to the Iynges as πατρικαὶ δυνάμεις.

Fr. 176

2. ὑπερβάθμιον πόδα ῥιπτῶν: "To throw the feet beneath the step" is not to follow the proper order (τάξις) of ritual initiation. Cf. frs. 110, 136, 164 and notes; Marinus, Vita Procli, 13: ἐν τάξει καὶ οὐχ ὑπερβάθμιον ποδά, κατὰ τὸ λόγιον, τείνοντα. See Lewy, p. 262, n. 10, for additional parallels to this expression.

Fr. 177

3-4. οἱ μὲν τελετάρχαι κτλ.: Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) considers the vocabulary of this fragment Chaldean, but questions Des Places' reconstruction of the meter. Neither Kroll (loc. cit.) nor Lewy (p. 155, n. 334) attempted to isolate a hexameter from Damascius' prose.

3. οἱ τελετάρχαι: The rulers of the three worlds; cf. fr. 86 and notes.

4. τοῖς συνοχεῦσι: The "Connectors" of the various parts of the Universe; cf. fr. 32 and notes. In Damascius' system (following Proclus), the Teletarchs and Connectors (as well as Iynges) are situated in the "median" intelligible-and-intellectual order.

Fr. 178

2. ἄβατοῖς σηκοῖς (τῆς) διανοίας: Des Places (p. 109, following Diehl) identifies these words as Chaldean (and translates "de la pensée"). Lewy (p. 99, n. 138) notes only that these words might "allude" to a "Chaldean phrase." Festugière, however (Tim., IV, p. 31 and n. 4), prefers to translate these words as part of Proclus' commentary ("de ma pensée"). Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) is of the same opinion. In the context of Proclus, these terms sum up his comments on Aion (see fr. 49), but do not, therefore, demand a Chaldean origin. Forms of ἄβατος, e.g., are used elsewhere by Proclus, but not in any explicit Chaldean context. Cf., e.g., Th. pl., I.3; p. 14, 6 S.-W. Saffrey and Westerink, notes ad loc., point out that ἄβατος is a "metaphoric expression" which comprises part of the vocabulary of Neoplatonic "negative theology." Cf., also, Th. pl., I.11; p. 55, 5 S.-W.; I.20; p. 95, 23 S.-W.; In rem p., I. 78, 31; In Alc., 149 [319, 14 Cr.] W.

Fr. 179

1. τὴν νοητήν: Analogous to τι νοητόν, fr. 1.

2. τμήσιος: In Lewy's interpretation (pp. 106-107 and n. 168), it is the cooperation of the Father's Intellect, Will, and Power which brings about the initial "division" of the intelligible world into triads. Cf. νοεραῖς τομαῖσιν, fr. 1; τέμνεσθαι, fr. 22.

(τὸ)...ἄρχειν: Cf., esp., πατριχῆς ἀρχῆς, fr. 13.

Frr. 180 and 181

Des Places has isolated the words that comprise these two fragments from Proclus, In Tim., III, 325, 29-326, 1 (see fr. 172). Since these terms simply repeat the terminology of fr. 134, v. 1, Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) rightly suggests that they should be excised here.

Fr. 182

1. (τῇ μέσῃ τάξει τῶν νοερῶν): See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 484. This particular τάξις would be equivalent to Hecate as ἡ ζωογόνος θεά.

1-2. ἥ τε ἀρετὴ καὶ ἡ σοφία: Cf. fr. 52, where ἀρετὴ is said to reside in Hecate. In fr. 107, ἀρετὴ and σοφία are mentioned together in connection with εὐνομία as planetary virtues.

3. ἡ πολύφρων ἀτρεχεία: Lewy (p. 50 and n. 160) translates this expression as "thoughtful truth," and notes that ἀτρεχεία is the epic equivalent of ἀλήθεια. This latter term is found elsewhere in the Oracles in connection with πίστις and ἔρως (see fr. 46 and notes). πολύφρων, of course, is Homer's epithet for both Odysseus (e.g., Od. 14. 424) and Hephaestus (e.g., Od. 8. 297). Chaignet

(Damascius, II, p. 208) translates the fragment as “la vérité avec ses pensées multiples.” Des Places (p. 110) prefers “la rectitude ingénieuse.” Cf., also, Synesius, H. 1(3), 156: ἀτρεχεία σοφά.

Fr. 183

2. τὸ δ' ἀτρεχές ἐν βαθεῖ ἐστι: Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) identifies this fragment as a precept from Democritus and, therefore, not Chaldean in origin. The same suggestion is made by Cremer (p. 56, n. 152), who specifically cites Democritus, fr. 117 (Diels): ἐν βυθῷ γὰρ ἡ ἀλήθεια. Lewy (p. 146, n. 293) was apparently unaware of the Democritean parallel and assumed the fragment was authentically Chaldean. Des Places (p. 110) remains uncertain. Although the source of the fragment is probably Democritus, this does not then preclude that the Chaldeans may have “borrowed” this fragment for their own purposes. The vocabulary certainly fits a Chaldean milieu.

τὸ ἀτρεχές: Cf. ἀτρεχεία, fr. 182.

ἐν βαθεῖ: Cf. βάθει, fr. 184; βυθόν, fr. 18; βυθός/βάθος, fr. 163.

Fr. 184

1. ὁ ἡλιακὸς κόσμος: In the context of Psellus, this expression refers to the mundane sun of the Ethereal World and not to the transmudane sun or “whole light” of Asion as Lewy suggests (see p. 151 and n. 313; cf. fr. 59 and notes). Lewy mistakenly understands Psellus to mean that ὁ ἡλιακὸς κόσμος is situated above the fixed stars (and, thus, in the Empyrean World). But Psellus simply does not make this distinction. Indeed, he suggests just the opposite, by describing—in descending order—the “chain” of Chaldean realities, placing ὁ ἡλιακὸς κόσμος after ὁ ἀπλανὴς κύκλος (and so beneath, not above, the fixed stars).

2. δουλεύων βάθει αἰθερίῳ: Cf. Proclus, Th. pl., II.7; p. 45, 9-11 S.-W.: τὸν ἥλιον...ἀπὸ τῶν αἰθερίων προελθόντα βυθῶν. But in what sense the “solar world” or mundane sun “serves the ethereal depth” is problematic. Forms of δουλεύειν are common to the Oracles, but in other contexts; e.g., frs. 73, 80, 81.

Fr. 185

1. ὁ ἀληθέστερος ἥλιος: An allusion to the transmudane sun (or Aion). See Lewy, p. 152, n. 314; cf. fr. 59 and notes.

2. χρόνου χρόνος: The inference here is that the “truer sun” (or Aion) functions as the source of Time. But to what extent Chronos, as a god, was distinguished from Aion in the Chaldean system remains problematic. See, esp., notes to ἀκοιμήτου χρόνου, fr. 37. Cf., also, Proclus, El. Th., prop. 53: ὁ μὲν αἰὼν αἰώνων, ὁ δὲ χρόνων χρόνος; Synesius, H. 5(2), 67: σὺ δ' ἄναξ αἰῶνος αἰών; PGM IV. 2197-2198: ὁ τῶν ὅλων Δεσπότης, ὁ αἰὼν τῶν αἰώνων. See, also, Dodds, Proclus: El. Th., p. 228 ff.

Fr. 186

2. ῥόθιον: i.e., the state of flux associated with corporeality. Cf. ῥευστὸν σῶμα, fr. 128.

κύτος: i.e., the human body. See Lewy (p. 277 and n. 72), who cites Plato, Tim., 44 a, as the locus classicus: τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ἅπαν κύτος. Cf., analogously, ἀγγεῖον, fr. 157.

Fr. 186 bis

2. πάμμορφον ἄγαλμα: This expression reflects the vocabulary of fr. 37 (παμμόρφους ἰδέας) and 101 (αὐτοπτον ἄγαλμα). For Olympiodorus (cf. ibid., 157 [68,23 N.] W.), the expression refers to the individual soul which contains all of the "Principles" (= Forms) of existence. For this notion, cf., e.g., Plotinus, Enn., IV.3.10.10-13; V.7.1.7-8; VI.2.5.11-14; Proclus, El. Th., prop. 195 (as cited by Westerink, loc. cit., ad not.). The precise Chaldean application of this expression, however, is uncertain.

VARIOUS CHALDEAN EXPRESSIONS

Fr. 187

1. ἀγήρων: Although Proclus associates this term both with the Orphic and Chaldean traditions, this term may properly be Orphic in origin (and so Tardieu, Lewy², p. 680, contra Lewy, p. 79, n. 48). Cf., in this regard, Orph. Fr. 54 (Kern): χρόνος ἀγήραος. For Proclus, the "order" (τάξις) associated with ἀγήρων is that of Kronos (= ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα; see fr. 169). Cf., also, Synesius, H. 8(9), 67, where ἀγήραος is descriptive of Αἰών. Elsewhere, Synesius uses forms of ἀγήραος in a variety of contexts; e.g., H. 1(3), 344, 480; 2(4), 152; 5(2), 45. Although Synesius is primarily dependent on the Oracles, his use of this term may reflect a conflation of Orphic and Chaldean material (mediated, perhaps, through Porphyry).

Fr. 188

Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) wants to excise this fragment (as well as fr. 195, 199, 200) on the basis that these terms are derived from the prose works of Julian the Theurgist rather than from the Oracles. However, inclusion of these terms (although methodologically problematic) does enhance our understanding of the Chaldean system as a whole.

1. τοῖς Ἀσσυρίοις: A circumlocution for the Chaldean tradition. See Lewy, Exc. I, p. 444 c.

ζῶναι καὶ ἄζωνοι: These are "Time" gods associated with the planetary spheres—the ζῶναι (or ζωνᾱῖοι; cf. fr. 195) dependent on the planetary orbits, the ἄζωνοι independent of these movements. Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 282-283: οἱ ζωνᾱῖοι/οἱ τ' ἄζωνοι. Psellus Hypotyph., 18, situates these Time deities just below the Archangels in the Chaldean "chain." In addition, the Chaldeans also recognized other Time gods associated with Day, Night, Month, and Year, all of which were invoked by various τελεσταί. See, e.g., Proclus, In Tim., III, 40, 31-41, 5. See, also, Festugière, Tim., IV, pp. 45, n. 1; 64, n. 1; Lewy, p. 137 and n. 267.

πηγαί: Cf. fr. 30, 37, 49, 56.

ἀμείλιχτοι: Cf. fr. 35, 36.

2. συνοχεῖς: Cf. fr. 32, 80, 82, 177, 207.

Fr. 189

1. ἀμφιφαής: Here, descriptive of Hecate who, as Kroll notes (p. 27, n. 2), traditionally held torches in either hand. For the later Neoplatonists, however, this expression has become a metaphysical term. Cf., in this regard, ἀμφιφαούς, fr. 1; ἀμφιφάοντα, fr. 158. See, also, Damascius, I, 315, 20; II, 152, 23: ἀμφιφαής Ἑκάτη.

ἀμφιπρόσωπος: This term is also descriptive of Hecate who, as the mediating World Soul, has a "double" aspect, viz. she looks both towards the intelligible and sensible orders. Traditionally, statues of Hecate were depicted with three or four heads and known as τριπρόσωπος or τετραπρόσωπος. See Lewy, pp. 93 and n. 111; 355 and notes 164-166, who notes that ἀμφιπρόσωπος was a term also used by Plutarch (e.g., Num. 19) to describe Janus Bifrons. In this regard, note that Proclus addresses Hymn VI in common to Hecate and Janus. See, also, Festugière, Tim., III, p. 170, n. 1.

κόλοις: Common to the Oracles. Cf. esp., Ἑκάτης κόλπον, fr. 32; πρῆστηροδόχοι κόλποι... Ἑκάτης, fr. 35; Πείη... κόλοισιν ἀφράστοις... δεξαμένη, fr. 56.

2. ὀχετούς: Cf. fr. 2, 65, 66, 110.

3. τὸ κέντρον: Cf., esp., Ἑκάτης κέντρον, fr. 50; κέντρον, fr. 167 and notes.

Fr. 190

2. αὐτοψίαι: Cf. αὐτοπτον ἄγαλμα, fr. 101; αὐτόπτοις φάσμασιν, fr. 142.

3-4. τοὺς πυρσοὺς ἀνάπτουσαι τοὺς ἀναγωγούς: Although these terms do not constitute a hexameter verse, it is probable that forms of ἀναγωγός in connection with "fire/light" did figure in non-extant verses of the Oracles. In this regard, cf. Proclus, H. IV.2: ἀναγώγιον ἀψάμενοι πῦρ; III.1: ἀναγώγιον φῶς; Synesius, H. 1(3), 376, 594, 699: ἀναγωγὰ φάη. Cf., also, πυρσὸν ἀνάψασα, fr. 126; πυρσοὺς ἀχμαίους, fr. 130. (See, also, Lewy, p. 261, n. 7e.) Tardieu, however (Lewy², p. 680), feels that Des Places' isolation of ἀναγωγός as a specific vox Chaldaicorum is unwarranted, as this term is also familiar to Platonism. See discussion in Introduction.

Fr. 191

1. περὶ ἐκείνων: In the context of Proclus, a reference to τὰ πρὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ. See Fr. 132, which is a continuation of this statement.

ἀφθέγκτων: Cf. βουλαῖς ἀφθέγκτοις, fr. 77; Bidez, C.M.A.G. VI, p. 163,9 (as cited by Lewy, p. 77, n. 38): Χαλδαῖοι ἐν φασιν τὸ πρῶτον αἷτιον, ὃ δὴ καὶ ἀφθεγκτότατον λέγουσιν. The "ineffableness" of the intelligible order, especially that of the Highest God, is common to Middle Platonism. Cf., e.g., C.H. I.31; Tri. Trac., NHC I, 56,3, 27; 123,37; Zost., NHC VIII, 74,21; 126,10; Val. Ex., NHC XI, 22,[20]; 24,39; 29,31-31. See Lewy, p. 328, n. 59 for additional parallels. But whether the Chaldeans used the term "One" for the First God is problematic; see notes to fr. 9 and 10.

Fr. 192

1. ἔνυλος: Although Simplicius further identifies this term as Platonic, the locus classicus is Arist., De an., 403 A 25. Cf. fr. 69 and notes re the "materiality" of the sky.

Fr. 193

1. αἱ ψυχαὶ (ὑπερκοσμίαι): For Proclus, these “supermundane souls” μέσαι νόων εἰσὶ καὶ τῶν ἐγκοσμίων ψυχῶν.

2. ἐποχεῖσθαι: Cf. ἐποχοῦμενος, fr. 36 and notes. The sense of “being vehicled” approaches the notion of the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα. See fr. 120 and 201.

1-2. σώμασιν...ὑπερκοσμίαις τιςίν, αἰθερίοις καὶ ἐμπυρίοις: Proclus’ language is ambiguous here and may reflect a confusion between the seven planetary spheres and three world circles. Cf. In Tim., II, 57, 12-14: τὰ ὑπὲρ τὸν κόσμον στερεώματα τί φήσομεν, εἴτε Ὀλυμπον χρῆ καλεῖν, εἴτε ἐμπύριον, εἴτε αἰθέρας; See, also, στερεώματα, fr. 57 and notes.

Fr. 194

1. τὸν ἐπτάκτινα θεόν: An allusion to the sun as the Anagōgeus of souls. Cf. Julian, ibid., 172 a: τὰς ἀναγωγὰς ἀκτῖνας ἡλίου; Proclus, In Tim., I, 34, 20-21: καὶ ὁ Ἄναγωγεὺς καὶ ὁ Ἐπτάκτις κατὰ τοὺς θεολόγους. See Lewy, pp. 186, n. 38; 199, n. 97; Theiler, 1942, p. 35 = 1966, pp. 294-295; Festugière, Tim., I, p. 66, notes 3-4 (who suggests a further allusion to Mithra). Cf., also, ἀκτῖνας ἀγητάς, fr. 34 and notes.

2-3. τῷ συρφετῷ: Analogous to the “herd;” cf. fr. 153 and 154.

3. θεουργοὶς τοῖς μακαρίοις: Here, a reference to the Chaldean initiates. See Lewy, p. 463 and n. 15.

Fr. 195

1. τὸν χρόνον αὐτὸν ὑμνήκασιν (sc. οἱ θεουργοί) ὡς θεόν: Cf., similarly, fr. 199: οἱ θεουργοὶ...ὑμνοῦσι < τοῦτον > τὸν θεόν (sc. τὸν χρόνον). Cf., also, ἀκοιμήτου χρόνου, fr. 37 and notes; χρόνον ἀπέραντον, fr. 39; χρόνου χρόνος, fr. 185.

2. ζῶναῖον; ἄζωνον: Equivalent to the ζῶναι and ἄζωνοι of fr. 188. In the context of Proclus, three additional Time gods are mentioned: an ἀρχαγγελικὸν χρόνον; an ἀρχικὸν (χρόνον); a πηγαῖον (χρόνον). This sequence of five Time gods is related, respectively, to the planetary orbits, a third ethereal heaven, a second ethereal heaven, a first ethereal heaven, and finally, the empyrean heaven. Beyond the planets and heavens lies the πηγαία θεός, or Rhea-Hecate, as the source of this “chain.” Cf. Psellus, Hypotyp., 16-19, where the same sequence is repeated. See, also, Festugière, Tim., IV, p. 64, n. 1.

Fr. 196

1. διὰ τοῦ θείου πυρός: An allusion to the central rite of the Chaldean initiation; i.e., the purification of the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα via the mystical rays of the sun. Cf., esp., fr. 66, 110 and notes.

2. κηλῖδας: Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 550-551: δνοφερὰν ὕλας/κηλῖδα φέρω; De insomn., 138 a: ἐναπομοργνυμένης κηλῖδα τῆς χείρονος (sc. ἕξεως). See Geudtner, pp. 14-15. However, as Lewy notes (p. 260, n. 7), κηλὶς is a common metaphor found in a variety of Platonic sources: Cf., also, μὴ πνεῦμα μολύνῃς, fr. 104.

3. τῆς ψυχῆς τὸ πνεῦμα: For Proclus, the “pneumatic” vehicle of the lower soul is distinguished from the “luminous” vehicle of the higher soul. But this is not a Chaldean doctrine. See, esp., fr. 119 and notes.

Fr. 197

1. κλείς: In the context of Damascius, the term “key” designates both the “intellectual division” (νοερὴ διαίρεσις), understood in its totality as “connective” (συνοχική), and the “intelligible division” (νοητὴ διαίρεσις), understood as “eternity” (αἰών). But the precise Chaldean use of κλείς remains problematic. Indeed, κλείς may well have an Orphic origin. Cf., e.g., Orph. Fr. 82 (Kern), where Phanes is designated κληῖδα νοῦ; Orph. Hymn 1. 7 (ed. Athanassakis), where Hecate is called κληιδούχον. Cf., also, Proclus, H. I.3, where it is the sun who ἔχων κληῖδα. See, also, Lewy, pp. 150, n. 309; 363, n. 200.

Fr. 198

1. ὁ κρύφιος διάκοσμος: This is most likely an Orphic expression (and so Tardieu, Lewy², p. 680; Des Places, p. 113; Lewy, p. 78, n. 45; Hadot, Porphyre, I, p. 306, n. 4). In Orphic terms, this “hidden order” is symbolized by the Orphic “egg.” Cf. Proclus, loc. cit., I. 5: ὡς γὰρ τὸ ὦν τὴν σπερματικὴν αἰτίαν τοῦ ζώου προεῖληφεν. Festugière, however, (Tim., II, p. 307, n. 2, following Diehl), does not discount a Chaldean origin. In this regard, cf. Damascius, I, 284, 7: τὸν κρύφιον διάκοσμον...ὄν...οἱ θεοὶ ἀνυμνήκασιν. As such, the “hidden order” would correspond to the Chaldean Paternal Abyss as the source of all things. See Lewy, Exc. VII, p. 483.

Fr. 199

This fragment, although Chaldean in inspiration, most likely derives from a prose work of Julian the Theurgist and not from the Oracles. See introductory comments to fr. 188.

1. πρεσβύτερον καὶ νεώτερον: The locus classicus is Plato, Tim., 38 a, where these comparatives are descriptive of “forms of time” (χρόνον εἶδη) which “imitate eternity” (αἰῶνα μιμουμένον). Cf. Synesius, H. 8(9), 67-69: ἀλλ’ αὐτὸς ἀγήραος/Αἰὼν ὁ παλαιγενής/νεὸς ὢν ἅμα καὶ γέρων. Lewy (p. 103, n. 154) feels that these lines from Synesius give further evidence that Aion and Chronos were equated in the Chaldean system. Dodds maintains, however, that the two gods were distinct. (See notes to ἀκοιμητοῦ χρόνου, fr. 37.) In this regard, note that in v. 63 of the aforementioned hymn, Synesius specifically mentions ἀκαμαντοπόδας Χρόνος as distinct from Aion. Thus, pace Lewy, Aion and Chronos may well have been distinct in the Chaldean system as well, despite Synesius’ free use of epithets, viz. “young and old;” “unageing”.

κυκλοέλικτον: My translation is based on Festugière, Tim., IV, 39: “se déroulant en circle.” Des Places (p. 113) translates: “à la révolution circulaire.” Cf. Lewy, p. 102 and n. 151: “moving in a circle.” This expression is also found in Orph. Hymn 8. 11 (ed. Athanassakis): κυκλοέλικτε (but here, descriptive of the sun). Aion, of course, is equated with the transmundane sun in the Chaldean system.

2. αἰώνιον: Time is “eternal” in the sense that it “imitates” Eternity but, in Plato’s words (Tim., 37 e), κατ’ ἀριθμόν.

Fr. 200

See introductory comments to fr. 188.

1. μεσεμβολήσας: The central position of the sun is common to the Oracles. Cf. fr. 58, 65, 70; Lewy, p. 124, n. 221 d.

Fr. 201

1. όχήματα: In the context of Proclus, this term refers specifically to the “pneumatic” vehicles of embodied souls. The original text of Plato, however (Tim., 41 e), referred to the “vehicles” of the stars. See discussion in Introduction; Festugière, Tim., I, p. 28, n. 2.

Fr. 202

1. ή πανδεκτική αύλή: αύλή goes back to Homer; e.g., Od. 4.74: Ζηνός αύλή. In Chaldean usage, the “court open to all” designates the noetic home of the Father. Cf. Synesius, H. 1(3), 37, 710; 2(4), 292: ἐπὶ σὰς αύλὰς; Proclus, H. I.32: πατὴρὸς πολυφεγγέας αύλὰς; II.6: πυριφεγγέας αύλὰς; Arnobius, Adv. nat., II.62: “aulam sibi eius patere.” See, also, πρὸς πατὴρὸς αύλὰς, fr. 115 and notes; Lewy, p. 33 and n. 92.

Fr. 203

1. τῶν στερεωμάτων: Cf. fr. 57 and notes.

σειρά: Kroll, loc. cit., (and so Tardieu, Lewy², p. 689; cf. Lewy, p. 84, n. 66) identifies this term as Orphic. Cf., e.g., Orph. Fr. 166 (Kern): σειρὴν χρυσεῖην. (The locus classicus is Il. 8. 19.) Theiler, however (1942, p. 27, n. 4 = 1966, p. 285, n. 109; see, also, Des Places, p. 114, ad not.), argues for a Chaldean origin: “Die σειρά...durfte...in den Orakeln gestanden haben, ja von da im Sinne von ‘Abhängigkeitsreihe’ zu den Neuplatonikern gelangt sein.” Cf. Psellus, Hypotyp., 28: ἐκάστης δὲ σειρᾶς ἡ ἀκρότης πηγὴ ὀνομάζεται. Kroll, loc. cit., argues that the Chaldeans substituted πηγή for σειρά, but such a conjecture is unwarranted. Cf., e.g., Synesius, H. 1(3), 289-290: ἀγγελικὰ...σειρά; Proclus, In rem p., II, 255, 26: τῆς ἀγγελικῆς σειρᾶς. Cf., also, τάξις, fr. 24, 110 and notes, which is analogous to σειρά.

Fr. 204

1. ἐν τῷ σώματι τῷ σκιδναμένῳ: An allusion to the body made up of “flowing” matter. Cf. ῥευστὸν σῶμα, fr. 128; ῥόθιον κύτος, fr. 186. Cf., also, ἀποσκεδάσας τόδε σῶμα, fr. 217 (in a post-mortem context). But Lewy (p. 277, n. 73, contra Kroll, loc. cit.) questions a Chaldean origin for this term, noting that the expression is also used by Numenius, fr. 4a (Des Places): σῶμα...σκιδνάμενον; cf. fr. 4b: τὰ σώματα...σχεδαστά. The locus classicus is Plato, Tim., 37 a: οὐσίαν σχεδαστήν. The context of Proclus, however, is a commentary on Plato, Rep., X, 620 a-d (“The Myth of Er”). But Proclus is not concerned here with the problem of whether the human soul can reincarnate in the body of a beast (which Proclus assumes, following Plato and Plotinus, but contra the Oracles; see fr. 160 and notes), but whether the soul of an animal is properly animated by its “human” component or by the soul ἐν κατὰταξιν, which is its own soul. See Festugière, Rép. III, p. 294, n. 3.

Fr. 205

As Tardieu notes (Lewy², p. 680), στερεώματα here is simply a repetition of the same in fr. 57 and, therefore, should be excised.

Fr. 206

1. στρόφαλον: According to Psellus, Hecate's "magic wheel" was a golden disc embedded with a sapphire and inscribed with magical characters. (Psellus also equates this term with ἵγξ.) Thus, by spinning this wheel, the transcendent Iynges (see fr. 76, 77) were "called on" to participate in the Chaldean rites. In Lewy's words (p. 250): "We may accordingly suppose that when the magical instrument was set in motion, it affected per analogiam the revolving spheres and attracted the celestial Iynges." The spinning of the στρόφαλος/ἵγξ could also affect the weather. Marinus, loc. cit., tells us that Proclus ended a drought in Attica by using ἵγγά τινα. Cf., also, στροφάλιγγι, fr. 49 and 87; C.M.A.G. VI, p. 201,20 (Bidez): ἡ Ἑκατικὴ δὲ στροφάλιγγς μετὰ τοῦ ταυρείου ἱμάντος καὶ τῆς ἱγγικῆς ἐπικλήσεως ὀνόματα μόνα κενά. See, also, Lewy, p. 249 and notes 78-80. My translation of the fragment is that of Lewy.

Fr. 207

1. συνοχεύς: In the context of Proclus, this term is specifically descriptive of ὁ ἅπαξ ἐπέκεινα (see fr. 152, of which this fragment is a continuation). Cf., also, ὁ πρῶτος συνοχεύς, fr. 84 and notes.

πασῶν τῶν πηγῶν: i.e., the Ideas. Cf., esp., πηγαί, fr. 49 and notes.

Fr. 208

Tardieu (Lewy², p. 680) would excise fr. 208-210 as "fragmenta extraria." Although these terms may not derive from the Oracles per se, I have included them here (following Des Places' edition) on the basis that they help broaden our understanding of the Chaldean system as a whole.

1. συστάσεις: This term is particularly associated with the magical papyri, where it is descriptive of the "union" or "conjunction" of the magician with the god invoked. The point of the σύστασις was to make a "pact" with a ministering spirit so that he would aid the magician/theurgist during the soul's ascent. The σύστασις was achieved via various rites and the uttering of nomina barbara. See discussion in Introduction; Lewy, pp. 228-238; Eitrem, "Die σύστασις," pp. 49-53; "La Théurgie," pp. 49-79. A possible σύστασις may also be alluded to in Marsanes, NHC X, 2,14-16: ΠΤΑΨ ἸΠΤΕΓΝΩΣΙC. See Pearson, Nag Hammadi Codices IX and X, notes ad loc.

ἐντυχίαις: According to Lewy (p. 239 and n. 42), these were special "supplicatory prayers" offered to the various Chaldean "Time gods" (see, e.g., Proclus, In Tim., III, 41,3-4) as a preliminary to their actual conjuration. This term is also found frequently in the magical papyri; e.g., PGM IV. 1930: ἐντυχία πρὸς ἥλιον. See Lewy, p. 239, n. 43.

2. στροφάλις: See στρόφαλον, fr. 206.

Fr. 209

The term ὑπερκόσμιος is part of the introductory material to fr. 59 and is discussed there.

Fr. 210

1 + 2. χαλκίς/κύμινδις: In the Iliad (14. 291), χαλκίς is a name given by the gods to an unknown bird, which men refer to as κύμινδις. But the precise Chaldean use of these terms remains problematic. However, since Proclus associates χαλκίς with χαλκός ("brass"), Lewy (p. 291 and n. 124) surmises that brass instruments were used in the Chaldean rites to drive away evil spirits. The clanging of brass or copper instruments for apotropaic purposes was a widespread popular practice in Antiquity. In this regard, see Bailey, The Religion of Ancient Rome, p. 39 re the clanging of brass instruments to drive away ghosts at the time of the Lemuria in May.

Fr. 210a

Fragments 210a-c are now cited by Des Places as containing additional Chaldean vocabulary, although he notes that these terms are not exclusive to the Oracles. See "Notes," p. 328.

1. μαλάχης ἀπέχεσθαι: "Mallow" is a plant known for its laxative effect. Evidently the Oracles prescribed various remedies for each month of the year. See fr. 210b and Des Places, ibid. On the relation of various Chaldean rites and the health of the body, see, e.g., Iambl., De myst., II.6: ἡ μὲν τῶν θεῶν παρουσία δίδωσιν ἡμῖν ὑγίαν σώματος, ψυχῆς ἀρετήν, νοῦ καθαρότητα κτλ.

Fr. 210b

1. γαλακτοποτεῖν: On the medicinal value of milk, see PW, 15,2, s.v. Milch, esp. cols. 1573-1576.

Fr. 210c

1. δημιουργικαῖς δυνάμεσιν: These "demiurgic powers" were responsible for creating the world. Cf. Proclus, Th. pl., 380, 51 ff.; Lewy, p. 92, n. 106.

1-2. θεουργῶν παῖδες: Most likely a reference to theurgists, in general, who followed the teachings of the Juliani.

2. χεῖρας: As "hands," these demiurgic powers were believed to contain certain properties peculiar to each hand. According to Proclus, In Tim., II, 260, 24-28, the Chaldeans symbolized the life-giving power of the World Soul through terms associated with Hecate; e.g., "temples," "hands," "loins," etc. See Lewy, p. 92, n. 107; cf. fr. 51 and 52. See, also, fr. 68, where the expression αὐτουργῶν ("working with his own hands") describes the creative activity of the Second or Demiurgic Intellect.

DOUBTFUL FRAGMENTS

The following fragments are categorized as “dubia” by Des Places (“fragmenta extraria” by Tardieu, Lewy², p. 680) because of metrical and other problems. Although Lewy contends (p. 37, n. 109) that the term ἐπη (sc. λόγια δ’ ἐπῶν) was not necessarily limited to verses in hexameter, both Dodds (“New Light,” p. 267, n. 17 = Lewy², p. 697, n. 17) and Festugière (Rép. I, p. 129, n. 3) argue (rightly) that any meter other than hexameter would a priori exclude that a given verse(s) derives from the Oracles. Dodds, in particular, would separate the oracles collected by Lewy into Theosophical, Porphyrian, and Chaldean, and not attempt (as Lewy did) to “fuse” parts of one group with another. Further arguments pro and con a Chaldean origin are discussed infra in each case.

Fr. 211

1. τοῦ δοχῆος: Lewy (p. 41 and n. 126; cf. Exc. III, p. 458) argues that this nomen agentis is a Chaldean neologism; thus, despite the meter (trochaic tetrameter), Lewy feels this verse has a probable Chaldean origin. Dodds, however (“New Light,” see supra), because of the meter, argues for a Porphyrian origin, noting that although the later Neoplatonists connected this term with the practice of theurgy, they probably learned it from Porphyry and not from the Oracles, despite Proclus’ use of the formulaic φησὶν τις θεῶν. See, also, Wolff, p. 160.) The more common expression is χάτοχος. In a theurgic context, the “recipient” is the medium who “receives” the conjured god. (Proclus cites this verse in conjunction with fr. 146 re the conjuration of Hecate.)

Fr. 212

1. ἃ δὴ λέγει νοῦς: cj. Des Places (for metrical purposes). Again, the problem with this verse (as a whole) is one of meter (which Des Places has constructed as an iambic trimeter). But Lewy (p. 112, n. 181) accepts a Chaldean origin, and understands this verse in conjunction with fr. 175. Kroll, loc. cit., also suggests a Chaldean origin, but admits that the verse may have been part of Psellus’ interpretation. In light of the metrical difficulties, this is a likely supposition. In the context of Psellus, the line refers, in general, to the communication between man and God ἕκαστος καθὼς ἔχει φύσεως ἐνεργῶν.

Fr. 213

On the basis of “terminology, form and contents,” Lewy (p. 172, n. 403) considers this oracle authentically Chaldean. Des Places, however (p. 151), points out that the facility in phrasing contrasts with the “laborious composition” of the undoubted fragments. In addition, Didymus’ expression οἱ ἔξω—as the source of the quote—is a general expression and not used elsewhere as a specific introductory formula for Chaldean material. The vocabulary, however, as Lewy notes, has points of similarity with the undoubted fragments.

2. φεῦγε τάχος: The theme of “swift flight” is common to the Oracles. Cf. frr. 107, 115, 116, 130, 134.

3. ψυχῆς ὄμμα: Cf. ibid., fr. 1; ὄμματα πάντα, fr. 112.

αὐγάς: Cf., ibid., fr. 115; αὐγῆς, fr. 35.

4. χαλινά: Cf. χαλινῶσαι, fr. 113.

5. αἰθερίης πατρὸς αἴγλης: In the undoubted fragments, however, the Father's (fiery) essence is associated with the Empyrean, not Ethereal realm. Lewy's explanation (p. 173, n. 405) is weak: "The designation of the noetic essence as αἰθερίη (instead of ἐμπυρίη) πατρὸς αἴγλης is due to their (sc. "the vision of the Ideas") being mediated by the solar rays."

Fr. 214

Again, Didymus attributes these lines, in general, to οἱ ἔξω. Des Places (p. 151), considers the oracle more Stoic than Chaldean in inspiration. Lewy, however (p. 86, n. 74), feels the last two lines may have a Chaldean origin because of the use of κάρτος and ἀλκή. Although forms of ἀλκή are found passim in the undoubted fragments, κάρτος is not similarly attested (but cf. κραταιόν, fr. 35). κάρτος is found in conjunction with ἀλκή in Theos. 35, but Dodds has shown, contra Lewy, that a Chaldean origin for this material is problematic. See "New Light," pp. 265-266 = Lewy², pp. 695-696; cf. Des Places, pp. 55-56. (Des Places would now consider placing Theos. 35 among the "Doubtful Fragments" of the Oracles, but with the same reservations expressed re fr 213 supra. See ANRW, II.17.4, p. 2303.)

Fr. 215

Although Lydus uses the formulaic ὁ χρησμός (see Lewy, Exc. I, p. 446 p), these lines are most likely not Chaldean in origin. Des Places (p. 151) notes that the notion of God (Zeus) dispensing evil is congenial neither to the Oracles nor to Neoplatonism. The literary model is Il. 24. 528-533. In addition, as with fr. 213, Des Places again contrasts the facility of composition with the "vigueur Chaldaïque." Finally, the vocabulary lacks any distinctive Chaldean "stamp." The oracle is ignored by Lewy and Kroll.

Fr. 216

Lewy (p. 267, n. 25) argues that these verses are Chaldean, but an Orphic origin is also possible. See comments, infra.

3. ἐνύδρια πνεύματα: Perhaps analogous to the κυνῶν ὑγρῶν, fr. 91; ὕδροβατήρας, fr. 92.

4. κόλποι < τε > καὶ ἡέριοι: Cf. κόλπων τ' ἡερίων, fr. 61.

5. μηναιοὶ πάσης ἐπιβήτορες κτλ.: Cf. Psellus, P. G., 122, 1137 a 5-7: μορφαὶ δαιμονιώδες... ἀπὸ πάντων δὲ τῶν μερῶν τοῦ σεληναίου κόσμου. Lewy (see supra) thinks Psellus' interpretation (which pertains specifically to fr. 88) alludes to the "lunar riders" (= demons) mentioned here. Cf., also, ἐπιβήτορα, fr. 44, with regard to Eros.

6. ὕλης οὐρανίας κτλ.: Cf. fr. 173 and notes, where Olympiodorus attributes this line to Orpheus (= Orph. Fr. 353, Kern; see Kroll, loc. cit.). Lewy (see supra) argues that Olympiodorus mistakenly attributed this line to Orpheus because his source (Proclus) probably ascribed it to οἱ θεόλογοι, a term applied equally by the later Neoplatonists to the Orphic and Chaldean traditions (cf. Lewy, Exc. I, p. 444 d). But the true source of this oracle remains in doubt.

Fr. 217

Kroll (app. crit. to Proclus citation) felt that these verses were “alienum” to the Oracles. Lewy, however (pp. 31-33 and notes 87-94), argues for authenticity, noting that the “form and style” of these verses are similar to the oracles cited by Porphyry (as reported by Eusebius). But as Dodds has rightly argued (see supra, introductory comments, p. 217), these so-called “Porphyrian” oracles should be distinguished from the Chaldean λόγια. The vocabulary of this fragment, however, has certain parallels with the undoubted fragments. See infra.

4. μελάθρων: Analogous to αὐλή, fr. 202.

8. σπλάγχνοισιν: Cf. σπλάγχνων, fr. 107. Fr. 107, as a whole, similarly warns against the efficacy of traditional methods of soothsaying.

9. ἀποσκεδάσας: Here, in a post-mortem context. But, cf. σκίδνασθαι, fr. 204 and notes.

Fr. 218

Although Kroll, loc. cit., cites these verses, he doubts a Chaldean origin. (Lewy does not comment on them at all.) Des Places (p. 35) thinks the fragment is more “Orphic” than Chaldean in inspiration. In the context of Synesius, these lines are an oblique commentary on Plato, Tim., 42 a-b (which Synesius embellishes with the doctrine of the descent of the ὄχημα-πνεῦμα).

4. ἄναξ: Apollo? See Kroll, loc. cit., n. 2; cf. ibid., fr. 225.

Fr. 219

Frr. 219-225 are properly “Porphyrian” and not Chaldean in origin. Although Terzaghi, loc. cit., assigned them a Chaldean origin (based on their inclusion in Nicephorus Gregoras’ commentary on Synesius’ De insomn.; cf. Kroll, p. 5), Terzaghi was apparently unaware that these same fragments also make up part of Porphyry’s De philos. ex or. haur.; Wolff, pp. 130-131; 155-158; 162. Des Places has included these fragments in his edition, but with the appropriate caveats (see his comments, p. 119). Lewy also rejects most of these fragments as “non-Chaldean” (see pp. 51-52 and n. 162), although noting certain similarities in style and form to the undoubted fragments. See additional comments infra in each case.

6. τεῦξ ὑποθημοσύνησι: Cf., in contrast, θεῶν ὑποθημοσύνησι, fr. 222 and notes.

7. πειθοῖ τ’ ἀρρήτων ἐπέων: Cf. πειθανάγκην, l. 2. Both these expressions underscore the non-compulsive aspect of theurgy (in contrast to traditional magic), where the gods appear of their own volition and not at the command of the adept (see discussion in Introduction). But Lewy (p. 58, n. 184) notes that the use of this expression here (in a “non-Chaldean” oracle) indicates that theurgy (as a “passive” enterprise between man and the gods) was apparently not strictly limited to the Chaldean tradition. Cf., e.g., PGM I.51: λόγοις θεολογουμένοις πείσαντες.

Fr. 220

2. κλυθί μεν: This expression is Homeric; e.g., Il. 1. 37. The god invoked here is probably Apollo (and so Theodoretus, loc. cit.).

ἐπέδησας: i.e., the “binding” of the god during the conjuration rite. Cf. fr. 41 re the “loosing” of the god. See, also, Lewy, pp. 41-42; 57-58 and n. 184.

ἀνάγκη: Cf. ἀναγκαζόμενος, l. 1; ἀνάγκαις, fr. 221. Here, a compulsive element is obvious. The god is invoked and bound “against his will” (οὐκ ἐθέλοντος; cf. ἀέκοντας, fr. 223) and not via the “persuasive words” of the caller (as is the case with fr. 219). For Lewy (p. 51, n. 162), such language belies a Chaldean origin.

Fr. 221

2. ἀπ’ αἰθέρος: Cf. ἀπ’ αἰθρης, fr. 223.

3. θειοδάμοις/ἀνάγκαις: Again, this compulsive element argues against a Chaldean origin.

Fr. 222

2. ἡλυθον: Cf. ἡχα, fr. 72 (with reference to Hecate).

τεῆς πολυφράδμονος εὐχῆς: Perhaps a “supplicatory” prayer. Cf. ἐντυχίαι, fr. 208 and notes.

3. θεῶν ὑποθημοσύνησι: Here, contra fr. 219, it is the gods who convey their “binding” spells to man and not vice versa.

Fr. 223

2. ἀπορρήτοις ἱγξιν: Here, the term ἱγξ seems closest in sense to the συνθήματα/σύμβολα as voces mysticae. But cf. fr. 206, where the στροφήλος/ἱγξ of Hecate is also described as ἀπόρητος by Psellus.

ἀπ’ αἰθρης: Cf. ἀπ’ αἰθέρος, fr. 221.

3. ἀέκοντας: Cf. οὐκ ἐθέλοντος, fr. 220 and notes.

4. μεσάτοισιν ἐπεμβεβαῶτας (sc. δαίμονας) ἀήταις: i.e., demons of the air. Cf., e.g., ἡερίων κυνῶν, fr. 91.

5. πανομφέας ὀνείρους: Dreams were traditionally believed to be conveyed to men via demons of the air or moon. See Lewy, p. 93.

Fr. 224

Lewy (p. 51, n. 162) specifically argues that this oracle is “non-Chaldean” because the instructions here concerning the making and consecrating of Hecate’s statue contradict the descriptions of Hecate’s statue as gleaned from the undoubted fragments. Cf., e.g., frs. 51, 52, 55, 72, 89 and notes. However, in a general sense, the use of herbs, animals, scents, etc. figured prominently in theurgic practice. See, esp., Dodds, “Theurgy,” 1947, pp. 62-63 = 1957, pp. 292-293.

5. σκαλαβώταις: Lizards traditionally figured in magical practice. See Nock, “The Lizard in Magic and Religion,” Essays, I, pp. 271-276.

7. αἰθριάσας: Cf. the invocation of Hecate in fr. 146, which also takes place in the open.

7-8. ὑπὸ μῆνην αὔξουσιν: Cf. the ritual described in the Mithras Liturgy (ed. Meyer), p. 23, which similarly takes place in conjunction with various phases of the moon.

8. ἐπευχόμενος τήνδ’ εὐχὴν: Cf. εὐχῆς, fr. 222. The “prayer” alluded to here probably consisted of both ordinary praises as well as voces mysticae. Cf., e.g., Mithras Liturgy, ibid.

Fr. 225

Lewy (p. 40 and n. 118) parallels this oracle with fr. 211 and thus argues for a probable Chaldean origin. However, as noted supra, the authenticity of fr. 221 (contra Lewy) is doubtful.

2. λύετε: i.e., the "loosing" of the god after he has been "bound." Cf. ἐκλυσις θεοῦ, fr. 141 and notes.

ἄνακτα: Again, probably Apollo. Cf. ἄναξ, fr. 218 and notes.

θεὸν οὐκέτι χωρεῖ: According to Lewy (p. 41 and n. 123), analogous to οὐ φέρει με, fr. 211. Cf., also, Iambl., De myst., III.11: χωρεῖν τὸν θεόν (in a divination context).

Fr. 226

Although Kroll, loc. cit., thought this fragment was Chaldean in origin, Lewy (p. 444 d) argues for an Orphic origin. (See Orph. Fr. 188, Kern.) As Des Places notes (p. 121), Dionysus does not play a role in any of the undoubted fragments. But cf. Psellus, P.G. 122, 1152 b 6-8, who identifies the ἄζωνικοὶ θεοί as Sarapis, Dionysos, Osiris, and Apollo. Similarly, Proclus, loc. cit., mentions Osiris (as well as Dionysos) as one of the gods mentioned in the "books of the theologians and theurgists." Although οἱ θεολόγοι can apply equally to the Chaldean and Orphic traditions, οἱ θεουργοί is a specific Chaldean designation. Thus, a Chaldean origin for this fragment is not out of the question. See, also, Festugière, Tim., IV, p. 169, n. 1.

3. πόλον: Cf. πόλων, fr. 35. Cf., also, Mithras Liturgy (ed. Meyer), p. 14, where "King Helios" is said to come εἰς τὸν πόλον after a lengthy invocation.

About the Authors

Francis I. Regardie was born in London, England, on November 17, 1907, and died in Sedona, Arizona, on March 10, 1985. He came to the United States in August 1921 and was educated in Washington, DC, also studying art in schools in Washington and Philadelphia. Returning to Europe in 1928 at the invitation of Aleister Crowley, he worked as Crowley's secretary and studied with him. Regardie returned to London as secretary to Thomas Burke (1932–34), and during that time he wrote A Garden of Pomegranates and The Tree of Life.

In 1934, he was invited to join the order of the Golden Dawn, Stella Matutina Temple, during which time he wrote The Middle Pillar and The Art of True Healing, and he did the basic work for The Philosopher's Stone.

Returning to the United States in 1937, he entered Chiropractic College in New York, graduating in 1941, and published The Golden Dawn. He served in the US Army (1942–45) and then moved to Los Angeles, where he opened a chiropractic practice and taught psychiatry. Upon retirement in 1981, he moved to Sedona.

During his lifetime, he studied psychoanalysis with Dr. E. Clegg and Dr. J. L. Bendit, and later studied psychotherapy under Dr. Nandor Fodor. His training encompassed Freudian, Jungian, and Reichian methods.

As to who authored the various foundation rituals upon which the edifice of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn was erected, debate will perhaps continue forever. One history is given in this book; the other histories have likewise been written and will continue to be written. Their authenticity does not rest upon their history, but history has proven their value. For one hundred years this has been the Mother Lode of Western Esotericism.

John Michael Greer (Western Maryland) has been a student of occult traditions and the unexplained for more than thirty years. A Freemason, a student of geomancy and sacred geometry, and a widely read blogger, he is also the author of numerous books, including Monsters, The New Encyclopedia of the Occult, and Secrets of the Lost Symbol, and he currently serves as the Grand Archdruid of the Ancient Order of Druids in America (AODA), a contemporary school of Druid nature spirituality

1930–2015

In 1969, as president of Llewellyn Publications (now Llewellyn Worldwide Ltd.), he published the first new edition of this book since its original printing and kept it in print continuously thereafter. For that, as well as for his lifelong efforts to promote magic and occult philosophy of all kinds, every student of the Golden Dawn tradition owes him an immense debt. This seventh edition of The Golden Dawn, which he set in motion but did not live to see completed, is dedicated to his memory.

The Golden Dawn

“Howbeit we know after a time there will now be a general reformation, both of divine and human things, according to our desire and the expectation of others; for it is fitting that before the rising of the Sun there should appear and break forth Aurora, or some clearness, of divine light in the sky. And so, in the meantime, some few, which shall give their names, may join together, thereby to increase the number and respect of our Fraternity, and make a happy and wished for beginning of our Philosophical Canons, prescribed to us by our Brother R.C., and be partakers with us of our treasures (which can never fail or be wasted) in all humility and love, to be eased of this world’s labours, and not walk so blindly in the knowledge of the wonderful works of God.”

Preface to the Seventh Edition

“Lord of the Universe—the Vast and the Mighty One!

Ruler of Light and the Darkness!

We adore Thee and we invoke Thee!

Look with favor upon this Neophyte ...

And grant Thine aid unto the higher aspirations of his Soul.”

This was merely one of the powerful, poetic invocations spoken in the Neophyte Ceremony, the first probationary initiation into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, an influential esoteric society of the Victorian era. The purpose for which the Golden Dawn was founded was two-fold. First, through study, education, and organization, the order worked to ensure the survival of the Western Esoteric Tradition, and second, it endeavored to initiate, instruct, and support those individuals who found their calling in the mysticism and ritual, ceremonial magic of the West.

Until the early decades of the twentieth century, little was understood about the mechanics and methods of ceremonial magic due to the secrecy that had veiled these practices. Unless someone was initiated into a magical organization or found a teacher willing to guide them, the chances for learning these procedures were slim to none. This changed when Israel Regardie published four volumes entitled The Golden Dawn, a collection of ceremonies and teachings from the famous magical order of the same name. The floodgates were opened and the magical world was forever transformed. One would be hard-pressed to find a modern-day magical group that has not borrowed heavily from this very book.

No organization has had a greater impact on Western ceremonial magic than that of the Golden Dawn. Irish poet William Butler Yeats once credited his work in the order as inspiring his literary accomplishments: “If I had not made magic my constant study I could not have written a single word of my Blake book, nor would ‘The Countess Kathleen’ have ever come to exist. The mystical life is the center of all that I do and all that I think and all that I write.” Author and mystic Arthur Edward Waite was equally impressed with the order’s Adeptus Minor Ritual: “It could not be denied that the culminating Grade, as the system was then developed, had the root matter of a greater scheme than had ever dawned in the consciousness of any maker of Masonic degrees under any Grand Lodge or Chapter, Conclave or Preceptory, in the whole wide world.” Sentiments such as these were not uncommon among the initiates of the Golden Dawn.

The Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn was founded in London in 1888 by a group of Qabalists, Rosicrucians, Freemasons, and Theosophists. But it was primarily the brainchild of Dr. William Wynn Westcott, a London coroner and prominent Freemason, who envisioned the concept of an esoteric Order open to both men and women.

In 1886, Westcott acquired a manuscript written in cipher, which contained coded outlines for the ceremonies and teachings of a magical order. Included with the document was said to be a letter signed by one “Fraulein Sprengel,” a mysterious German adept of an occult order called Die Goldene Dämmerung, or “Golden Dawn.” Westcott claimed that he got the papers from Rev. A.F.A. Woodford, but many now doubt this assertion.

Preeminent Golden Dawn historian Robert A. Gilbert suspects that the Cipher Manuscript was written by Kenneth Mackenzie, author of The Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia and a leading member of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia. According to Gilbert the ritual outlines contained therein were created for a Golden Dawn prototype group known as the “Society of Eight” said to be provisionally formed in 1883 by Frederick Holland, another high-grade Mason. Holland’s order never fully manifested, and Westcott acquired the Cipher Manuscript after Mackenzie’s death in 1886. As it so happens, the magical motto of the mysterious Fraulein Sprengel, Sapiens Dominabitur Astris (“the wise person shall be ruled by the stars”), was identical to the motto used by Anna Kingsford of the Hermetic Society. Westcott had been a member of Kingsford's Hermetic Society and it was Kingsford who probably served as the unsuspecting model for Westcott's fictitious Fraulein. Regardless, it was the Golden Dawn, not the Society of Eight, which took root and blossomed.

What was Westcott's motivation for creating the false narrative? Very likely to attract leading Masons of the time who expected any worthwhile fraternal organization to have a respectable "pedigree."

Many such groups have a long tradition of tracing their hereditary roots back to the esoteric societies and mystery religions of earlier times—to the sixteenth century Rosicrucians, the medieval Knights Templar, the ancient Israelites, the Egyptians, the Babylonians, and even the inhabitants of Atlantis lost in the mists of time. While these various legends of ancient initiatory lineages and even "apostolic succession" can provide inspiration, allegorical information, and symbolic knowledge that is of great value to the Initiate, they almost always breakdown under the scrutiny of historical fact. The "myth of origin" for any esoteric group should be valued for nuggets of wisdom, ethical teachings, symbolic meanings, and the values it tries to inculcate within the group. Such legends are romantic and appealing to the magical imagination, but they should never be understood to be historically accurate. The same is true of the Golden Dawn. There is no "line of apostolic succession" that leads directly from Christian Rosencreutz to MacGregor Mathers. Wynn Westcott's German Rosicrucian Adept, Fraulein Sprengel, was a necessary invention but a fiction nonetheless. Since the original Golden Dawn ceased to exist in 1903, splitting apart into three separate splinter groups, no one in this day and age can possibly claim institutional lineage to the original Order—much less back to the mythological character of Christian Rosencreutz.

In any event, Westcott secured the aid of two other Masonic Rosicrucians, Dr. William Robert Woodman and Samuel Liddell "MacGregor" Mathers to help develop the rituals and curriculum for his new order, which materialized in February 1888 when the Isis-Urania Temple in London was inaugurated and the Golden Dawn was born.

The Golden Dawn was never designed to be a religion or to usurp the domain of religion. The Order was conceived as a Hermetic Society of like-minded men and women who were dedicated to the philosophical, spiritual, and psychic evolution of humanity. Students were expected to learn the basics of occult science before proceeding to the next fundamental step—practical magic. Advanced members were expected to practice and become skilled in the high magical arts. It was this aspect of the order that set it apart from purely theoretical study groups of the period such as the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, from which the Golden Dawn borrowed much of its structure.

The practical magic of the Golden Dawn covers many areas: banishings; invocations; purifications; talisman consecrations; divinations; meditations; evocations; spiritual development; skrying and visionary work; elemental, planetary, and zodiacal magic; Qabalistic magic; Enochian magic; assumption of godforms; manipulation of the Astral Light; and more. All of these methods were employed to give the Golden Dawn student a broad, working knowledge of the entire magical process. However, the ultimate objective of magic within the Order's framework was inner alchemy—the continual purification of the student's lower personality and the realization of an elevated state of consciousness wherein the magician's psyche gradually enters into a union with the Higher Self and eventually with the Higher and Divine Genius. This is a process of high magic theurgy or “god-working.” Within the various spiritual traditions this primary goal has been described in many ways: the completion of the Great Work, the Magnum Opus, Enlightenment, Knowledge and Conversation with the Holy Guardian Angel, Samadhi, Illumination, Satori, and Self-Realization. In the Neophyte ceremony of the Golden Dawn it is called “the search for the Quintessence, the Stone of the Philosophers, True Wisdom, Perfect Happiness, the Summum Bonum.”

A great deal of practical magic also takes place in the initiation ceremonies of the Order. Outwardly such ceremonies were “ritual dramas” wherein the officers reenact specific mythologies essential to the Western Esoteric Tradition. The “drama” of the Neophyte ceremony centers on the Egyptian story of the Weighing of the Soul in the Hall of Judgment. But other initiations and ritual advancements focus on the saga of the Hebrew Tabernacle in the Wilderness, the Babylonian/Hebrew story of Yahweh conquering the sea, and the Biblical account of the Fall of the Kings of Edom. Still other rites emphasize the Kabiric Mysteries of Samothrace in ancient Greece, and in the Adeptus Minor grade, the allegory of Christian Rosencreutz.

Inwardly, however, these ritual dramas are vitalized with active methods of high magic designed to effect a psycho-spiritual change in the awareness of the candidate. The officers who perform these ceremonies visualize and empower various symbols and correspondences, invoke the associated spiritual forces, manipulate the currents of the Astral Light, and use the faculties of willpower, visualization, and imagination to give the ceremony its magical potency.

To this day the Golden Dawn system continues to be one of the best, most coherent systems of Western ritual magic ever conceived. The Order’s curriculum has also served as the foundation and springboard for various other magical groups and orders. Not surprisingly, we, like most modern magicians, owe a huge debt of gratitude to Regardie for publishing The Golden Dawn and making this valuable material accessible to all who wish to study and practice it.

With the publication of The Golden Dawn, as well as an earlier book entitled The Tree of Life, Regardie made the Golden Dawn system of magic available to an eager audience of esoteric students and removed the excessive secrecy that veiled modern theurgy. A letter written to Regardie in 1959 by author Walter Ernest Butler stated what has become a familiar refrain of praise: “Your writings have been of such great help to me over the years ... all I can say is that in many ways they altered my whole outlook.” William G. Grey, author of The Ladder of Lights echoed this sentiment a decade later in a similar letter: “You, of all people, wrote actually more into The Ladder of Lights than perhaps I did.” Francis King and Isabel Sutherland probably summed it up best in The Rebirth of Magic: “That the rebirth of occult magic has taken place in the way it has can be very largely attributed to the writings of one man, Dr. Francis Israel Regardie.” Before his death in 1985, “Francis” Israel Regardie was considered by many to be one of the primary custodians of the Golden Dawn tradition.

Regardie’s entrance into the Stella Matutina, the most viable offshoot of the original Golden Dawn, took place in January of 1933. He made rapid progress through the grades but was terribly disappointed with the dilapidated state of affairs that he found there. Nevertheless, he was profoundly grateful for his experience with the Golden Dawn and a lengthy Freudian analysis —“for both of which I can say in all humility and simplicity—Thank God!” Convinced that the vital teachings of the Order were soon to be lost through neglect, and because he felt strongly that such teachings were “the heritage of every man and woman—their spiritual birthright,” Regardie published much of the rituals and teachings in the four volumes of The Golden Dawn from 1937 to 1940.

We first became interested in magic back in the early 1970s. At that time, two books were our constant companions: Frances Barrett’s The Magus and Israel Regardie’s The Golden Dawn. Eventually we learned that Barrett had liberally “borrowed” large swaths of his book from Henry Cornelius Agrippa’s magnum opus Three Books of Occult Philosophy (1531), a text that had an enormous influence on the teachings of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. As a result, Barrett’s book began to diminish in importance to us, while Regardie's book, fully titled The Golden Dawn: The Original Account of the Teachings, Rites, and Ceremonies of the Order of the Golden Dawn, became even more central to our studies. The richness of the Order's teachings was evident on every page—here was a system of magic that was effective, efficient, harmonious, and elegant. Every piece of the system fit perfectly with every other piece, like a finely-woven tapestry. We knew we had found our true spiritual path.

However, our search for the actual Golden Dawn led nowhere—the Order seemed to have been dormant for several decades. So we formed our own temple, Isis-Urania, in Columbus, Georgia, in 1977 using Regardie's The Golden Dawn as our primary sourcebook. Within a couple of years we had initiated fourteen other members. Shortly afterward, we obtained Regardie's mailing address and began corresponding with him in 1981.

We first met “Francis” Israel Regardie and became his students in June 1982 when he came to our temple for a week of lectures and initiations. On the day of Corpus Christi (June 24, 1982), Regardie, acting as Chief Adept, consecrated our Vault of the Adepti, the complex ritual chamber required to perform Inner Order initiations. In the days that followed, Regardie performed two Adeptus Minor initiations. After that he assumed the office of Hierophant, consecrated our Neophyte Hall, and performed a Neophyte initiation. This was the one and only time that Regardie ever took on these offices and performed Golden Dawn initiation ceremonies.

Our friendship and study sessions with Regardie resulted in many long phone conversations as well as several trips to Sedona, Arizona—including a final two-week visit in 1985 only ten days before Regardie's death. Shortly thereafter, we performed the Requiem Ceremony from The Golden Dawn in his honor, in conjunction with the reading of one of his favorite pieces, “The Prayer of the Sylphs” from the Theoricus Ritual.

But the important work that Regardie first began by preserving the rituals and teachings of the Golden Dawn for future generations continues to bear fruit today. His book The Golden Dawn remains as one of the greatest gifts ever given to today's practicing magicians. Within the last few decades, an explosion of interest in the Golden Dawn has resulted in the formation of new Golden Dawn temples and orders—some promote the traditional teachings while others focus upon a mixture of Golden Dawn with other spiritual traditions. New and old avenues for magic and personal growth based on the Order's teachings continue to be explored and expanded upon within the greater esoteric community. Regardie's role in this current Golden Dawn renaissance cannot be underestimated. His books have become the instruction manuals for Golden Dawn magicians of the twenty-first century.

However, students have not always found The Golden Dawn an easy read. Many have yearned for an updated version of Regardie's text, but the task of revamping this complex classic has been a daunting one. This is precisely why Llewellyn's seventh edition is such a godsend.

This new edition of The Golden Dawn is the one that students have been waiting for—a clean edition with typos removed; translation errors fixed; consistent typography, spelling, and fonts; readable rituals with stage directions that make sense; fresh new illustrations; and a new index. John Michael Greer's knowledge and expertise on this formidable project has proven to be indispensable in this regard. He is to be heartily congratulated for his work on this definitive text. We suspect that this edition will be the standard for decades to come.

Swiss Psychologist Carl Jung tells us that “synchronicity is an ever present reality for those who have eyes to see.” The most important events in our lives have always been marked by a series of graceful synchronicities or “meaningful coincidences” that seem to defy mundane logic and define the essence of magic itself. Even an ostensibly simple act, like the timely purchase of a copy of Regardie's The Golden Dawn, has had great meaning for us—it signaled the beginning of our life-long journey into the realm of magic. This book was the catalyst that set our spiritual lives on the path of their orbits. Readers of this new edition of The Golden Dawn may find that the same is true for them.

Foreword to the Seventh Edition by John Michael Greer

Every so often in the history of magic, a single book gathers up the occult teachings and practices of an entire era within its pages and becomes a core resource for generations of mages thereafter. On the Mysteries by Iamblichus of Chalcis, which gathered the heritage of classical Pagan magic and transmitted it to the future; Picatrix, which taught generations of medieval wizards the mysteries of Arabic astrological magic; and Three Books of Occult Philosophy by Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa, which handed down the magic of the Renaissance to later times—these and books like them have had a profound impact on magical theory and practice down through the centuries.

The twentieth century also produced such a book, and it's the one you now hold in your hands. Over the three quarters of a century since it first saw print, Israel Regardie's The Golden Dawn has become far and away the most influential modern handbook of magical theory and practice. It is a treasure chest of arcane lore that has inspired countless students of magic and found an honored place as an essential textbook in scores of magical lodges and occult schools. It has been translated into many languages and copied (with or without acknowledgment) by hundreds of authors, and the fundamental concepts and practices of magic presented in its pages have been taken up by occult traditions all over the world.

Like most modern students of magic, I can testify to the importance of The Golden Dawn from personal experience. When I began learning the magical art, back in the middle years of the 1970s, publicly available resources on the subject were scarce, and most books on occult subjects were long on pretentious verbiage and embarrassingly short on actual theory or practice. There were a few welcome exceptions—Francis King and Stephen Skinner's Techniques of High Magic and Gareth Knight's two little gems Occult

Exercises and Practices and The Practice of Ritual Magic were among the most important in my early studies—but the most significant of all, the book that mattered most to me and many other students of my generation, was The Golden Dawn.

It took me several years to save up the money to buy my first copy, and longer still to tackle the formidable prospect of working my way through it from cover to cover—from the first Knowledge Lecture in Volume One to the final intricacies of Enochian chess in the last pages of Volume Four. Like most other serious students of Golden Dawn magic, though, that's what I finally did, and for well over a decade thereafter, The Golden Dawn was the constant companion of my magical training.

These days, good books on magic are much more readily available than they once were. Students of magic have any number of readable, well-organized introductory guides they can buy and study. The prospect of spending ten or twelve years of daily study and practice, slogging through The Golden Dawn page by page, may seem as outdated as writing on clay tablets. Still, for those who have already learned the basics of the magical art, putting in the time that's needed to master a tradition of magic from top to bottom—from the simplest introductory lessons and exercises straight through to the summits of its philosophy and practice—opens doors that nothing else can.

The Golden Dawn, in turn, is among the very best resources for systematic study and practice along these lines, because it's not simply the record of one person's experience and practice. The rituals, essays, and instructional papers that make up The Golden Dawn were written by many people over the course of nearly half a century, and thus embody the experience of an entire magical order and of the traditions from which that order was born. Even those students of magic whose primary work lies elsewhere have much to learn from a careful study of the teachings of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. For those who feel themselves called to the Golden Dawn tradition, on the other hand, it contains enough in the way of magical teachings and techniques to keep the aspiring mage busy for a lifetime.

Francis Israel Regardie was born in London's West End slum district in 1907, the child of an impoverished Jewish family, and emigrated to the United States with his parents at the age of fourteen. In his teen years, he enrolled in the Societas Rosicruciana in America (SRIA), one of the many Rosicrucian orders active in America at that time, and reached the rank of Zelator. In 1927, he encountered the writings of Aleister Crowley; he was deeply impressed and wrote to Crowley, met him in Paris a short time later, and found himself hired as the Great Beast's secretary.

That position lasted until 1931, when Crowley ran out of money. In the meantime, Regardie devoted much of his time to studying magic and occult philosophy, and he published his first two books in the year following his parting with Crowley—A Garden of Pomegranates, a short but useful summary of Cabalistic teaching, and the far more substantial The Tree of Life, which still ranks as one of the best summaries of the basic philosophy and approach of Golden Dawn magic ever penned.

These books won him entrance to the British magical community, and he was initiated into the Hermes Temple of the Stella Matutina, one of the fragments left over from the explosive disintegration of the original Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in 1900–1903. There he rose quickly through the grades of initiation, and he received most of the instructional materials included in this book. He was appalled, however, by what he saw as the ignorance and incompetence of the leading members of Hermes Temple, and he learned, to his dismay, that many of the teaching documents of the original Golden Dawn had been withdrawn from circulation or even destroyed. These unwelcome discoveries convinced him that something drastic had to be done if the teachings of the Golden Dawn were to be saved from extinction. This inspired him to begin collecting as many Golden Dawn documents as he could find, making use of his contacts throughout the British occult scene to fill out the set of rituals and papers he had received as a Hermes Temple initiate.

In 1935, Regardie took all of the Golden Dawn documents in his collection and began the immense task of assembling them into a single book. His efforts to place the project with his British publisher went nowhere—there have been rumors ever since that one or another influential British occultist applied pressure to sink the project—and so he returned to the United States and found an American occult publisher, Aries Press in Chicago, willing to take on the gargantuan project. The Golden Dawn duly appeared in four volumes between 1937 and 1940.

Regardie went on to have a long and distinguished career as an author of occult nonfiction, a therapist in the alternative health care field, and a guide and inspiration to many younger American occultists. Many of his books remain valuable guides to students of magic today. The Golden Dawn, though, remains his most durable legacy, and it will likely remain so for centuries to come. Few authors, in and out of the occult field, have the opportunity to create a work that will be passed down through the ages; The Golden Dawn is such a work.

The way Regardie arranged the four original volumes of The Golden Dawn may seem puzzling at first, but it comes out of the task he set himself—that of preserving the teachings of an order whose custodians seemed content to let it die in total obscurity. It's one thing to receive occult teachings and disciplines in a magical lodge that can illustrate them symbolically in ritual, and impress the subtle dimension of those teachings into the new initiate's mind and spirit, before handing over the knowledge lectures that give the symbols, the practices, and the patterns of subtle energy their resting place in ordinary knowledge. It's quite another to study those same teachings and disciplines alone, without the benefit of ceremonial initiation, and these two paths define very different ways in which the tradition can best be approached.

This is why, for example, the knowledge lectures of the grades are all given in Volume One, prior to any of the rituals. Encountering the rituals for the first time as a written text, without any grasp of the meaning of the symbolism deployed in them, invites frustration and discouragement. Start instead with the knowledge lectures, study them carefully, take up the basic exercises given in the first knowledge lecture and practice them daily, and by the time you reach the texts of the degree rituals, you'll be able to figure out what's going on. In the same way, once the knowledge lectures and degree rituals have been studied, the magical disciplines in Volume Three and the advanced techniques in Volume Four can readily be mastered.

Those readers who are approaching this book as a resource for magical training, outside the purview of a functioning Golden Dawn temple, thus need only proceed through the teachings in the order in which they appear in this book. Start with Regardie's introduction, which provides a thorough overview of the Order's teachings and ceremonies, along with a great deal of valuable practical advice on how to approach the Golden Dawn system without the assistance of a temple or the mentorship of adepts.

With that overview in place, proceed to the first knowledge lecture, and learn what it has to teach; not in a casual manner, but thoroughly, because you will be using every detail constantly in your later work. Learn the astrological symbols and the Hebrew letters so that you not only can read them at a glance but can draw them accurately at will and can write the names of the Sephiroth in Hebrew letters without having to look up the spelling.

Special attention should be directed to the two practical techniques given to the Neophyte in the first knowledge lecture—the Lesser Ritual of the Pentagram and the Golden Dawn method of meditation. Students very often slight these two fundamental practices, passing from the Lesser Ritual of the Pentagram to more complicated ceremonies as soon as possible, and ignoring the meditations entirely. That way lies failure, for like any other building, the temple of initiation can never be stronger than its foundation.

The Lesser Ritual of the Pentagram, as given on page 56, practiced twice daily as described in the knowledge lecture—invoking in the morning, banishing in the evening—provides essential training in core skills of magical practice and establishes the elemental symbols and forces in the mind and subtle body of the student. Over time, it also teaches direct perception of the movement of magical energies: a crucial skill, and one too often neglected in magical training nowadays. Practicing day after day, the student becomes aware of the changes that follow when force is invoked or banished, and this awareness broadens to a powerful sense of magical energies at work.

The Golden Dawn method of meditation is equally important to students who are pursuing the work on their own. The method given in the First Meditation on page 55 may seem embarrassingly simple, but like so much of the fundamental work of the order, it has depths that do not show themselves at a casual glance. The key to those depths, as with the comparable depths of the Lesser Ritual of the Pentagram, is daily practice.

Discursive meditation, to give the method its proper name, is in fact one of the lost keys of Western occultism. Many of the emblems, images, and enigmatic texts of occult tradition are meant to be “unpacked” through daily meditation. The aspiring student of the Golden Dawn tradition is well advised to start with the initial topic of meditation given in the first knowledge lecture, and then go on to meditate on the symbols of astrology, the names of the ten Sephiroth, the words and images of the Lesser Ritual of the Pentagram, and the two pillars of the temple. Upon reaching the second knowledge lecture, after the assigned meditation, the symbols and teachings of the Zelator grade become themes for meditation, and so on.

This is an important part of the work for those who have the opportunity to pursue their studies as a member of a Golden Dawn temple, but it’s far more important for those who are doing the work on their own. Systematic meditation on the symbols and teachings of each grade has the same magical effect as passing through a ceremonial initiation into that grade; either way, the symbols, concepts, and energies of the grade are awakened in what the Golden Dawn teachings call the sphere of sensation—the aura of subtle energies that surrounds the individual—and allow the initiate to come into contact with the magical powers of the cosmos.

The Lesser Ritual of the Pentagram and daily meditation on the knowledge lectures, followed by the ritual of each grade, provide the solitary student with the foundation of practical work for the Outer Order grades. Once the first two volumes of this book have been worked through in this way, the student is well prepared to go on to the two volumes following, and take up the work of ritual magic, skrying in the spirit vision, divination, and the rest of the extraordinary panoply of occult technique provided in the Golden Dawn papers collected here.

This work is essential to those who seek to practice Golden Dawn magic themselves, but it is even more so to those who aspire to teach and initiate others. Golden Dawn temples have been founded using only the material in The Golden Dawn as a basis for working, but in my experience, at least, the founders of successful temples studied and practiced the Golden Dawn teachings thoroughly themselves before trying to share the tradition with anyone else. Just as an unlit match will not light a candle, an initiation ritual performed by officers who have not themselves contacted and integrated the magical energies of the grade being conferred is nothing more than amateur theatrics. Only those who invest the time and effort to learn the teachings, meditate on the symbols, practice the rituals, and awaken the energies of the tradition are in any position to pass on the tradition to others.

The Golden Dawn, as noted above, originally appeared in four hardbound volumes. The first four Llewellyn editions were straightforward reprints of the original version, in double or a single volume, with a few minor additions to the text. This had the benefit of fidelity to the original work; still, first the edition had its share of errors and misprints, many illustrations were left out to save money, and the graphics that did find their way into print were crudely drawn and not always useful. These were duly reproduced in the editions that followed.

The sixth edition, which appeared in 1989, was a far more ambitious project. The text was scanned and reset, not merely reprinted, and some of the errata in the original edition were finally caught and fixed; a table of contents, a table of diagrams, and a very thorough index compiled by David Godwin were added for the convenience of students; a substantial body of additional forewords, afterwords, explanations, and introductions to the ritual work were written by some of the most active and respected Golden Dawn initiates of that era; and changes were made here and there to correspond to the practice of current Golden Dawn temples.

These real accomplishments, though, were balanced by serious flaws. The illustrations, with all their shortcomings, were carried over unchanged from earlier editions; the missing images were not inserted; and the process of scanning and resetting the text, though it caught some old errors, managed to add new ones. The additional material added to the text, while it was erudite and in places very helpful, tended to confuse specific interpretations of the Golden Dawn tradition with the tradition itself, and made the resulting volume less useful to the many students who approached the work in different ways. Meanwhile, down on the material plane, the sheer volume of text, combined with the publisher's decision to produce the book in paperback format, required such small type, dense printing, and compressed layout that the sixth edition earned the less-than-affectionate nickname of "the black brick."

When Llewellyn Publications asked me to take on the project of preparing a seventh edition, we agreed from the beginning that the best strategy was to go back to basics. There are many ways to fill in the general outline of work sketched out by the Golden Dawn papers and Regardie's editorial notes; rather than inserting one of these approaches—mine or anyone else's—into The Golden Dawn, it seemed best to let the text speak for itself and to encourage Golden Dawn temples and teachers to do as some have already done and prepare commentaries setting out their specific interpretations of teaching and practice.

More generally, as I researched the various options, it became clear to me that The Golden Dawn deserved to be treated as any other classic work is treated when a new edition is prepared nowadays. As far as possible, along these lines, I have tried to free it from editors' and printers' errors, to correct those obvious mistakes that needed to be fixed, to adjust the text to current standards of capitalization and punctuation, and to supply it with the missing illustrations and with more accurate and attractive graphics throughout, so that the original work can communicate itself more completely to its readers. I have also added footnotes where this seemed helpful.

One result of the editorial decisions just indicated may briefly startle readers familiar with older editions of The Golden Dawn. The original Golden Dawn papers were written in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, but their authors wanted to make them look much older, and they deliberately used archaic style, grammar, and capitalization to get that effect. The style and grammar have been left unchanged, but modern editions of nineteenth-century books normally prune the exuberant capitalization of that period. Consider the following typical passage, from The Garden of Eden Before the Fall (page 84):

Thus the Rivers form a Cross and on it THE GREAT ADAM, the SON who is to rule the Nations, was extended from TIPHARETH and his arms stretch out to GEBURAH AND GEDULAH, and in MALKUTH is EVE, supporting with her hands the TWO PILLARS.

By bringing the capitalization up to date—

Thus the rivers form a cross and on it the great Adam, the son who is to rule the nations, was extended from Tiphareth, and his arms stretch out to Geburah and Gedulah, and in Malkuth is Eve, supporting with her hands the two pillars.

—nothing is lost, and a great deal of readability is gained.

From the very earliest days of the project, it was clear to me that the task of preparing a corrected edition of The Golden Dawn required more than a single pair of eyes and hands, and I sent out a general letter to the Golden Dawn community asking for assistance. The results went far beyond anything I expected, both in terms of the number of people who responded and the level of assistance they were willing to offer. The response was so great that I was not able to make use of all the help that was offered, especially once it became clear that the best approach to this project would be an improved edition of Regardie's work rather than a completely new presentation of the original source material he used. I remain grateful to all the many people who sent encouragement and suggestions. Any remaining errors and inadequacies in this new edition, of course, are mine.

I would like to thank the following members of the Golden Dawn community for their contributions to this new edition: Nicholas Chapel, Dirk Cloete, Alfred DeStefano, Nick Farrell, Adam Forrest, David Griffin, Earl King Jr., Darcy Kuntz, Walter Lavash, Aaron Leitch, Harry Lerwill, Liza Lewelyn, Sean O'Daniels, Samuel Scarborough, Mark Stavish, Patrick Terrell, Clare Vaughn, Peregrin Wildoak, and Nagasiva Yronwode. Particular thanks are due to two contributors from the Golden Dawn community: Uri Raz took on the immense task of compiling a list of typographical and printing errors in the sixth edition, and completed it with aplomb, and James Clark tackled the equally huge project of creating a completely new and corrected set of illustrations for the new edition, and carried it off with equal success.

At Llewellyn Publications, associate publisher Bill Krause offered me this project and was always available for e-mail discussions; senior acquisitions editor Elysia Gallo shepherded it along the journey from first discussions to final edits, and editor Stephanie Finne made the last stages of that journey a good deal easier than I had expected. My thanks go with all.

Finally, a word of acknowledgment is owed to those without whom this project would never have been possible in the first place. To William Wynn Westcott and Samuel Liddell Mathers, who founded the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn; to the adepti and initiates of the original order and its successor groups, who contributed so much to the tradition; to Israel Regardie, who gathered up the results and made sure they would not be lost to the future; to Carl Llewellyn Weschke, who republished The Golden Dawn and kept it in print despite the ups and downs of popular taste; and to all the readers and students of the Golden Dawn, past, present, and future, this new edition is dedicated. May it bring Light in Extension to students of the Mysteries for generations to come.

Introduction to the First Edition by Israel Regardie

It was in the year 1890 that Dr. Franz Hartmann, in an endeavour to provide a simple outline of the vicissitudes of what came to be known as the Rosicrucian Order, wrote a book entitled In the Pronaos of the Temple. The central figure of this history was a monk, Fr. R.C.—described in the earliest Rosicrucian manifesto the Fama Fraternitatis as the “pious, spiritual, and highly-illuminated Father ... It is said that he was a German nobleman who had been educated in a convent, and that long before the time of the Reformation he had made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in company with another brother of this convent, and that while at Damascus they had been initiated by some learned Arabs into the mysteries of the secret science. After remaining three years at Damascus, they went to Fez, in Africa, and there they obtained still more knowledge of magic, and of the relations existing between the macrocosm and microcosm. After having also traveled in Spain, he returned to Germany, where he founded a kind of convent called Sanctus Spiritus, and remained there writing his secret science and continuing his studies. He then accepted as his assistants, at first, three, and afterwards, four more monks from the same convent in which he had been educated, and thus founded the first society of the Rosicrucians. They then laid down the results of their science in books, which are said to be still in existence, and in the hands of some Rosicrucians. It is then said that 120 years after his death, the entrance to his tomb was discovered. A staircase led into a subterranean vault, at the door of which was written, Post annos CXX patebo. There was a light burning in the vault, which, however, became extinct as soon as it was approached. The vault had seven sides and seven angles, each side being five feet wide and eight feet high. The upper part represented the firmament, the floor, the earth, and they were laid out in triangles, while each side was divided into ten squares. In the middle was an altar, bearing a brass plate, upon which were engraved the letters, A.C.R.C., and the words Hoc Universi Compendium vivus mihi Sepulchrum feci. In the midst were four figures surrounded by the words, Nequaquam Vacuum. Legis Jugum. Libertas Evangelii. Dei Gloria Intacta. Below the altar was found the body of Rosenkreutz, intact, and without any signs of putrefaction. In his hand was a book of parchment, with golden letters marked on the cover with a T, and at the end was written, Ex Deo nascimur. In Jesus morimur. Per Spiritum Sanctum reviviscimus.”

It was upon this schema and from this original body, to state it briefly, that the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn claimed direct descent. Its history lecture, however, volunteered very few verifiable details as to the historical facts which, from the scholarly point of view, we should be acquainted with—the details for example of the line of descent from, say, 1614 to 1865. Current within the present-day Order was the belief that at various dates within the period named, the Order as an organized body of students ceased to exist. Instead, there was an oral continuation of teaching from isolated initiates here, there, and everywhere, until more recent times when religious and political conditions did not militate against the advisability of formulating a group. With the institution of a definite body, the original system of grades was reestablished, and the systems of alchemy, the Qabalah, and magic once more were taught to zealous, aspiring Neophytes. As a cloak to their activities, they likewise continued in the early agreement of the Order, which was:

“First, that none of them should profess any other thing than to cure the sick, and that gratis.

“Second, none of the posterity should be constrained to wear one certain kind of habit, but therein to follow the custom of the country.

“Third, that every year, upon the day C. they should meet together at the house Sanctus Spiritus, or write the cause of his absence.

“Fourth, every brother should look about for a worthy person who, after his decease, might succeed him.

“Fifth, the word R.C. should be their seal, mark, and character.

With this preliminary account, we may turn to the claims of the Order within the more historical times of the late nineteenth century, though unfortunately, these claims are no more verifiable and certainly no clearer than those that characterized its beginning.

“The Order of the Golden Dawn,” narrates the history lecture of that Order, “is an Hermetic society whose members are taught the principles of occult science and the magic of Hermes. During the early part of the second half of last century, several eminent adepts and chiefs of the Order in France and England died, and their death caused a temporary dormant condition of temple work.

“Prominent among the adepts of our Order and of public renown were Eliphas Lévi, the greatest of modern French magi; Ragon, the author of several books of occult lore; Kenneth M. Mackenzie, author of the famous and learned Masonic Encyclopaedia; and Frederick Hockley, possessed of the power of vision in the crystal, and whose manuscripts are highly esteemed. These and other contemporary adepts of this Order received their knowledge and power from predecessors of equal and even of greater eminence. They received indeed and have handed down to us their doctrine and system of theosophy and Hermetic science and the higher alchemy from a long series of practiced investigators whose origin is traced to the Fratres Roseae Crucis of Germany, which association was founded by one Christian Rosenkreutz about the year 1398 AD.

“The Rosicrucian revival of mysticism was but a new development of the vastly older wisdom of the Qabalistic rabbis and of that very ancient secret knowledge, the magic of the Egyptians, in which the Hebrew Pentateuch tells you that Moses, the founder of the Jewish system, was ‘learned,’ that is, in which he had been initiated.”

In a slender but highly informative booklet entitled Data of the History of the Rosicrucians published in 1916 by the late Dr. William Wynn Westcott, we find the following brief statement: “In 1887 by permission of S.D.A. a continental Rosicrucian adept, the Isis-Urania Temple of Hermetic Students of the G.D. was formed to give instruction in the mediaeval occult sciences. Fratres M.E.V. with S.A. and S.R.M.D. became the chiefs, and the latter wrote the rituals in modern English from old Rosicrucian mss. (the property of S.A.) supplemented by his own literary researches.”

In these two statements is narrated the beginning of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn—an organization which has exerted a greater influence on the development of occultism since its revival in the last quarter of the nineteenth century than most people can realize. There can be little or no doubt that the Golden Dawn is, or rather was until very recently, the sole depository of magical knowledge, the only occult Order of any real worth that the West in our time has known. A great many other occult organizations owe what little magical knowledge is theirs to leakages issuing from that Order and from its renegade members.

The membership of the Golden Dawn was recruited from every circle, and it was represented by dignified professions as well as by all the arts and sciences, to make but little mention of the trades and business occupations. It included physicians, psychologists, clergymen, artists, and philosophers. And normal men and women, humble and unknown, from every walk of life have drawn inspiration from its font of wisdom, and undoubtedly many would be happy to recognize and admit the enormous debt they owe it.

As an organization, it preferred after the fashion of its mysterious parent always to shroud itself in an impenetrable cloak of mystery. Its teaching and methods of instruction were stringently guarded by serious penalties attached to the most awe-inspiring obligations in order to ensure that secrecy. So well have these obligations, with but one or two exceptions, been kept that the general public knows next to nothing about the Order, its teaching, or the extent and nature of its membership. Though this book will touch upon the teaching of the Golden Dawn, concerning its membership as a whole the writer will have nothing to say, except perhaps to repeat what may already be more or less well known. For instance, it is common knowledge that W.B. Yeats, Arthur Machen, and if rumour may be trusted, the late Allan Bennett were at one time among its members, together with a good many other writers and artists.

With regard to the names given in Dr. Westcott's statement, it is necessary that we bestow to them some little attention in order to unravel, so far as may be possible, the almost inextricable confusion which has characterized every previous effort to detail the history of the Order. M.E.V. was the motto chosen by Dr. William Robert Woodman, an eminent Freemason of the last century. Sapere Aude and Non Omnis Moriar were the two mottoes used by Dr. Westcott, an antiquarian, scholar, and coroner by profession. S.R.M.D. or S' Rhiogail Ma Dhream was the motto of S.L. MacGregor Mathers, the translator of The Greater Key of King Solomon, the Book of the Sacred Magic of Abramelin the Mage, and The Kabbalah Unveiled, which latter consisted of certain portions of the Zohar prefixed by an introduction of high erudition. He also employed the Latin motto Deo Duce Comite Ferro. S.D.A. was the abbreviation of the motto Sapiens Dominabitur Astris chosen by a Fraulein Anna Sprengel of Nuremberg, Germany. Such were the actors on this occult stage, this the dramatis personae in the background of the commencement of the Order. More than any other figures who may later have prominently figured in its government and work, these are the four outstanding figures publicly involved in the English foundation of what came to be known as the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

How the actual instigation of the Order came to pass is not really known. Or rather, because of so many conflicting stories and legends, the truth is impossible to discover. At any rate, so far as England is concerned, without a doubt we must seek for its origin in the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia. This was an organization formulated in 1865 by eminent Freemasons, some of them claiming authentic Rosicrucian initiation from continental authorities.

Amongst those who claimed such initiation was one Kenneth H. Mackenzie, a Masonic scholar and encyclopaedist, who had received his at the hands of a Count Apponyi in Austria. The objects of this society, which confined its membership to Freemasons in good standing, was “to afford mutual aid and encouragement in working out the great problems of Life, and in discovering the secrets of nature; to facilitate the study of the systems of philosophy founded upon the Kaballah and the doctrines of Hermes Trismegistus.” Dr. Westcott also remarks that today its Fratres “are concerned in the study and administration of medicines, and in their manufacture upon old lines; they also teach and practice the curative effects of coloured light, and cultivate mental processes that are believed to induce spiritual enlightenment and extended powers of the human senses, especially in the directions of clairvoyance and clairsaudience.”

The first chief of this society, its Supreme Magus so-called, was one Robert Wentworth Little who is said to have rescued some old rituals from a certain Masonic storeroom, and it was from certain of those papers that the society’s rituals were elaborated. He died in 1878, and in his stead was appointed Dr. William R. Woodman. Both Dr. Westcott and MacGregor Mathers were prominent and active members of this body. In fact, the former became Supreme Magus upon Woodman’s death, the office of Junior Magus being conferred upon Mathers. One legend has it that one day Westcott discovered in his library a series of cipher manuscripts, and in order to decipher them he enlisted the aid of MacGregor Mathers. It is said that this library was that of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, and it is likewise asserted that those cipher manuscripts were among the rituals and documents originally rescued by Robert Little from Freemason’s Hall. Yet other accounts have it that Westcott or a clerical friend found the manuscripts on a bookstall in Farringdon Street. Further apocryphal legends claim that they were found in the library of books and manuscripts inherited from the mystic and clairvoyant Frederick Hockley, who died in 1885. Whatever the real origin of these mysterious cipher manuscripts, when eventually deciphered with the aid of MacGregor Mathers, they were alleged to have contained the address of a Fraulein Anna Sprengel who purported to be a Rosicrucian adept, in Nuremberg. Here was a discovery that, naturally, not for one moment was neglected. Its direct result was a lengthy correspondence with Fraulein Sprengel, culminating in the transmission of authority to Woodman, Westcott, and Mathers to formulate in England a semi-public occult organization that was to employ an elaborate magical ceremonial, Qabalistic teaching, and a comprehensive scheme of spiritual training. Its foundation was designed to include both men and women on a basis of perfect equality in contradistinction to the policy of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, which was comprised wholly of Freemasons. Thus, in 1887, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn was established. Its first English Temple, Isis-Urania, was opened in the following year.

There is a somewhat different version as to its origin, having behind it the authority of Frater F.R., the late Dr. Felkin, who was the Chief of the Stella Matutina as well as a member of the Societas Rosicruciana. According to his account, and the following words are substantially his own, prior to 1880, members of the Rosicrucian Order on the Continent selected with great care their own candidates whom they thought suitable for personal instruction. For these pupils they were each individually responsible, the pupils thus selected being trained by them in the theoretical traditional knowledge now used in the Outer Order. After some three or more years of intensive private study, these pupils were presented to the chiefs of the Order, and if approved and passed by examination, they then received their initiation into the Order of the Roseae Rubeae et Aureae Crucis.

The political state of Europe in the nineteenth century was such that the strictest secrecy as to the activities of these people was very necessary. England, however, where many Masonic bodies and semiprivate organizations were flourishing without interference, was recognized as having far greater freedom and liberty than the countries in which the continental adepts were domiciled. Some, but by no means all, suggested therefore that in England open temple work might be inaugurated. And Dr. Felkin here adds, though without the least word of explanation as to what machinery was set in motion towards the attainment of that end, “and so it was ... It came about then that temples arose in London, Bradford, Weston-super-Mare, and Edinburgh. The ceremonies we have were elaborated from cipher manuscripts, and all went well for a time.”

Since the history of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn subsequent to this period has already been narrated elsewhere, there is little need to repeat it. Those who may be interested in a detailed, meticulous history of the Rosicrucian claim as it has existed in Europe during the past three hundred years are advised to consult Arthur Edward Waite’s The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross, while in my small work My Rosicrucian Adventure the events that occurred to the Golden Dawn, culminating in this present publication of its teaching and rituals, are delineated at some length. The motives that have confirmed me in this decision to act contrary to the obligation of secrecy are there presented and discussed. And with these directions, let us pass from historical bones to what is the dynamic life and soul of the Order, its teaching and ceremonial technique of initiation.

Before one can grasp the nature of ceremonial initiation, which was the assumed function of the Golden Dawn, a few fundamental notions of the philosophy underlying its practice must be grasped. The basic theory of the Order system was such as to identify certain of the grades with various spiritual principles existing in the universe. Hence a philosophy which describes, classifies, and purports to understand the nature of the universe must be studied before the significance of the grades can be appreciated. One of the most important backgrounds of the system is the scheme of the Qabalah, a Jewish system described at length in my Tree of Life and the knowledge lectures herein. Since it is primarily a mystical method, the Qabalah has innumerable points of identity with the more ancient systems elaborated by other peoples in other parts of the world. Its most important root concept is that the ultimate root from which this universe, with all things therein, has evolved is Ain Soph Aour, infinite or limitless light. So far as our minds are capable of conceiving such metaphysical abstractions, this is to be understood as an infinite ocean of brilliance wherein all things are held as within a matrix, from which all things were evolved, and it is that divine goal to which all life and all beings eventually must return.

Issuing from or within this boundless light, there manifests what is called the Tree of Life. Qabalists have produced a conventional glyph indicating thereupon ten numerations or Sephiroth, which are the branches of that Tree growing or evolving within space, ten different modes of the manifestation of its radiation—ten varying degrees of but one ubiquitous substance-principle.

The first of these numeration is called Kether, the Crown, and is the first manifestation from the unknown, a concentration of its infinite light. As the radiant apex of this heavenly tree, it is the deepest sense of selfhood and the ultimate root of substance. It constitutes the divine centre of human consciousness, all the other principles which comprise what we call man being rather like so many layers of an onion around a central core. From this metaphysical and universal centre duality issues, two distinct principles of activity, the one named Chokmah, Wisdom, and the other Binah, Understanding. Here we have the roots of polarity, male and female, positive and negative, fire and water, mind and matter, and these two ideas are the noumena of all the various opposites in life of which we have cognizance.

These three emanations are unique in a special way, and they especially symbolize that “light which shineth in darkness,” the light of the spiritual self. As light shines into darkness, illuminating it without suffering a diminution of its own existence, so the workings of the Supernals, as these three Sephiroth are called, overflow from their exuberant being without thereby diminishing in any degree the reality or infinite vitality of their source. They are considered hence to have but little relation with the inferior Sephiroth that issue from them, except as stem and root. Yet though hardly in any philosophic relation to our phenomenal universe, we find when engaged in magical working that it is customary—even necessary—to open ourselves by invocation to its influence so that this divine power of the supernal light, descending through the human mind, may sanctify and accomplish the object of the ceremony itself. The Supernals are often portrayed diagrammatically and symbolically as a woman clothed with the sun, stars above her head and the moon at her feet—the typical anima figure of modern psychology.

She represents thus that First Matter of the alchemists, the description of which given by Thomas Vaughan in his Coelum Terrae is interesting to quote as indicating further the nature and qualities of the Supernals: “A most pure sweet virgin, for nothing as yet hath been generated out of her ... She yields to nothing but love, for her end is generation, and that was never yet performed by violence. He that knows how to wanton and toy with her, the same shall receive all her treasures. First, she sheds at her nipples a thick heavy water, but white as any snow; the philosophers call it Virgin’s Milk. Secondly, she gives him blood from her very heart; it is a quick, heavenly fire; some improperly call it their sulphur. Thirdly and lastly, she presents him with a secret crystal, of more worth and luster than the white rock and all her rosials. This is she, and these are her favors.”

From this first triad, a second triad of emanations is reflected or projected downwards into a more coarse degree of substance. They likewise reflect the negative and positive qualities of two of the Supernals with the addition of a third factor, a resultant that acts as a reconciling principle. In passing, I should add that planetary attributions are given to these Sephiroth as expressing the type of their operation. Kether is Spirit, Chokmah refers to the Zodiac, and Binah is attributed to Saturn.

The fourth Sephirah is Chesed, meaning “Grace or Mercy”; also Gedulah is its other name, meaning “Greatness,” and to it is referred the astrological quality called Jupiter. Its concept is one of construction, expansion, and solidification.

Geburah is the fifth enumeration, Power or Might, and it is a symbol of creative power and force. Its planetary attribution is Mars, its quality being that destructive force which demolishes all forms and ideas when their term of usefulness and healthy life is done. It symbolizes not so much a fixed state of things, as an act, a further passage and transition of potentiality into actuality.

Six is the harmonizing and reconciling Sephirah, Tiphareth. The word itself means beauty and harmony. It is attributed to the sun, the lord and centre of our solar system. Just as Kether referred to the most secret depths of the Unconscious, the core of man’s life, so Tiphareth is its reflection, the ego, the ordinary human consciousness. This Sephirah completes the second triad, which is a triad of consciousness, as the first triad of the Supernal Light may be considered the triad of that which is supremely divine, the Superconscious.

Netzach, Victory, to which the planet Venus is referred, is the first Sephirah of the third and reflected triad, and marks an entirely different order of things. Here we enter the elemental sphere, where nature’s forces have their sway. It is also the region in the human sphere of what we may term the Unconscious. The magical tradition classifies this Unconsciousness into several strata, and to each of them is attributed some one of the four elements—fire, water, air, and earth. Netzach is attributed to the element of fire, and so far as concerns the classification of man’s principles, it represents his emotional life.

Its opposite pole on the Tree of Life, Hod, which means Splendour, receives the attribution of the planet Mercury. Its element is water, and its action represents fluidic mind, the thinking, logical capacity in man, as well as what may be called his magical or nervous force—what the Hindu systems denominate as prana.

The third of that triad is Yesod, the Foundation, the ninth Sephirah, the operation of the sphere of the moon. This is the airy sphere of the fourth dimension, termed in occultism the astral plane. Here we find the subtle electromagnetic substance into which all the higher forces are focused, the ether, and it constitutes the basis or final model upon which the physical world is built. Its elemental attribution is that of air, ever flowing, shifting, and in a constant flux—yet because of that flux, in perpetual stability. Just as the tremendous speed of the particles insures the stability of the atom, so the fleeting forms and motion of Yesod in all its implications constitute the permanence and surety of the physical world.

Pendant to these three triads is Malkuth, the Kingdom, referred to the element of earth, the synthesis or vehicle of the other elements and planets. Malkuth is the physical world, and in man represents his physical body and brain, the temple of the Holy Ghost—the actual tomb of the allegorical Christian Rosenkreutz.

These Sephiroth are not to be construed as ten different portions of objective space, each separated by millions and millions of miles—though of course they must have their correspondences in different parts of space. They are, rather, serial concepts, each condition or state or serial concept enclosing the other. Each Sephirah, be it spiritual, ethereal, or physical, has its own laws, conditions, and “times,” if one may borrow terminology from Dunne’s Experiment with Time. The distinction between them is one of quality and density of substance. The difference may well be one of dimension, besides representing different type-levels of consciousness, the “lower” worlds or Sephiroth being interpenetrated or held by the “higher.” Thus Kether, the Crown, is in Malkuth, as one axiom puts it, by virtue of the fact that its substance is of an infinitely rare, attenuated, and ethereal nature, while Malkuth, the physical universe, is enclosed within the all-pervading spirit which is Kether in precisely the same way that Dunne conceives Time No. 1, to be enclosed or contained, or moving as a field of experience, within Serial Time No. 2.

So far as concerns the Supernals, for these are the ideas which must principally interest us, the Qabalah teaches us that they comprise an abstract impersonal principle. That is, it is explained as an exalted condition of consciousness rather than of substance; an essence or spirit that is everywhere and at all times expressed in terms of light. In one sense, and from a comparative point of view, it may help our understanding if we imagine it to have certain similarities to what our leading analytical psychologists call the collective unconscious.

Though wholly impersonal in themselves and without characteristics that are readily understandable to the ordinary mind, the Supernals are, to all intents and purposes, what is commonly thought of as God. In the Tibetan Buddhist system, an analogous concept is Sunyata, the Void. And the realization of the Void through yoga processes and the technical meditations of the Sangha is, to quote Dr. Evans-Wentz's book The Tibetan Book of the Dead, to attain "the unconditioned Dharmakaya, or the Divine Body of Truth, the primordial state of uncreatedness, of the Supramundane Bodhic, All-consciousness—Buddhahood." In man, this light is represented by the very deepest levels of his unconscious—a mighty activity within his soul, which one magical system calls the higher and divine genius. Though the Golden Dawn rituals persistently use phraseology that implies the belief in a personal God, that usage to my mind is a poetic or dramatic convention. A number of its very fine invocations are addressed to a deity conceived of in a highly individualistic and personal manner, yet if the student bears in mind the several Qabalistic definitions, these rituals take on added and profound meaning from a purely psychological point of view. That is, they are seen to be technical methods of exalting the individual consciousness until it comes to a complete realization of its own divine root, and that universal pure essence of mind which ultimately it is.

It may be convenient for the reader if I tabulate the names of the Sephiroth with the grades employed in the Golden Dawn, together with a few important attributions:

1. Kether.	The Crown. Spirit.	Ipsissimus	10° = 1xhx
2. Chokmah.	Wisdom.	Magus	9° = 2xhx
3. Binah.	Understanding.	Magister Templi	8° = 3xhx
4. Chesed.	Mercy.	Adeptus Exemptus	7° = 4xhx
5. Geburah.	Might.	Adeptus Major	6° = 5xhx
6. Tiphareth.	Harmony.	Adeptus Minor	5° = 6xhx
7. Netzach.	Victory. Fire.	Philosophus	4° = 7xhx
8. Hod.	Splendour. Water.	Practicus	3° = 8xhx
9. Yesod.	Foundation. Air.	Theoricus	2° = 9xhx
10. Malkuth.	Kingdom. Earth.	Zelator	1° = 10xhx

In the consideration of the grades, I shall not discuss any others than those existing between Zelator and Adeptus Minor. My reason for doing so is that it is impossible for the ordinary individual to understand those above the grade of Adeptus Minor, and individuals who lay claim openly to such exalted grades, by that very act place a gigantic question mark against the validity of their attainment. He that is exalted is humble, and to have tasted that which is conveyed by the Adeptus Minor grade is so lofty an experience that few in their right minds, unless they were extremely saintlike in character, would consider themselves as having passed officially to a higher spiritual state.

Before proceeding to an analysis of the grades, and the ceremonies that were supposed to confer them, it has been thought advisable to consider the nature of initiation itself, which was the avowed function and purpose of the Order. What exactly is initiation? Those of us who have read some of the neo-occult and pseudo-Theosophical literature will also have heard the word initiation just too often to feel wholly at ease. Lesser initiations and greater initiations have been written of at some length. But the entire subject was surrounded with that vague air of mystery, that halo of sanctity and ambiguity whose only excuse can be ignorance on the part of the writers thereof. The degree of fantasy and attenuated sentimentality which has obtained expression from these sources, plus the real lack of knowledge as to the objects of these degrees and mysteries, act as a constant source of irritation. Particularly, when we remember that they were issued to satisfy people spiritually hungry and yearning with an indescribable hunger for but a few crumbs of the divine wisdom.

Learned dissertations have been published describing in great detail the folk customs of Australian aborigines and Polynesian and other primitive peoples. All the strange habits and unfamiliar rites of these tribes are paraded before our gaze—from their hour of birth, through the vicissitudes of their emotional life, to the moment of death and interment. We are asked to accept that these are initiations. The sole import attached to the word “initiation” in this connection is that of the formal acceptance of a boy at puberty, for example, into the communal life of his people.

Moreover, Jane E. Harrison, Sir J.G. Frazer, and a host of other excellent scholars have provided us with a wealth of anthropological data so far as the Greeks and Romans of another day are concerned. Some knowledge of their religious rites and observances is displayed. The daily habits of the people are carefully noted and recorded in many a tome.

They also describe, though more haltingly and with rather less confidence, the circumstances surrounding the ancient mystery cults. The symbolism of these mystery religions was, we see, in certain aspects uniform. All were dramas of redemption, plans of salvation, and ways of purgation. Degrees of initiation, baptism by water, a mystical meal for the privileged, dramatic plays depicting the life and death of some god or other—these are the familiar incidents of the cults described by our scholars.

But the obvious question arises, what spiritual value have such things for us? Do they help our own interior development so that we may solve our personal problems and handle more satisfactorily the rather difficult process of living today? And is this sort of thing what the adepts of old implied by initiation? And if this is all there is to it, why should so many moderns have been so curiously perturbed and excited by it all? Some other meaning must be latent herein; some other purpose to the rite must have been understood by their original observers whereby they were spiritually assisted and aided not only to deal adequately with life but to further the conquest and manifestation of their own latent spiritual nature.

For despite every record, and every learned attempt to penetrate into the significance of these rites, as to the exact procedure of the theurgic technique we still obtain no lasting satisfaction or understanding. There was undoubtedly a secret about these celebrations, both ethnic and early Christian, which no exoteric record has divulged or common sense, so-called, succeeded wholly to explain away. And the reason, no doubt, is this. Though the early writers felt no hesitancy in expounding certain principles of the philosophy of their mysteries, none felt it incumbent upon himself to record in black and white the practical details of the magical technique. Hence it is, in the absence of a description of the practical elements of these rites, that our scholars, anthropologists, and philosophers do not feel inclined to attach much significance to the ancient mysteries other than an ordinary religious or philosophic one. That is, it is their belief that ordinary notions of an advanced theological or philosophical nature were promulgated therein. For I may add in passing the complete esoteric technique of initiation has never previously passed into open publication. It has been reserved in all secrecy for initiates of the sacred schools of magic. While various documents explaining the principia of this wisdom were circulated amongst the members of these schools, the oaths of secrecy attaching to their receipt was such that in recent times, as I have said, few lay exponents of the ancient religions and philosophies have never so much as suspected the existence of these principia.

The root of the word itself means “to begin” or “to commence anew.” Initiation is thus the beginning of a new phase or attitude to life, the entry, moreover, into an entirely new type of existence. Its characteristic is the opening of the mind to an awareness of other levels of consciousness, both within and without. Initiation means above all spiritual growth—a definite mark in the span of human life.

Now one of the best methods for bringing about this stimulus of the inner life, so that one does really begin or enter upon an entirely new existence characterized by an awareness of higher principles within, is the ceremonial technique. By this we mean that a ceremony is arranged in which certain ideas, teachings, and admonitions are communicated to the candidate in dramatic form in a formally prepared temple or lodge room. Nor is this all—otherwise, no claim could be made on behalf of magic that it really and not merely figuratively initiates. For the utterance of an injunction does not necessarily imply that it can sink sufficiently deeply into consciousness so as to arouse into renewed activity the dormant spiritual qualities. And we have already witnessed the invalidity and spiritual bankruptcy of innumerable organizations, religious, secular, and fraternal so-called, which have their own rituals and yet, taking them by and large, have produced very few initiates or spiritually-minded men and women, saints or adepts of any outstanding merit.

The efficacy of an initiation ceremony depends almost exclusively on the initiator. What is it that bestows the power of successful initiation? This power comes from either having had it awakened interiorly at the hands of some other competent initiator, or that a very great deal of magical and meditation work has successfully been performed. It is hardly necessary at this juncture to labor at a description of these exercises and technical processes of development that were undertaken by candidates and would-be initiators. These have been delineated at length elsewhere, both in my Tree of Life, and in an incomparably fine form in the Golden Dawn documents presented herein. But it is necessary to emphasize the fact that an anterior personal training and prolonged magical effort are the sole means by which one is enabled so to awaken the dormant spiritual life of another that he may well and truly be called “initiated.”

Now we know from an examination of the above-mentioned documents and of ancient literature that the object of the theurgic art, as the magical concept of initiation was then termed, was so to purify the personality that that which was there imprisoned could spring into open manifestation. As one of the alchemical expositors has expressed it: “Within the material extreme of this life, when it is purified, the Seed of the Spirit is at last found.” The entire object of all magical and alchemical processes is the purification of the natural man, and by working upon his nature to extract the pure gold of spiritual attainment. This is initiation.

These Golden Dawn rituals and ceremonies of initiation are worthy of a great deal of study and attention. It is my sincere and fervent hope that meditation and a close examination will be made of the text. Now, if we examine these texts carefully, we shall find that we can epitomize in a single word the entire teaching and ideal of those rituals. If one idea more than any other is persistently stressed from the beginning that idea is in the word light. From the candidate’s first reception in the Hall of the Neophytes when the Hierophant adjures him with these words: “Child of Earth, long hast thou dwelt in darkness. Quit the night and seek the day,” to the transfiguration in the Vault ceremony, the whole system has as its objective the bringing down of the light. For it is by that light that the golden banner of the inner life may be exalted; it is in light where lies healing and the power of growth. Some vague intimation of the power and splendour of that glory is first given to the aspirant in the Neophyte Grade when, rising from his knees at the close of the invocation, the light is formulated above his head in the symbol of the white triangle by the union of the implements of the three chief officers. By means of the Adeptus Minor ritual, which identifies him with the chief officer, he is slain as though by the destructive force of his lower self. After being symbolically buried, triumphantly he rises from the tomb of Osiris in a glorious resurrection through the descent of the white light of the spirit. The intervening grades occupy themselves with the analysis of that light as it vibrates between the light and the darkness, and with the establishment within the candidate's personal sphere of the rays of the many-coloured rainbow of promise.

“Before all things,” commences a phrase in one ritual, “are the chaos, the darkness, and the gates of the land of night.” It is in this dark, chaotic night so blindly called life, a night in which we struggle, labor, and war incessantly for no reasonable end, that we ordinary human beings stumble and proceed about our various tasks. These gates of the far-flung empire of the night indeed refer eloquently to the material bondage that we ourselves have created—a bondage whereby we are tied to our circumstances, to our selves, to trial of every kind, bound to the very things we so despise and hate. It is not until we have clearly realized that we are enmeshed in darkness, an interior darkness, that we can commence to seek for that alchemical solvent that shall disperse the night, and call a halt to the continual projection outwards of the blackness that blinds our souls. As in the Buddhist scheme, where the first noble truth is sorrow, so not until we have been brought by experience to understand life as sorrow, can we hope for the cessation of its dread ravage. Only then does the prospect open of breaking the unconscious projection, the ending of which discloses the world and the whole of life in a totally different light. “One thing only, brother, do I proclaim,” said the Buddha, “now as before. Suffering and deliverance from suffering.”

These restricting circumstances and bonds are only the gates of the wilderness. The use of the word “gate” implies a means both of egress and ingress. By these gates we have entered, and by them also may we go out if so we choose, to enter the brilliance of the dawning sun, and perchance greet the rising of the spiritual splendour. For “after the formless, the void, and the darkness, then cometh the knowledge of the light.” As intimated above, one first must have realized that one’s soul is lost in darkness before a remedy can be sought to that irresponsible participation mystique, the unconscious projection outwards of interior confusion, and aspire to that divine land which is, metaphorically, the place of one’s birth. In that land is no darkness, no formlessness, no chaos. It is the place of the light itself—that light “which no wind can extinguish, which burns without wick or fuel.”

Being “brought to the light” then is a very apposite description of the function of initiation. It is the Great Work. There is no ambiguity in the conception of the rituals, for it appears throughout the entire work from Neophyte to Adeptus Minor and perhaps beyond. For the path is a journeying upwards on the ladder of existence to the crown of the Tree of Life, a journey where every effort made and every step taken brings one a little nearer to the true glory of the clear light. As we know, the experience of the rising of the light in both vision and waking state is common to mystics of every age and of every people. It must be an experience of the greatest significance in the treading of the path because its appearance seems always and everywhere an unconditional psychic thing. It is an experience that defies definition, as well in its elementary flashes as in its most advanced transports. No code of thought, philosophy, or religion and no logical process can bind it or limit it or express it. But always it represents, spiritually, a marked attainment, a liberation from the turmoil of life and from psychic complications, and, as Dr. C.G. Jung has expressed the matter, it “thereby frees the inner personality from emotional and imaginary entanglements, creating thus a unity of being which is universally felt as a release.” It is the attainment of spiritual puberty, marking a significant stage in growth.

Symptomatic of this stage of interior growth is the utter transformation that comes over what previously appeared to be “the chaos, the darkness, and the gates of the land of night.” While man is assumed into godhead, and the divine spirit is brought down into manhood, a new heaven and a new earth make their appearance, and familiar objects take on a divine radiance as though illumined by an internal spiritual light. And this is what, in part at any rate, was meant by the old alchemists, for the finding of the Philosopher's Stone converts all base metals into the purest gold. In his book Centuries of Meditation, Thomas Traherne gives an interesting description of the rapture of the inner personality, its reaction to the world, when it is freed by the mystical experience from all entanglements. He says: "The corn was orient and immortal wheat, which never should be reaped, nor was ever sown. I thought it had stood from everlasting to everlasting. The dust and the stones of the street were as precious as gold; the gates were at first the end of the world. The green trees when I saw them first through one of the gates, transported and ravished me, their sweetness and unusual beauty made my heart to leap, and almost mad with ecstasy, they were such strange and wonderful things. The men! O what venerable and reverent creatures did the aged seem! Immortal Cherubim! And the young men glittering and sparkling angels, and maids, strange seraphic pieces of life and beauty. Boys and girls tumbling in the street, and playing, were moving jewels ... I knew not that they were born or should die. But all things abided eternally as they were in their proper places. Eternity was manifest in the Light of the Day, and something infinite behind everything appeared ..."

And to illustrate the magical attitude towards life and the world when initiation has produced its true result, there is another exalted panegyric by Traherne, which I cannot desist from quoting. For let me add that magic does not countenance a retreat from life, an escape from the turmoils of practical life. It seeks only to transmute what formerly was dross into gold. Initiation has as its object the commencement of a new life, to transform the base and low into the pure and unutterably splendid. "All appeared new and strange at first, inexpressibly rare and delightful and beautiful. I was a little stranger which at my entrance into the world was saluted and surrounded with innumerable joys. My knowledge was Divine; I knew by intuition those things which since my Apostacy I collected again by the highest reason. My very ignorance was advantageous. I seemed as one brought into the state of innocence. All things were spotless and pure and glorious; yea, and infinitely mine and joyful and precious. I knew not that there were any sins, or complaints or laws. I dreamed not of poverties, contentions, or vices. All tears and quarrels were hidden from my eyes. Everything was at rest, free and immortal. I knew nothing of sickness or death or exaction. In the absence of these I was entertained like an angel with the works of God in their splendour and glory; I saw all in the peace of Eden ... All Time was Eternity, and a perpetual Sabbath ...”

Such is the stone of the Philosophers, the Quintessence, the Summum Bonum, true wisdom, and perfect happiness.

Psellus, the Neoplatonist, has written that the function of initiatory magic was “to initiate or perfect the human soul by the powers of materials here on earth; for the supreme faculty of the soul cannot by its own guidance aspire to the sublimest intuition and to the comprehension of Divinity.” It is a commonplace aphorism in occultism that “Nature unaided fails.” That is to say that the natural life, if left to itself, and isolated from the impact of a higher type of life or consciousness, can only produce a commonplace thing of the natural life. It reminds us of the sentiment of the alchemists who expressed contempt of their first matter as it existed in its natural or impure state, in the condition where it normally is found. But this first matter, cleansed and purified by the psycho-chemical art of alchemy, that is to say by initiation—is that which is transformed into the most precious thing in the whole world. But until cleansed and purified, it is of little or no value. Nature, however, aided where she had left off by wise and devout men, may surpass herself. And this is why Psellus claims that the soul of itself and by itself is not able to attain to divinity unless and until it is guided by initiates and thus enfolded into another life.

It is to effect this integration, to bring about this initiation, this exaltation of the consciousness above its natural state to the light divine, that the magical system of the Golden Dawn, or of any other legitimate initiating system, owes its existence. The function of every phase of its work, the avowed intention of its principal rituals, and the explicit statement of its teaching, is to assist the candidate by his own aspirations to find that unity of being which is the inner self, the pure essence of mind, the Buddha-nature. Not only does the system imply this by its ritualistic movements and axiomata, but there are clear and unmistakable passages where these ideas are given unequivocal expression. Thus, we find it written that the entire object of initiation and mystical teaching is “by the intervention of the symbol, ceremonial and sacrament, so to lead the soul that it may be withdrawn from the attraction of matter and delivered from the absorption therein, whereby it walks in somnambulism, knowing not whence it cometh nor whither it goeth.” And moreover, in the same ritual, celebrated at the autumnal and vernal equinoxes, the Chief Adept officiating recites an invocation beseeching guidance for the newly installed Hierophant. It is asked “that he may well and worthily direct those who have been called from the tribulation of the darkness into the light of this little kingdom of Thy love. And vouchsafe also, that going forward in love for Thee, through him and with him, they may pass from the desire of Thy house into the light of Thy presence.” This is succeeded by sentences read by the Second and Third Adepts: “The desire of Thy house hath eaten me up,” and “I desire to be dissolved and to be with Thee.”

And finally, that not the least vestige of misunderstanding or misconception may remain as to the objects of this divine theurgy, let me reproduce one last quotation from this same ritual. Referring to the Supernals and the temple that in old time was built on high, the speech adds: “The holy place was made waste and the sons of the house of wisdom were taken away into the captivity of the senses. We have worshiped since then in a house made with hands, receiving a sacramental ministration by a derived light in place of the cohabiting glory. And yet, amidst signs and symbols the tokens of the higher presence have never been wanting in our hearts. By the waters of Babylon we have sat down and wept, but we have ever remembered Zion; and that memorial is a witness testifying that we shall yet return with exultation into the house of our Father.”

Thus and unmistakably is the true object of the Great Work set before us, and we shall do well ever to keep eye and aspiration firmly fixed thereto. For while the road to the spiritual Zion demands great exertion, and because it is a way that at times proceeds by devious routes, there is great temptation to linger by the roadside, to stroll down pleasant side-lanes, or to play absentmindedly with toys or staves cut but to assist our forward march. But if we forget not to what noble city the winding path leads us, little danger can overtake any who pursue it steadfast to the end. It is only when the abiding city is forgotten that the road becomes hard, and the way beset by unseen danger and difficulty.

Prior to attempting to describe a few of the salient points of the rituals—briefly, for since they appear within these volumes, they must be individually studied and experienced so that an individual point of view may be acquired—it may be advisable to devote a few explanatory words to the art of ceremonial initiation itself.

A useful and significant preface may be taken from Dr. Jung’s commentary to Wilhelm’s translation of The Secret of the Golden Flower, where there is much that explains the ritualistic functions of magic. “Magical practices are,” he declares, “the projections of psychic events which, in cases like these, exert a counter influence on the soul, and act like a kind of enchantment of one’s own personality. That is to say, by means of these concrete performances, the attention or better said the interest, is brought back to an inner sacred domain which is the source and goal of the soul. This inner domain contains the unity of life and consciousness which, though once possessed, has been lost and must now be found again.”

From one point of view, the officers employed in these rituals represent just such psychic projections. They represent, even as figures in dreams do, different aspects of man himself—personifications of abstract psychological principles inhering within the human spirit. Through the admittedly artificial or conventional means of a dramatic projection of these personified principles in a well-ordered ceremony a reaction is induced in consciousness. This reaction is calculated to arouse from their dormant condition those hitherto latent faculties represented objectively in the temple of initiation by the officers. Without the least conscious effort on the part of the aspirant, an involuntary current of sympathy is produced by this external delineation of spiritual parts, which may be sufficient to accomplish the purpose of the initiation ceremony. The aesthetic appeal to the imagination—quite apart from what could be called the intrinsic magical virtue with which the G.D. documents Z.1. and Z.3. deal at some length—stirs to renewed activity the life of the inner domain. And the entire action of this type of dramatic ritual is that the soul may discover itself exalted to the heights, and during that mystical elevation receive the rushing forth of the light.

Applying these ideas, then, to the Neophyte or $0 = 0$ —so called because it is not attributed to any of the enumerations or Sephiroth on the Tree of Life since it is a preliminary or probationary grade—we find that the Kerux is an officer who personifies the reasoning faculties. He represents that intelligent active part of the mind that functions ever in obedience to the will—the Qabalistic ruach, in a word. The higher part of that mind, the aspiring, sensitive, and the intuitive consciousness is represented by the Hegemon, who seeks the rising of the light. And the Hierophant, in this initial ceremony of the Neophyte, acts on behalf of the higher spiritual soul of man himself, that divine self of which too rarely, if ever at all, we become aware. “The essence of mind is intrinsically pure,” is a definition of the Bodhisattva Sila

Sutra, and it is this essential state of enlightenment, this interior self, Osiris glorified through trial and perfected by suffering, which is represented by the Hierophant on the dais. He is seated in the place of the rising sun, on the throne of the east, and with but two or three exceptions never moves from that station in the temple. As the Qabalah teaches, the everlasting abode of the higher self is in the Eden of Paradise, the Supernal sanctuary that is ever guarded from chaos by the flaming sword of the Kerubim whirling every way on the borders of the abyss. From that aloof spiritual stronghold it gazes down upon its vehicle, the lower man, evolved for the purpose of providing it with experience—involved in neither its struggles or tribulations, yet, from another point of view, suffering acutely thereby. And seldom does that genius leave its palace of the stars except when, voluntarily, the lower self opens itself to the higher by an act of sincerest aspiration of self-sacrifice, which alone makes possible the descent of the light within our hearts and minds. Thus when the Hierophant leaves the throne of the east, he represents that higher self in action, and as Osiris marks the active descent of the supernal splendour. For he says, as he leaves the dais with wand uplifted: “I come in the power of the light. I come in the light of wisdom. I come in the mercy of the light. The light hath healing in its wings.” And having brought the light to the aspirant, he returns to his throne, as though that divine genius of whom he is the symbol awaited the deliberate willing return of the aspirant himself to the everlasting abode of the light.

Even in the communication of the usual claptrap of secret societies, the signs and grips, all these are explained solely in terms of the quest for the light. Also the various groupings of officers and their movements in the temple are not without profound meaning. These should be sought out, since they constantly reiterate the implicit purpose of the rite. Thus, at the altar, the three principal officers form about the candidate a triad, representing in symbolic formation again the supernal clear light of the void, and this also is represented by the number of the circumambulations about the confines of the temple. The white cord bound thrice about the waist has reference to the same set of ideas. Even upon the altar of the temple are symbols indicating the rise of light. A red Calvary Cross of six squares as symbolic of harmony and equilibrium is placed above a white triangle—the emblem of the Golden Dawn. They form the symbol of the supernal Sephiroth, which are the dynamic life and root of all things, while in man they constitute that triad of spiritual faculties which is the intrinsically pure essence of mind. Hence the triangle is a fitting emblem of the light. And the place of the cross above the triangle suggests not the domination of the sacred spirit, but its equilibration and harmony in the heart of man. Despite the fact that the whole of this intricate symbolism can hardly be realized by the candidate at the time of his initiation, its intrinsic value is such that unconsciously as an organized body of suggestion it is perceived and noted and strikes the focal centre.

We are taught by tradition that the entire object of the sacred rites was the purification of the soul so that its power could gradually dissolve the impediments of, and percolate through, the heavy body and opaque brain. “Know,” says Synesius, “that the quintessence and hidden thing of our stone is nothing else than our viscous celestial and glorious soul drawn out of its minera by our magistry.” Hence the entire trend of the preliminary Neophyte grade of the Golden Dawn is towards the purification of the personality. It fulfills the testimony of the Hermetic art so that the light within could be fermented and perfected by the ceremonial method of initiation. Purification and consecration—this is the insistent and uncompromising theme caught by the candidate’s ear. “Unpurified and unconsecrated thou canst not enter our sacred hall!” Fire and water assist in these several consecrations until, eventually, the candidate is placed in the position of balanced power, between the two pillars, where the first link is effected with his higher and divine genius.

The Neophyte ritual really stands by itself. It is an introductory ceremony shadowing forth all the major formulae and techniques. With the Adeptus Minor ritual it is concerned almost entirely with the light itself. The five grades that are placed between them have as their object the awakening of the elemental bases of what must develop into the instrument of the higher. Awakened and purified, they may be consecrated to the Great Work, in order that they may become worthy vehicles for the indwelling of the light. First, however, it is necessary that they be awakened. For, psychological truism that it is, until their presence is realized their transmutation cannot be accomplished. In symbolic form and pageantry, the ceremony of each grade calls forth the spirits of a particular element. And as a steel placed in close proximity to a magnet receives some degree of its magnetism, and comparable to the electrical phenomenon of induction, so the presence of power induces power. Contact with the appropriate type of elemental force produces an identical type of reaction within the sphere of the Neophyte, and it is thus that growth and advancement proceeds. The speeches of the officers deal almost exclusively with the knowledge pertaining to that element and grade, and excerpts from fragmentary remains of the ancient mysteries and from certain of the books of the Qabalah do much towards producing an impressive atmosphere.

The element offered for the work of transmutation in the grade of Zelator is the earthy part of the candidate. The ritual symbolically admits him to the first rung of that mighty ladder whose heights are obscured in the light above. This first rung is the lowest sphere of the conventional Tree of Life, Malkuth, the Sanctum Regnum. To it are ascribed the first grade of Zelator, and the element of earth. Herein, after the earth elementals are invoked, the candidate is ceremonially brought to three stations, the first two being those of evil and the presence divine. At each of these stations the Guardians reject him at the point of the sword, urging him in his unprepared state to return. His third attempt to go forward places him in a balanced position, the path of equilibrium, the Middle Way, where he is received. And a way is cleared for him by the Hierophant, who again represents the celestial soul of things. During his journey along that path, the stability of earth is established within him, that eventually it may prove an enduring temple of the Holy Spirit.

Some have criticized these elemental grades a little harshly and severely; others have rejected them entirely. In a letter sent to me from a former Praemonstrator of one G.D. temple, these rituals too were condemned in that they were said to be simply a parade, redundant and verbose, of the occult knowledge that one of the Chiefs possessed at that time. In one sense, of course, what those critics claim is perfectly true. The principal formulae and teaching are concealed in the preliminary Neophyte grade and that of Adeptus Minor. It is the development of the ideas in these ceremonies that constitutes the Great Work—the disclosure of the essence of mind, the invocation of the higher genius. These, however, are the high ends and the final goals of the mystic term. Notwithstanding his limitations these are ultimates to which every man must work. Meanwhile, in order to render that attainment possible in its fullest sense, several important matters require attention. The personality must be harmonized. Every element therein demands equilibration in order that illumination ensuing from the magical work may not produce fanaticism and pathology instead of adeptship and integrity. Balance is required for the accomplishment of the Great Work. “Equilibrium is the basis of the soul.” Therefore, the four grades of earth, air, water, and fire plant the seeds of the microcosmic pentagram, and above them is placed, in the Portal ceremony, the crown of the spirit, the quintessence, added so that the elemental vehemence may be tempered, to the end that all may work together in balanced disposition. These grades are therefore an important and integral part of the work, despite shortsighted hostile criticism. To compare them, however, with those that precede and follow, is symptomatic of an intellectual confusion of function. It is rather as if one said that milk is more virtuous than Friday—which, naturally, is absurd. Yet similar comparisons in magical matters are constantly being made without exciting ridicule. It is obvious that different categories may not be so compared. The purpose of the Neophyte ritual is quite distinct from that of Zelator, and it is mistaken policy to compare them. What rightly could be asked is whether the Zelator and the other elemental grades accomplish what they purport to do. That is another matter. The consensus of experienced opinion is on the whole that they do, and I am content for the time being to accept that authority.

The candidate by these grades is duly prepared, so it is argued, to enter the immeasurable region, to begin to analyze and comprehend the nature of the light which has been vouchsafed him. The first three elemental grades could be taken just as quickly as the candidate, at the discretion of the Chiefs, desired. There were no requirements other than to indicate by examination that the appropriate meditations had been performed and certain items of Qabalistic knowledge necessary to the magical routine committed to memory.

Before proceeding further in the analysis of the grades, there is one rather fine prose passage in the Zelator grade that must be given here—a passage of beauty, high eloquence, and lofty significance. “And Tetragrammaton placed Kerubim at the east of the garden of Eden and a flaming sword which turned every way to keep the path of the Tree of Life, for He has created nature that man being cast out of Eden may not fall into the void. He has bound man with the stars as with a chain. He allures him with scattered fragments of the divine body in bird and beast and flower. And He laments over him in the wind and in the sea and in the birds. And when the times are ended, He will call the Kerubim from the east of the garden, and all shall be consumed and become infinite and holy.”

It would be a happy task, were it advisable, to devote several pages of this introduction to praising the excellence of what are called the four elemental prayers. Each one of the elemental initiation ceremonies closes with a long prayer of invocation which issues, as it were, from the heart of the elements themselves. These must be silently read, continuously meditated upon, and frequently heard fully to be appreciated, when the reader will find his own personal reactions crystallizing. Recited by the Hierophant at the end of the ceremony, these prayers voice the inherent aspiration of the elements towards the goal they are striving in their own way to reach, for here they are conceived as blind dumb forces both within and without the personal sphere of man. They are given assistance by the human beings who, having invoked them and used their power, strive to repay in some way the debt owed to these other struggling lives.

The grade after the earth ceremony is that of Theoricus. It is referred to the Ninth Sephirah on the Tree of Life, Yesod, the Foundation, and to it are attributed the sphere of the operation of Luna and the element air. Here the candidate is conducted to the stations of the four Kerubim, the angelic choir of Yesod. The Kerubim are defined in that ritual as the presidents of the elemental forces, the vivified powers of the letters of Tetragrammaton operating in the elements. Over each of these rules one of the four letters of the mirific word and the Kerubim. It is always through the power and authority and symbol of the Kerub that the elemental spirits and their rulers are invoked. In this ritual, as in all the others, important practical formulae of ceremonial magic are concealed.

At this juncture of the ceremony, with the airy elements vibrating about him and through him, the Zelator is urged to be “prompt and active as the sylphs, but avoid frivolity and caprice. Be energetic and strong as the salamanders but avoid irritability and ferocity. Be flexible and attentive to images, like the undines, but avoid idleness and changeability. Be laborious and patient like the gnomes, but avoid grossness and avarice. So shalt thou gradually develop the powers of thy soul and fit thyself to command the spirits of the elements.”

In each of the grades, several drawings and diagrams are exhibited, each one conveying useful knowledge and information required in the upward quest. The tarot keys are also dealt with, as indicating pictorially the stages of that journey, and depicting the story of the soul. It may not be possible because of the exigencies of space to reproduce in these volumes a pack of tarot cards based upon esoteric descriptions—though I should very much liked to have done so. But by using the Waite and the available French and Italian packs, and by comparing them with the accounts given in the rituals, the imagination of the reader will render this omission unimportant.

The third grade is that of Practicus referred to the Sephirah Hod, the Splendour, the lowest of the Sephiroth on the left hand side of the Tree, the pillar of Severity. Its attributions refer to the sphere of the operation of Mercury, but more especially to the element of water, which in this ceremony is invoked to power and presence. As I have previously remarked, and it bears constant reiteration, the Tree of Life and the Qabalistic scheme as a whole should be carefully studied so that the aptness of the attributions both to the Sephiroth and the Paths may be fully appreciated. Two Paths lead to the sphere of Splendour—the Path of Fire from Malkuth and the Path of the reflection of the sphere of the Sun from Yesod. Water is germinative and maternal, whilst fire is paternal and fructifying. It is from their interior stimulation and union, the alchemical trituration, that the higher life is born, even as has been said, “Except ye be baptized with water and the Spirit ye cannot enter the Kingdom of heaven.”

Therefore in this grade, the candidate is led to the sphere of stagnant water, which by the presence of solar and fiery elements is vitalized and rendered a perfect creative base. Most of the speeches in this ritual are depicted as issuing from the Samothracian Kabiri, the deluge gods, though the main body of the ritual consists of the sonorous and resonant versicles of the Chaldaean Oracles, the translation, I believe, of Dr. Westcott, with a few modifications authorized by Mathers.

Briefly, the entire symbolism of the Practicus grade is summarized by the position on the altar of the principal Golden Dawn emblems so arranged that

“the cross above the Triangle represents the power of the spirit rising above the triangle of the waters.” That also indicates the immediate task of the candidate. At this juncture, too, the diagrams displayed begin to take on especial significance, and though their theme apparently is biblical in nature, accompanied by explanations in a curious phraseology consonant therewith, they are nevertheless highly suggestive, as containing the elements of a profound psychology. After this grade follows an automatic wait of three months, referred to as the regimen of the elements, a period as it were of silent incubation, during which time the rituals were given to the candidate that he may make copies for his own private use and study.

The fourth grade of Philosophus carries the candidate one step further. The Sephirah involved is Netzach, Victory, to which is referred the operation of the planet Venus and the element of fire, while the paths that connect to the lower rungs of the ladder are principally of a watery nature. Thus the elements encountered are of an identical nature with those of the preceding grade, but their order and power is quite reversed. Previously the water was predominant. Now the fire rages and whirls in lurid storm, with water only as the complementary element whereon it may manifest, and in order that due equilibrium may be maintained, as it is written: “The Ruach Elohim moved upon the face of the waters.” These two are the primary terrestrial elements which, intelligently controlled and creatively employed, may lead eventually to the restoration of the Golden Age. By their transmutation a new paradise may be recreated from the darkness and chaos into which formerly it had fallen. For the light may not legitimately be called forth upon man, nor dwell within him, until chaos has been turned into equilibrium of complete realization and enlightenment. Not until order has been restored to the lower elements of his earthy kingdom, neither peace nor inner security may be his rightful lot.

The symbols depicted while traversing the Path of Peh, which joins the spheres of fire and water, indicate the results as it were of the first stages of the Path, for the tarot card shown demonstrates the destruction of a tower by lightning. The three holes blasted in the walls symbolize the supernal Triad, the establishment of the divine through and following the destruction of the outer self. Though fire and water, warmth and moisture, are essentially creative, their stimulation within the being of the Neophyte draws his attention, perhaps for the first time, to the chaotic condition of his natural existence, and the complete psychic muddle into which his ignorance and spiritual impotence have stranded him. Evocative of the highest within his soul, these elements equally call forth that which is base and low. The result of the first step is analytical, an unbalancing, the leveling down of all that man formerly held true and holy—the chaos, the darkness, and the gates of the land of night. An unhappy state, but a very necessary one if progress is to be made and if the preliminary chaos is to be transcended. From these ruins may be erected the new temple of light, for it is always from the rubbish heap that are selected the materials for the manifestation of godhead. These symbols have a dual reference. Not only do they refer to the epochs of creative evolution whose memory has long since faded even from the visible memory of nature, but also to the recapitulations of these periods within personal progress on the Path. “The Aspirant on the threshold of Initiation,” observes Crowley very aptly, “finds himself assailed by the ‘complexes’ which have corrupted him, their externalization excruciating him, and his agonized reluctance to their elimination plunging him into such ordeals that he seems (both to himself and to others) to have turned from a noble and upright man into an unutterable scoundrel.” These are the experiences and events that occur to every aspirant when initiation forces the realization upon him that “all is sorrow.” In fact, it is my belief that the criterion or hallmark of successful initiation is the occurrence of these or similar experiences. The whole universe, under the stimulation of the magical elements and inward analysis, seems to tumble like a pack of cards crazily about one’s feet. This is the solve half of the alchemical solve et coagula formula.

Analysis must precede synthesis. Corruption is the primitive base from which the pure gold of the spirit is drawn. Moreover the alchemical treatises are eloquent in their description of the poisonous nature of this condition, which, though extremely unpleasant, is a highly necessary one, and success in its production is at least one symptom of good working. It is held that the highest results may not be obtained until this particular type of change has occurred. So far as the nature of the environment and the creative power of the personal self permits, the task implied by the coagula formula is to assemble them and remould them nearer to the heart's desire. And here again, the alchemists are adamant in their insistence upon the aphorism that "Nature unaided fails." For the alchemist, so the tradition asserts, commences his work where nature has left off. And were this solve phenomenon to occur spontaneously in the course of nature, the result and the outcome—the coagulation of previously dissolved elements—would not be very dissimilar to that which previously existed. But with the technique of initiation, the chaos is lifted up and fermented so to speak, that from it, with the aid of the invoked white light of the divine spirit, a higher species of being, illumined and enlightened, may develop.

In two altar diagrams—one called the Garden of Eden, shown in the Practicus grade, and the other called The Fall shown in the Philosophus grade—all these ideas are expanded and synthesized. They should be carefully studied and receive long meditation, for in them are many clues to the spiritual and psychological problems which beset the traveler on the Path, and they resume the entire philosophy of magic. Many hints, moreover, which may be found useful as assisting meditation are contained in The 'Curse' from a Philosophical Point of View in the second volume of Blavatsky's Secret Doctrine in connection with the Prometheus myth and the awakening of Manas, mind.

Since both of these diagrams may be found reproduced in the color insert (see color insert page 1 and 2) very little by way of prolonged explanation need here be said. The first depicts a personified representation of the three fundamental principles in man. Each of these is apparently separate, functioning independently on its own plane without cooperation with, because apparently unaware of, either the higher or the lower. Principally, it represents man in the now departed morning of the race, in the primal rounds of evolutionary effort when self-consciousness had not yet been won by self-induced and self-devised efforts, and when peace and harmony prevailed both within and without by right of heritage rather than through personal labor. The diagram appears in the water grade of Practicus, since water is a fitting representation of this placid peace. At the summit of the diagram stands the Apocalyptic woman clothed with the sun of glory, crowned with the twelve stars, and the moon lying at her feet. Her symbolism pertains to the supernal essence of mind, representing thus the type and symbol of the glittering Augoeides, the neschamah.

Speaking of an analogous psychological conception in his commentary to The Secret of the Golden Flower, Dr. C.G. Jung remarks that this figure represents “a line or principle of life that strives after superhuman, shining heights.” At the base of the tree stands Eve, the nephesch or unconscious who, in opposition to this divine genius, stands for the dark, “earthborn, feminine principle with its emotionality and instinctiveness reaching far back into the depths of time, and into the roots of physiological continuity.” Between the two stands Adam, supported by the fundamental strength of Eve, the ruach or ego not yet awakened to a realization of its innate power and possibility. From the larger point of view, he represents the race as a whole and “is the personified symbol of the collective Logos, the ‘Host,’ and of the Lords of Wisdom or the Heavenly Man, who incarnated in humanity.” Otherwise he represents the individual candidate on the Path, prior to the awakening of the “sleeping dogs” within his being, to use Blavatsky’s apt expression.

Beneath these three figures sleeps a coiled dragon, silent, unawakened. None, it would seem, is aware of that latent power, titanic and Promethean, coiled beneath—the active magical power centered in man, his libido, neutral, of vast potentialities but neither good nor evil in itself.

Very similar in some respects is the diagram revealed in the Philosophus grade. As the divine peace of the Garden of Eden was manifested during the water grade, so in this grade of Philosophus, the power of fire is shown to have called forth catastrophe. Formerly coiled beneath the tree, the hydra-headed dragon in this diagram has usurped its proper place. Its several horned heads wind their way up into the very structure of the Tree of Life, even unto Daath at the foot of the supernals. Lured downwards by the tree of knowledge—and remembering in what sense the Bible speaks of the verb “to know,” we gather that the root of the trouble was an imperfect apprehension of creative power—towards the “darkly splendid world wherein continually lieth a faithless depth,” Eve, the lower self, ceases to give support to Adam. She has yielded to the awful fascination of the awakening psyche. Far easier is it to fall than to climb to the distant heights. Yet only from one viewpoint is the Fall catastrophic. The awareness of the rise of the dragon endows man also with consciousness of power—and power is life and progress. The dragon stands as the symbol of the great enemy to be overcome, and, as the task of equilibration proceeds, the great prize awaiting success.

The Fall as a state of consciousness is analogous to that condition described by various mystics as the Dark Night of the Soul. It is accompanied by a sense of intolerable dryness, a dreaded awareness of the fact that all the powers of the soul seem dead, and the mind’s vision closed in dumb protest, as it were, against the harsh discipline of the work itself. A thousand and one seductions will tend to lure the candidate from the contemplation of the magical goal, and there will be presented to him a thousand and one means of breaking in spirit his vow to “persevere in the divine science” without breaking it in letter. And it will appear that the mind itself will run riot and become unstable, warning the candidate that it were better for him to enjoy a lull in his magical operations. This state is allegorically referred to by the alchemists in their descriptions of the poisonous dragon that follows upon the corruption of their First Matter. Vaughan calls it “a horrible devouring Dragon—creeping and weltering in the bottom of her cave, without wings. Touch her not by any means, not so much as with thy hands, for there is not upon earth such a violent, transcendent poison.” But as the mystics teach, if this condition be patiently endured, it passes, a higher spiritual consciousness gradually dawning in the heart and mind. So also in the alchemical writings, we find that Vaughan observes: “As thou hast begun so proceed, and this Dragon will turn to a Swan, but more white than the hovering virgin snow when it is not yet sullied with the earth.”

The Qabalistic Sephirah of Daath is the conjunction of Chokmah and Binah on the Tree of Life, the child of Wisdom and Understanding—knowledge. It refers to the symbolic sphere formed within or above the ruach by means of experience obtained, and this assimilated becomes transmuted into intuition and faculty of mind. But fundamentally it is the ascent of the dragon or, if you wish, an upwelling of the Unconscious archetypes—a highly dangerous and unbalancing ascent, until they are assimilated to consciousness—which first renders Daath a possibility. It is the Fall that is responsible for the acquisition of self-knowledge. “Thus it stands proven,” claims Blavatsky, “that Satan, or the red Fiery Dragon, the ‘Lord of Phosphorus’ and Lucifer, or ‘Light-bearer,’ is in us; it is our Mind—our tempter and Redeemer, our intelligent liberator and saviour from pure animalism.”

In the evolutionary scheme, the Fall occurs through a higher type of intelligence coming into close contact with nascent humanity, thus stimulating the psyche of the race—or so the magical tradition has it. The recapitulation of this process within the individual sphere of consciousness proceeds through the technique of initiation whereby the Red Dragon is stirred into activity through contact with the fructifying powers of the elements, invoked through the skill and power of a trained initiator. The use of the divine prerogative, brought about by the magic of everyday experience, the awakening of Daath, brings disaster at first because the awakened psyche is imperfectly understood and so abused for personal ends. But that very disaster and that abuse confers the consciousness of self, and is instrumental, at least in part, in breaking up the primitive participation mystique. Consequently, the realization of sorrow as it impinges on the ego, or at least the sense of personal mental and emotional discomfort, and an understanding of its causes, invariably constitute the first impetus to perform the Great Work, even as it comprises the motive first to seek the services and aid of the analytical psychologist. This impetus and this self-consciousness are the prime implications of Daath. Its signification is a higher type of consciousness, the beginning of a spiritual rebirth. It acts as a self-evolved link between the higher Genius, on the one hand, at peace in its supernal abode, and, on the other hand, the human soul bound by its Fall to the world of illusion and sense and matter. Not until that self-consciousness and acquired knowledge are turned to noble and altruistic ends, so long will sorrow and suffering be the inevitable result. Continually will the Red Dragon, the inverted power of the eros, ravish the little kingdom of self until such time as we open ourselves to the deepest levels of our unconsciousness, reconciling and uniting them with our conscious outlook, thus conquering the foe by driving it back to its proper realm. In such a way may we use, but neither ignore nor repress, the experience of life and its fruit to transcend our own personal limitations and attain to a participation mystique on a higher and self-conscious level.

Let me quote a few especially appropriate lines from Jung in connection with this Fall, when the fundamental basis of the ruach has been attracted to the kingdom of shells and when Malkuth has been disassociated from the other Sephiroth: "Consciousness thus torn from its roots and no longer able to appeal to the authority of the primordial images, possesses a Promethean freedom, it is true, but it also partakes of the nature of a godless hybris. It soars above the earth, even above mankind, but the danger of capsizing is there, not for every individual to be sure, but collectively for the weak members of such a society, who again Promethean-like, are bound by the unconscious to the Caucasus.”

For the adept to be cut off from his roots, from contact with the vitalizing and necessary basis of his Unconsciousness, will never do. He must unite and integrate the various levels of his entire Tree. His task must be to train and develop the titanic forces of his own underworld, so that they become as a powerful but docile beast whereon he may ride.

The Adeptus Minor grade continues the theme of these two diagrams. Escorted into the Vault, the aspirant is shown the lid of the tomb of Osiris, the Pastos, wherein is buried our father, Christian Rosenkreutz, and on that lid is a painting that brings fulfillment, as it were, to the narrative of the preceding diagrams. It is divided into two sections. The lower half of the painting depicts a figure of Adam, similar to his presentation in the Practicus grade diagram, though here the heads of the dragon are falling back from the Tree, showing the Justified One, the illuminated adept, by his immolation and self-sacrifice rescuing the fallen kingdom of his natural self from the clutches of an outraged eros. But above this, as though to show the true nature behind the deceptive appearance of things is illustrated a noble figure of majesty and divinity described in the ritual in these words. “And being turned I saw seven golden light-bearers, and in the midst of the light-bearers, one like unto the Ben Adam, clothed with a garment down to the feet, and girt with a golden girdle. His head and his hair were white as snow, and his eyes as flaming fire; his feet like unto fine brass as if they burned in a furnace. And his voice as the sound of many waters. And he had in his right hand seven stars and out of his mouth went the sword of flame, and his countenance was as the sun in his strength.”

It is to effect this redemption of the personality, to regenerate the power of the dragon, and attempt to bring the individual to some realization of his potential godhead, that is the object of the Adeptus Minor ceremony.

It is for this reason that I hold that the Golden Dawn magic, the technique of initiation, is of supreme and inestimable importance to mankind at large. In it the work of academic psychology may find a logical conclusion and fruition, so that it may develop further its own particular contribution to modern life and culture. For this psycho-magical technique of ceremonial initiation indicates the psychological solution of the anima problem. "Arise! Shine! For thy light is come!"

Between the grade of Philosophus and the Portal, an interval of seven months was prescribed, the regimen of the planets. During that period, devised to assist the gradual fructification of the seeds planted within, a review was advised of all the preceding studies. Such a review certainly was imperative. As one of the Chiefs of the Order expressed it: "Remember that there is hardly a circumstance in the rituals even of the First Order which has not its special meaning and application, and which does not conceal a potent magical formula. These ceremonies have brought thee into contact with certain forces which thou hast now to learn to awaken in thyself, and to this end, read, study, and re-read that which thou hast already received. Be not sure even after the lapse of much time that thou hast fully discovered all that is to be learned from these. And to be of use unto thee, this must be the work of thine own inner self, thine own and not the work of another for thee so that thou mayest gradually attain to the knowledge of the Divine Ones."

The grade of the Portal, which conferred upon the candidate the title of Lord of the Paths of the Portal of the Vault of the Adepts, is not referred to a Sephirah as such. It may, however, be considered as an outer court to Tiphareth, exactly as the Adeptus Minor ceremony may be considered Tiphareth within. Its technical attribution is the element of Akasa, spirit or ether, that is magically invoked by the usual procedure of invoking pentagrams and the vibration of divine names following upon the conjuration of the powers of the four subsidiary elements. To this grade, there is attached no elemental prayer as in the former grades, but there is one remarkable invocation employed which bears quoting here. In full temple, the English version is not used, but it is vibrated in the original Enochian or angelic tongue—a language which is at once sonorous, vibrant, and dramatically impressive. The following is the full version of which an abridged one was normally used in the temple: “I reign over you (here the Order version names the three Archangels of the element), saith the God of Justice, in power exalted above the firmament of wrath. In whose hands the sun is as a sword and the moon as a through-thrusting fire. Who measureth your garments in the midst of my vestures and trussed you together as the palms of my hands. Whose seat I garnished with the fire of gathering. Who beautified your garments with admiration. To whom I made a law to govern the holy ones, and delivered you a rod with the ark of knowledge. Moreover, ye lifted up your voices and swore obedience and faith to him that liveth and triumpheth. Whose beginning is not nor end cannot be. Who shineth as a flame in the midst of your palaces and reigneth amongst you as the balance of righteousness and truth. Move therefore and show yourselves. Open the mysteries of your creation. Be friendly unto me, for I am the servant of the same your God, a true worshiper of the Highest.”

This grade, referred to the veil Paroketh, which separates the First and Second Orders, is intermediate between the purely elemental grades and the spiritual grade of Adeptus Minor. A crown to the four lower elements, this rite formulates above earth, air, water, and fire, the uppermost point of the pentagram, revealing the administration of the light over and through the kingdom of the natural world. It concerns itself with the recapitulation of the former grades, coordinating and equilibrating the elemental self which, symbolically sacrificed upon the mystical altar, is offered to the service of the higher genius. In that grade, too, aspiration to the divine is strongly stressed as the faculty by which the veil of the inner sanctuary may be rent. It is the way to realization. The five Paths leading from the grades of the First to the Second Orders are symbolically traversed, and their symbols impressed within the sphere of sensation.

A gestation period of at least nine months had to elapse prior to initiation to the grade of Adeptus Minor, and since there can be no misunderstanding the purpose and nature of this beautiful ceremony it requires the minimum of comment from my pen. It explains itself completely in one of the speeches: "Buried with that light in a mystical death, rising again in a mystical resurrection, cleansed and purified through him our Master, O brother of the cross and the rose. Like him, O adepts of all ages, have ye toiled. Like him have ye suffered tribulation. Poverty, torture, and death have ye passed through; they have been but the purification of the gold. In the alembic of thine heart, through the athanor of affliction, seek thou the true stone of the wise."

The form of this ritual is beautiful in its simplicity and warrants a brief description. First of all, the candidate is led in, arrayed with insignia and badges and calling himself by his various titles and mottoes. But he is warned that not in any vainglorious spirit are the mysteries to be approached, but in simplicity alone. This is the signal for him to be divested of all his ornaments and insignia, and by the temple entrance, just prior to being bound upon a large upstanding cross of wood, he stands alone, clad in a simple unornamented black gown. The reader is earnestly recommended to study this ritual again and again, until almost it becomes a part of his very life, incorporated into the fabric of his being, for herein are highly important and significant formulae of mystical aspiration and of practical magic. In it is exemplified the technical "Dying God" formula about which in The Golden Bough Frazer has written so eloquently. Examples of this are to be found in every mythology and every mystical religion that our world has ever known. But I doubt that it has ever attained to a more clarified and definite expression than in this ceremony of the Adeptus Minor grade. For we are clearly taught by precept and by example that we are, in essence, gods of great power and spirituality who died to the land of our birth in the Garden of Hesperides, and mystically dying descended into hell. And moreover the ritual demonstrates that like Osiris, Christ, and Mithra, and many another type of god-man, we too may rise from the tomb and become aware of our true divine natures. The principal clause of the lengthy obligation assumed while bound to the cross, indicating the trend of its teaching, and the import of its objective, is: "I further solemnly promise and swear that, with the divine permission, I will from this day forward apply myself unto the Great Work, which is so to purify and exalt my spiritual nature that with divine aid I may at length attain to be more than human and thus gradually raise and unite myself to my higher and divine genius; and that in this event, I will not abuse the great power entrusted to me."

The preface to the assumption of the obligation is under these circumstances a tremendously impressive occurrence, and few could fail to be even faintly moved by it. It consists of an invocation of an Angelic power: "In the divine name I.A.O., I invoke thee thou great avenging angel HUA, that thou mayest invisibly place thy hand upon the head of this aspirant in attestation of his obligation ..."

It is not difficult to realize that this is a critical and important phase of the ceremony. During this obligation, because of the symbolism attached to it and because of the active aspiration that is induced at this juncture, illumination may quite easily occur. In one of the documents describing certain effects ensuing from this initiation, one of the Chiefs has written, that the object of the ceremony conceived as a whole "is especially intended to effect the change of the consciousness into the neschamah, and there are three places where this can take place. The first is when the aspirant is on the cross, because he is so exactly fulfilling the symbol of the abnegation of the lower self and the union with the higher."

The obligation assumed, the candidate is now removed from the cross, and the officers then narrate to him the principal facts in the history of the founder of the Order—Christian Rosenkreutz. On a previous page was given a summary of these historical facts. When the history lecture mentions the discovery of the vault wherein the tomb and body of the illustrious Father were discovered, one of the initiating adepts draws aside a curtain, admitting the candidate to a chamber erected in the midst of the temple similar to that described in the lecture. A few words roughly describing it may not be considered amiss. As a climax to the very simple temple furniture of the Outer grades, it comes as a psychological spasm and as a highly significant symbol. The vault itself is a small seven-sided chamber, each side representing one of the seven planets, with their host of magical correspondences. The medieval Rosicrucian manifesto the Fama Fraternitatis, translated in Arthur Edward Waite's Real History of the Rosicrucians, describes it at great length, though I shall here quote but briefly: "We opened the door, and there appeared to our sight a vault of seven sides and seven corners, every side five foot broad and the height of eight foot. Although the sun never shined in this vault, nevertheless it was enlightened with another sun, which had learned this from the sun, and was situated in the upper part of the centre of the ceiling. In the midst, instead of a tombstone, was a round altar ... Now, as we had not yet seen the dead body of our careful and wise Father, we therefore removed the altar aside; then we lifted up a strong plate of brass, and found a fair and worthy body, whole and unconsumed. ..."

Around this fundamental symbolism, the Golden Dawn adepts, displaying a genius of extraordinary insight and synthesis, had built a most awe-inspiring superstructure. The usual Order symbolism of the light was represented by a white triangle centered by the rose—this placed upon the ceiling. The floor design was so painted as to represent the Red Dragon and the forces of the primitive archetypes upon which the candidate trod as emblematic of his conquest. Placed in the centre of the Vault was the Pastos of Rosenkreutz—though the Pastos is also referred to as the tomb of Osiris the Justified One. Both of these beings may be considered as the type and symbol of the higher and divine genius. Immediately above this coffin rested the circular altar mentioned in the Fama. It bore paintings of the Kerubic emblems, and upon these were placed the four elemental weapons and a cross, the symbol of resurrection. At one point in the ceremony, the acting Hierophant, or Chief Adept as he is now called, is interred in the Pastos as though to represent the aspirant's higher self which is hidden and confined within the personality, itself wandering blindly, lost in the dark wilderness. The whole concatenation of symbols is an elaborate and dramatic portrayal of the central theme of the Great Work. In a word, it depicts the spiritual rebirth or redemption of the candidate, his resurrection from the dark tomb of mortality through the power of the Holy Spirit.

In the symbol of the Vault, the psychologist no doubt will see a highly interesting and complex array of mother symbols, traces of which, used in very much the same way, may be found in the literary fragments we inherit from the mystery cults of antiquity. It would be possible, and quite legitimate, so to interpret the Vault. For even the Order interpretation refers the Vault in its entirety to the Isis of nature, the great and powerful mother of mankind and all that is. And an analysis of the separate parts of the Vault—the Venus door, the Pastos, the two pillars—would subscribe to that view. For regeneration and the second birth have always as creative psychological states been associated with the mother. And it may be recalled that the neschamah or that principle in man that constantly strives for the superhuman shining heights, is always portrayed as a feminine principle, passive, intuitive, and alluring. Whilst the universal counterpart of this human principle, represented on the Tree of Life by the supernals, is always described by the medieval alchemists as a virginal figure, from whose life and substance all things have issued, and through whose agency man is brought to the second birth.

The reader is earnestly recommended to study this ritual again and again until almost it becomes a part of his very life, incorporated into the very fabric of his being. Very little aesthetic appreciation will be required to realize that in this and the other rituals are passages of divine beauty and high eloquence. And the least learned will find ideas of especial appeal to him, as the scholar and the profound mystic will perceive great depth and erudition in what may appear on the surface as simple statement. Properly performed, with initiated technique and insight, these rituals are stately ceremonies of great inspiration and enlightenment.

The apparent complexity of the above delineated scheme may be thought by some individuals to be entirely too complicated for modern man and not sufficiently simple in nature. While one can deeply sympathize with the ideas of the extreme simplicity cult in mysticism, nevertheless it is evident that the complex and arduous nature of the routine is no fault of magic. Man himself is responsible for this awkward situation. To be purified was considered by the alchemists and the theurgists of a bygone day as not nearly enough. That purification and consecration was required to be repeated and repeated, again and again. Because of countless centuries of evolution and material development—sometimes in quite false directions—man has spiritually repressed himself, and thus gradually forgotten his true divine nature. Meanwhile, as a sort of compensation for this loss, he has developed a complexity of physical and psychic constitution for dealing adequately with the physical world. Hence, methods of spiritual development refusing to admit the reality of that many-principled organization may not be recognized as valid, for the sole reason that man is not a simple being. Fundamentally and at root he may be simple, but in actuality he is not. Having strayed from his roots, and lost his spiritual birthright in a jungle of delusion, it is not always easy to rediscover those roots or to find the way out from the gates of the land of night.

In contradistinction to the above-mentioned type of amorphous mystical doctrine, magic does recognize the many-faceted nature of man. If that intricate structure so painfully constructed be considered an evil, as some seem to think, it is a necessary evil. It is one to be faced and used. Therefore magic connives by its technique to use, develop, and improve each of these several principles to its highest degree of perfection. “Thou must prepare thyself,” counsels Vaughan, “till thou art conformable to Him whom thou wouldst entertain, and that in every respect. Fit thy roof to thy God in what thou canst, and in what thou canst not He will help thee. When thou hast thus set thy house in order, do not think thy Guest will come without invitation. Thou must tire Him out with pious importunities.

Perpetual knockings at His door,
Tears sullyng his transparent rooms,
Sighs upon sighs; weep more and more—
He comes.

This is the way thou must walk in, which if thou dost thou shall perceive a sudden illustration, and there shall then abide in thee fire with light, wind with fire, power with wind, knowledge with power, and with knowledge an integrity of sober mind!”

Not enough is it to be illuminated. The problem is not quite as simple as that. It is in vain that the wine of the gods is poured into broken bottles. Each part of the soul, each elemental aspect of the entire man must be strengthened and transmuted and brought into equilibrium and harmony with the others. Integration must be the rule of the initiate, not pathology. In such a vehicle made consecrate and truly holy by this equilibration, the higher genius may find a worthy and fit dwelling. This and this alone, may ever constitute the true nature of initiation.

With each of the grades just described, a certain amount of personal work was provided, principally of a theoretical kind. The basic ideas of the Qabalah were imparted by means of so-called knowledge lectures, together with certain important symbols, and significant names in Hebrew were required to be memorized. The lamens—insignia worn over the heart—of the various officers were referred in diverse ways to the Tree of Life, thus explaining after a fashion the function of that particular office in the temple of initiation. Each path traversed, and every grade entered, had a so-called admission badge. This usually consisted of one of the many forms of the cross, and of symbols of the type of the swastika, truncated pyramid, and so forth. To these astrological and elemental attributions were referred. Most of these symbols possess great value, and since they repeatedly recur under different guises through the stages of personal magical work undertaken after the Adeptus Minor grade, they should receive the benefit of prolonged brooding and meditation.

Three of the most important items of personal study to be accomplished while in the First or Outer Order, apart from the memorization of the rudiments of the Qabalah, were: (a) the practice of the Pentagram ritual with the Qabalistic cross, (b) tattwa vision, and (c) divination by geomancy and the simple tarot method described by Waite in his Key to the Tarot.

The Pentagram Ritual was taught to the Neophyte immediately after his initiation in order that he might “form some idea of how to attract and come into communication with spiritual and invisible things.” Just as the Neophyte ceremony of admission contains the essential symbolism of the Great Work, shadowing forth symbolically the commencement of certain formulae of the Magic of Light, so potential within the Pentagram Ritual and the Qabalistic cross are the epitomes of the whole of that work. In all magical procedure it is fundamental, for it is a gesture of upraising the human consciousness to its own root of perfection and enlightenment by which the sphere of sensation and every act performed under its surveillance are sanctified. Thus it should precede every phase of magical work, elementary as well as advanced. The written rubric has previously appeared in my Tree of Life, and I may now add a word or two concerning the further directions that are orally imparted to the candidate after his admission.

The prime factor towards success in that exercise is to imagine that the astral form is capable of expansion, that it grows tall and high, until at length it has the semblance of a vast angelic figure, whose head towers amongst the distant stars of heaven. When this imaginative expansion of consciousness produces the sense that the height is enormous, with Earth as a tiny globe revolving beneath the feet, then above the head should be perceived or formulated a descending ray of brilliant light. As the candidate marks the head and then the breast, so should this brilliance descend, even down to his feet, a descending shaft of a gigantic cross of light. The act of marking the shoulders right and left whilst vibrating the Sephirotic names, traces the horizontal shaft of the cross, equilibrating the light within the sphere of sensation. Since it has been argued above that the Great Work consists in the search for the light, this ritual truly and completely performed leads to the accomplishment of that Work and the personal discovery of the light. The pentagrams trace a cleansing and protecting circle of force invoked by the four names of four letters each about the limits of the personal sphere, and the archangels are called, by vibration, to act as great stabilizing influences.

The study of the different types of divination may seem difficult to understand in an Order that purported to teach methods of spiritual development. Many will no doubt be rather perplexed by this. Divination usually is said to refer exclusively to the low occult arts, to fortunetelling, and to the prognostication of the future. Actually, however, so far as the Order is concerned, the principal object for these practical methods is that they stimulate, as few exercises can, the faculties of clairvoyance, imagination, and intuition. Though certain readings or interpretations to the geomantic and tarot symbols may be found in the appropriate textbooks, these rule of thumb methods do not conduce to the production of an accurate delineation of the spiritual causes behind material events. These interpretations are usual to the beginner in the art, for he requires a foundation of the principal definitions employed upon which his own meditations can build. These textual delineations in actual practice serve only as a base for the working of the inner faculties, provides for them a thrust-block as it were from which they may “kick off.” In short, the effort to divine by these methods calls into operation the intuitive and imaginative faculties to a very large extent. Everyone without exception has this faculty of divining in some degree, varying only in his ability to make it manifest. In most people it is wholly dormant.

Again, while divination as an artificial process may be wholly unnecessary and a hindrance to the refined perceptions of a fully developed adept, who requires no such convention to ascertain whence a thing comes and whither it is going, yet these aids and stimuli have their proper place for the Neophyte. For those in training, they are not only legitimate but useful and necessary. It may be interesting for the reader to attempt to acquire intuitive knowledge on any matter without the divinatory aids first, and it will be seen how extremely difficult it is to get started, to pick upon any one fact or incident which shall act as a prompt or a starter of the interior mechanism. Having failed in this way, let him see how much further he really may go by the judicious and sensible use of one of the Order methods. There is no doubt that the opening of the mind to an intuitive perception is considerably aided by these methods. And this is particularly true with regard to the rather lengthy tarot method, which was given to the initiate while engaged in the fulfillment of his Adeptus Minor curriculum. Like all magical techniques, divination is open to abuse. The fact, however, that abuse is possible does not, as again and again must be reiterated, fully condemn the abused technique. The application of common sense to the magical art is as necessary as it is to all else.

There was a movement on foot in one of the temples a little while ago to eliminate the study and practice of geomancy from the scheme of training of the Outer Order. The prevailing tendency is so to simplify the road to adeptship as to reduce the practical requisites to an absolute minimum by eliminating every phase of the work which does not come “naturally,” and whose study might involve hard work. Most of the newly admitted candidates to this temple within the past five years or more are utterly without any practical acquaintance with this technique.

Originally, astrology was taught as part of the regular routine. All instruction on this subject seems now to have been thoroughly extirpated from the Order papers. Perhaps in this particular instance the omission is just as well. For recent years have seen a great deal of meticulous attention paid to this study by sincere and honest researchers, and there have been published many first-rate books explaining its intricacies. All that the Order demands of the Adeptus Minor is that he should be able to draw up a map showing the position of planets and signs, preparatory to certain operations requiring the invocation of zodiacal forces.

Tattwa vision requires but little mention in this place, for full instructions in this technical method of acquiring clairvoyance may be seen in a later volume. They are compiled from a number of documents and verbal instructions obtaining within the Order. Since these oral “tit-bits” and papers were very scattered, it has been found necessary to reorganize the whole matter. In that restatement, however, I have exercised no originality nor uttered personal viewpoints on any phase of the technique, confining my labor solely to rewriting the material in my possession. It may be interesting for the psychological critic to reflect upon the fact that it was this technique to which most members of the Order devoted the greatest attention—the only technique in which, more than any other single branch of the work, there is greater opportunity for deception and self-deception. While in many ways the Order technique may appear different from the vision method described in my Tree of Life, both are essentially the same. For they teach the necessity of an imaginative formation of an intellectual or astral form, the Body of Light, for the purpose of exploring the different regions of the Tree of Life or the several strata of one's own psychic makeup. The simpler aspects of this investigation are taught just after the grade of Philosophus, though naturally the full possibilities of this method and the complete details on the technical side do not reveal themselves until the teaching of the Second Order has been received.

In addition to these technical methods, there were meditations on the symbols and ideas of the whole system, and it was quite frequently suggested that the student go through the ceremonies, after having taken the grades, and build them up in his imagination so that he relives them as vividly as when he was in the temple. The practical exercise that accompanied the Portal grade was one in which the aspirant built up, again in the imagination, a symbolic form of the Qabalistic Tree of Life, paying at first particular attention to the formulation of the Middle Pillar in the sphere of sensation or aura. This latter was conceived to be an ovoid shape of subtle matter, and the imaginative formulation of the various Sephiroth therein whilst vibrating the appropriate divine names went far towards opening, in a safe and balanced way, the psycho-spiritual centers of which the Sephiroth were but symbols. This technique, with the so-called Vibratory Formula of the Middle Pillar that is a development therefrom, I consider to be one of the most important practical systems employed in the Order. Though the documents describe it in a very rudimentary and sketchy fashion, nevertheless it is capable of expansion in several quite astonishing directions. I have discussed and expanded this technique at considerable length in my book The Art of True Healing.

So far, I have confined myself to a bird's-eye view of the routine as established in the First or Outer Order of the Golden Dawn. The graduated training of the entire Outer was intended as a preparation for the practical work to be performed in the Inner or Second Order of the Roseae Rubeae et Aureae Crucis. The assignation of personal magical work seems deliberately to have been postponed until after the Vault reception. It was held that the ceremony formulated a link between the aspirant and his Augoeides, that connection serving therefore as a guide and a powerful protection, which is clearly required in the works of ceremonial magic. Since at the commencement of each serious operation the initiate must needs exalt himself towards his higher and divine genius that through him may flow the divine power which alone is capable of producing a pure magical work, the initial forging of that link is a matter of supreme importance.

Let me now detail the curriculum of work prescribed in the Second Order. The training of the Adeptus Minor consisted of eight separate items, and I quote the following from a syllabus “A—General Orders,” now in circulation.

“Part One. A. Preliminary. Receive and copy: Notes on the Obligation. The Ritual of the 5th = 6th Grade. The manuscript, “Sigils from the Rose.” The Minutum Mundum. Having made your copies of these and returned the originals you should study them in order to prepare to sit for the written examination. You must also arrange with the adept in whose charge you are, about your examination in the temple on the practical work.

“Part Two. Receive the Rituals of the Pentagram and Hexagram. Copy and learn them. You can now sit for the written examination in these subjects and complete ‘A’ by arranging to be tested in your practical knowledge in the temple.

“Part One. B. Implements. Receive the Rituals of the Lotus Wand, Rose Cross, Sword, and the Elemental Weapons. Copy and return them. There is a written examination on the above subjects—that is on the construction, symbolism, and use of these objects, and the general nature of a consecration ceremony and the forming of invocations. This can be taken before the practical work of making is begun or at any stage during it.

“Part Two. This consists in the making of the implements that must be passed as suitable before the consecration is arranged for, in the presence of a Chief or other qualified adept. The making and consecration are done in the order given above unless it is preferred to do all the practical work first, and make arrangements for consecration as convenient.

“Part One. G. Neophyte Formulae. Receive and copy Z. 1 on the symbols and formulae of the Neophyte Ritual. Z. 3, the symbolism of the Neophyte in this Ceremony. Copy the godform designs of the Neophyte Ritual. The written examination on the Z. manuscripts may now be taken.

“Part Two. To describe to the Chief or other suitable adept in the temple the arrangement of the astral temple and the relative position of the forms in it. To build up any godform required, using the correct Coptic name.”

The above three sections, A. B. G., completed the course prescribed for the Zelator Adeptus Minor, the first sub-grade. The passing of these examinations conferred the qualification for holding the office of Hierophant, that is the initiator, in the Outer Order of the G.D.

“Part One. C. Psychic. This consists in a written examination in the tattwa system. Its method of use, and an account of any one vision you have had from any card.

“Part Two. This consists in making a set of tattwa cards, if you have not already done so, and sending them to be passed by the Chief or other adept appointed. To take the examiner on a tattwic journey, instructing him as if he were a student and vibrating the proper names for a selected symbol.

“Part One. D. Divination. Receive and study the tarot system, making notes of the principal attributions of the inner method.

“Part Two. Practical. On a selected question, either your own, or the examiner’s, to work out a divination first by geomancy, then by horary astrology, then by the complete inner tarot system, and send in a correlated account of the result.

“Part One. F. Angelic Tablets. Receive and make copies of the Enochian tablets, the Ritual of the Concourse of the Forces, and the Ritual of the making of the Pyramid, sphinx, and godform for any square. A written examination on these subjects may now be taken.

“Part Two. To make and colour a pyramid for a selected square, and to make the godform and sphinx suitable to it, and to have this passed by an adept. To prepare a ritual for practical use with this square, and in the presence of a Chief or other adept appointed, to build it up astrally and describe the vision produced. To study and play Enochian chess, and to make one of the chessboards and a set of chessmen.

“Part One. E. Talismans. Receive a manuscript on the making and consecrating of talismans. Gather names, sigils, etc., for a talisman for a special purpose. Make a design for both sides of it and send it in for a Chief to pass. Make up a special ritual for consecrating to the purpose you have in mind and arrange a time with the Chief for the ceremony of consecration.

“H. Consecration and Evocation. Subject: A ceremony on the formulae of Ritual Z. 2. Must be prepared before examiner and must meet with his approval as to method, execution, and effect.”

All the documents from A to Z listed above will be found reproduced in these volumes, though I have not retained that particular order. The sole omissions are the documents lettered H., J., L., and part of M.

“J.” consists simply of an elaborated commentary upon the Adeptus Minor obligation, written in a florid ponderous style reminiscent of Eliphas Levi-cum-Arthur Edward Waite.

“H.,” Clavicula Tabularum Enochi, is a more or less lengthy manuscript, turgid and archaic, for the most part repeating, though not as clearly, the contents of “S, The Book of the Concourse of the Forces.” Incidentally, this document is practically a verbatim duplicate of part of a lengthy manuscript to be found in the Manuscript Library of the British Museum, Sloane 307. A good deal of the advice given is typically medieval, and definitely unsound from a spiritual viewpoint, and is certainly not in accord with the general lofty tenor of the remaining Order teaching. It explains how to find precious metals and hidden treasure, and how to drive away the elemental guardians thereof. It is an inferior piece of work—as also is the document “L.,” and so I have decided to omit both.

“M.” has two sections, the Hermes Vision, which I do propose to give, and the Lineal Figures of the Sephiroth. Because of the extreme complexity of the latter, and because it will be impossible to reproduce the several geometrical drawings in colour which accompany that manuscript, the writer has deemed it sufficient to restate it in a general manner as a note to the instruction on telesmatic images.

The whole of the above-described material I have arranged and classified in an entirely different way. The contents of these volumes will be found divided up into so many chapters or separate books, each complete by itself. And the material in each book will be seen to be consistent and appertain to parts of the magical technique that are placed with it. The table of contents describes my method of arrangement.

Clearly from these disclosures there may be drastic results. But the good, I trust, will immeasurably and ultimately outweigh whatever evil may come. That some careless people will hurt themselves and burn their fingers experimenting with matters not wholly understood seems almost inevitable. Theirs, however, will be the fault. For the formulae of magic require intensive study prior to experimental work. And since all the important formulae are given in their entirety, and nothing withheld that is of the least value, there should be no excuse for anybody harming himself. No serious hurt should come to anyone. On the contrary, the gain to those serious students of magic and mysticism who have initiative and yet refuse to involve themselves with corrupt occult orders, and it is to these that I fain would speak, should be immeasurable.

You are being given a complete system of attainment. This you must study and develop at your own leisure, applying it in your own particular way. The system is complete and effectual, as well as noble. The grade rituals as I shall reproduce them have been tampered with, in some cases unintelligently. Their efficacy, however, is not impaired, for the principal portion of those grade rituals, which teaches the art of invocation, is intact. So that the unwise editing that they have received in the past several years has not actually damaged them—all that has been removed are a few items, more or less important, of Qabalistic knowledge. If the reader feels that these might be value to him, and for the sake of tolerable completeness would like to have them, by studying such Qabalistic texts as the Zohar and the Sepher Yetzirah (both of which are now in English translation), or some such work as Waite's Holy Kabbalah, he will be in possession of the fundamental facts. It is in other parts of the Order work that injudicious tampering has been at work. Most of this is now restored, and I believe that this book is an accurate representation of the whole of the Order work from Neophyte to Theoricus Adeptus Minor.

Some portions of the manuscripts have required editing, principally from the literary point of view. Whole paragraphs have had to be deleted, others shortened, sentences made more clear, the redundant use of many words eliminated, and a general coordination of the manuscripts undertaken. Certain other sections—those dealing at length with talismans, sigils, clairvoyance, geomancy, and the Enochian tablets—have been completely rewritten to render them more coherent. But nothing that is essential or vital to the magical tenor or understanding of any document will be omitted, changed, or altered. This I avow and publicly swear. Where personally I have seen fit to make comment on any matter in order to clarify the issue or to indicate its antecedents, or connections in other parts of the work, that comment or remark is so marked by me with initials.

Let me therefore urge upon the sincere reader whose wish it is to study this magical system, to pay great attention to the scheme of the grade rituals, to obtain a bird's-eye view of the whole, to study every point, its movement and teaching. This should be repeated again and again, until the mind moves easily from one point of the ritual to another. The synthetic outline of those rituals presented in this introduction should be found helpful as assisting in this task. Let him also study the diagrams of the temple layout, and build up in his imagination a clear and vivid picture of that temple together with the appropriate officers and their movements. Then it will be an easy matter to devise a simple form of self-initiation. It will be simple to adapt the text to solo performance. But a careful scrutiny and examination of the entire system should long precede any effort to do practical work, if serious harm and danger is to be avoided. The language needs first of all to be mastered, and the symbolic ideas of the whole system assimilated and incorporated into the very fiber of one's being. Intellectual acquaintance with every aspect of the subject is just as necessary as personal integrity and selfless devotion to an ideal. Sincerity is indeed the most trustworthy shield and buckler that any student may possess, but if he neglects the intellectual mastery of the subject, he will soon discover where his heel of Achilles is located. But these two combined are the only safeguards, the fundamental requisites to an insight into the significance of magic. Not only are they the only sure foundation, but they conduce to the continual recollection of the goal at the end, which understanding arises through penetrating to the root of the matter, without which the student may stray but too readily from the narrow way stretching before him. No matter how brilliant his intellectual capacity, no matter how ardent his sincerity or potent his dormant magical power, always must he remember that they matter absolutely in no way unless applied to the Great Work—the knowledge and conversation of the higher and divine genius. “Power without wisdom,” said a poet, “is the name of Death.” And as Frater D.D.C.F. so rightly said of one phase of magical work, but which has its application to the whole scheme, “Know thou that this is not to be done lightly for thine amusement or experiment, seeing that the forces of nature were not created to be thy plaything or toy. Unless thou doest thy practical magical works with solemnity, ceremony, and reverence, thou shalt be like an infant playing with fire, and thou shalt bring destruction upon thyself.” In deviation from these injunctions lie the only actual dangers in the divine science.

One of the essentials of preliminary work is the committing to memory of the important correspondences and attributions. And I cannot insist too strongly that this is fundamental. The student must make himself familiar first of all with the Hebrew alphabet, and learn how to write the names of the Sephiroth and deity names in that tongue—he will realize their value when he approaches the practical work of invocation. Much time should be spent studying and meditating upon the glyph of the Tree of Life and memorizing all the important attributions—divine names, names of archangels, angels, spheres, and elements. All the symbols referred to the lamens of the officers should be carefully meditated upon, as also the various admission badges, and other symbols given in the knowledge lectures. Above all, a great deal of time and attention should be paid to the Middle Pillar technique and the vibratory formulae of divine names.

The student can easily adapt any fair-sized room to the exigencies of a temple. The writer has worked in one hardly larger than a long cupboard, about ten feet long by six or seven wide. All furniture from the center should be cleared away, leaving a central space in which one may freely move and work. A small table covered with a black cloth will suffice for the altar, and the two pillars may be dispensed with but formulated in the imagination as present. He may find it very useful to paint flashing angelic tablets according to the instructions found elsewhere, as well as the Banners of the East and West, placing these in the appropriate cardinal quarters of his improvised temple. If he is able to obtain small plaster casts of the heads of the Kerubim—the lion, eagle, bull, and man—and place these in the proper stations, they will be found together with the tablets to impart a considerable amount of magical vitality and atmosphere to the temple. What actually they do bestow is rather subtle, and perhaps indefinable. They are not absolute essentials, however, and may be dispensed with. But since magic works by the intervention of symbol and emblem, the surrounding of the student's sphere with the correct forms of magical symbolism, assists in the impressing of those symbols within the aura or sphere of sensation, the true magical temple. This may be left to the ingenuity and the convenience of the student himself to discover after having made a close examination of the documents involved.

Another matter upon which brief comment must be made concerns the instruments. It would have given me great pleasure to have had illustrations of these reproduced in colour, for only thus can one appreciate their significance and the part they play in ceremonial. But this unfortunately has not been possible. Thus they are given only in black and white, which obviously cannot impart anything but the merest fraction of their actual beauty and suggestiveness. And I impress upon the serious student, even implore him, to betake upon himself the trouble of making these instruments himself. They are very simple to fashion. And the results obtained, to say little of the knowledge acquired or the intuitive processes that somehow are stimulated by that effort, are well worth even a great deal of bother. To adopt temporarily part of the terminology now current among analytical psychologists, and identify the latent spiritual self of man with what is known as the Unconscious, then be it remembered that this vast subterranean stream of vitality and memory and inspiration can only be reached by means of a symbol. For the latter, states Jung, "is the primitive expression of the Unconscious, while on the other hand it is an idea corresponding to the highest intuition produced by consciousness." Thus these weapons and magical instruments are symbolic representations of psychic events, of forces inhering within the potentiality of the inner man. By means of their personal manufacture, magical consecration and continual employment they may be made to affect and stimulate the dormant side of man's nature. It is an interesting fact that in his practice, Jung encouraged his patients to paint symbolic designs that sometimes were comparable to the Eastern mandalas. It seems that the effort to paint these designs had the effect of straightening out stresses and knots in the unconscious, thus accomplishing the therapeutic object of the analysis. And not only were they thus means of self-expression but these designs produced a counter-effect of fascinating, healing, and stimulating to renewed activity the hitherto unmanifested psyche.

With the exception that the ordinary magical student is not neurotic or psychopathic, the techniques are rather similar. For the magical tradition has always insisted upon the routine to be followed by the aspirant to that art. He was required to fashion the implements himself, and the more laborious he found that task, with the greater difficulties thrown before him, by so much more were those efforts of spiritual value. For not only are these instruments symbols or expressions of inner realities, but what is infinitely more of practical worth, their actual projection in this way from within outwards, the physical fashioning and painting of these instruments, also works an effect. They bring to life the man that was asleep. They react upon their maker. They become powerful magical agents, true talismans of power.

Thus, the lotus wand is declared in the ritual to have the colors of the twelve signs of the zodiac painted on its stem, and it is surmounted by the lotus flower of Isis. It symbolizes the development of creation. The wand has ever been a symbol of the magical will, the power of the spirit in action. And its description in the instruction on the lotus wand is such that it is seen to embrace the whole of nature—the Sephiroth, the spiritual aspects of the elements, and the action of the sun upon all life by a differentiating process. Even as the whole of nature is the embodiment of a dynamic will, the visible form and vehicle of a spiritual consciousness. The lotus flower grows from the darkness and gloom of the secret depths, through the waters, ever striving to open its blossoms on the surface of the waters to the rays of light of the sun. So is the true magical or spiritual will secreted within the hidden depths of the soul of man. Unseen, sometimes unknown and unsuspected, it lies latent through the whole of life. By these rites of magic, its symbols and exercises, we are enabled to assist its growth and development, by piercing through the outer husks of the restricting shell, until it bursts into full bloom

—the flower of the human spirit, the lotus of the higher soul. “Look for the flower to bloom in the silence ... It shall grow, it will shoot up, it will make branches and leaves and form buds while the storm continues, while the battle lasts. It is the flower of the soul that has opened.” Note, moreover, the description of and the comment made by Jung to a symbolic design brought to him by one of his patients, evidently a design like to the lotus wand, for he says: “The plant is frequently a structure in brilliant fiery colors and is shown growing out of a bed of darkness and carrying the blossom of light at the top, a symbol similar to the Christmas tree.” This is highly suggestive, and students both of yoga and magic will find in this curious indications of the universality of cogent symbols. Magical processes and symbols are, in short, receiving confirmation at the hands of experimental psychology. It remains for the reader to benefit thereby.

The Rose Cross is a lamen or badge synthesizing a vast concourse of ideas, representing in a single emblem the Great Work itself—the harmonious reconciliation in one symbol of diverse and apparently contradictory concepts, the reconciliation of divinity and manhood. It is a highly important symbol to be worn over the heart during every important operation. It is a glyph, in one sense, of the higher genius to whose knowledge and conversation the student is eternally aspiring. In the rituals it is described as the key of sigils and rituals.

The sword is a weapon symbolizing the critical dispersive faculty of the mind. It is used where force and strength are required, more particularly for banishing than for invoking—as though conscious intellection were allied to the power of will. When employed in certain magical ceremonies with the point upwards, its nature is transformed into an instrument similar to the wand. The elemental weapons of the wand, cup, dagger, and pentacle are symbolical representations of the forces employed for the manifestation of the inner self, the elements required for the incarnation of the divine. They are attributed to the four letters of Tetragrammaton. All of these are worth making, and by creating them and continually employing them intelligently in the ways shown by the various rituals, the student will find a new power developing within him, a new center of life building itself up from within.

One last word of caution. Let me warn the student against attempting difficult and complex ceremonies before he has mastered the more simple ones. The syllabus provided on a former page for the use of the Minor Adept grades work rather well. The consecration ceremonies for the magical implements are, of their kind, excellent examples of ceremonial work. Classical in nature, they are simple in structure and operation, and provide a harmonious and easily flowing ritual. A good deal of experience should be obtained with the constant use of these and similar types which the student should himself construct along these lines. A variety of things may occur to his mind for which a variety of operations may be performed. This of course, applies only to that phase of his studies when the preliminary correspondences and attributions have been thoroughly memorized and what is more, understood, and when the meditations have been performed. This likewise is another matter upon which too much emphasis cannot be laid.

Above all, the pentagram and hexagram rituals should be committed to memory so that no effort is required to recall at a moment's notice the points or angles of these figures from which the invocation of a certain force commences. Short ceremonies should be devised having as their object the frequent use of these lineal figures so that they become a part of the very manner in which the mind works during ceremonial. After some time has elapsed, and after considerable experience with the more simple consecration formulae, the student feeling more confident of himself and his ritualistic capacity, let him turn to the complex ceremonies whose formulae are summarized in the manuscripts Z. 2. These require much preparation, intensive study, and a great deal of rehearsal and experience. Moreover, he must not be disappointed if, at first, the results fall short of his anticipations. Persistence is an admirable and necessary virtue, particularly in magic. And let him endeavour to penetrate into the reasons for the apparent worthlessness or puerility of the aims of these formulae, such as transformation, evocation, invisibility, by reflection on the spiritual forces which must flow through him in order to effect such ends. And let him beware of the booby trap that was set up in the Order—of doing but one of these ceremonies, or superficially employing any phase of the system as though to pass an examination, and considering in consequence that he is the master of the technique.

My work is now done.

“Let us work, therefore, my brethren and effect righteousness, because the Night cometh when no man shall labour ... May the Light which is behind the Veil shine through you from your throne in the East on the Fratres and Sorores of the Order and lead them to the perfect day, when the glory of this world passes and a great light shines over the splendid sea.”

NEOPHYTE GRADE PAPERS

First Knowledge Lecture

1. The four elements of the ancients are duplicated conditions of:

Heat and Dryness	Fire	△
Heat and Moisture	Air	△
Cold and Dryness	Earth	▽
Cold and Moisture	Water	▽

2. The signs of the zodiac are twelve:

1. Aries, the Ram	♈
2. Taurus, the Bull	♉
3. Gemini, the Twins	♊
4. Cancer, the Crab	♋
5. Leo, the Lion	♌
6. Virgo, the Virgin	♍
7. Libra, the Scales	♎
8. Scorpio, the Scorpion	♏
9. Sagittarius, the Archer	♐
10. Capricorn, the Goat	♑
11. Aquarius, the Water-Bearer	♒
12. Pisces, the Fishes	♓

These twelve signs are distributed among the four triplicities, or sets of three signs, each being attributed to one of the four elements, and they represent the operation of the elements in the zodiac.

Thus to fire belong Aries, Leo, Sagittarius:	♈	♌	♐
Thus to earth belong Taurus, Virgo, Capricornus:	♉	♍	♑
	♊	♎	♓

Thus to air belong Gemini, Libra, Aquarius:

Thus to water belong Cancer, Scorpio, Pisces:

3. To the ancients, six planets were known, besides the sun, which they classed with the planets. They also assigned certain planetary values to the north and south nodes of the moon—that is, the points where her orbit touches that of the ecliptic. These they named:

Caput Draconis  Head of the Dragon and Cauda Draconis  Tail of the Dragon

Since the discovery of two more distant planets, Neptune and Uranus or Herschel,¹ these two terms have been partially replaced by them. The effect of Caput Draconis is similar to that of Neptune. The effect of Cauda Draconis is similar to that of Uranus.

The old planets are:

Saturn	♄	Sol	☉
Jupiter	♃	Venus	♀
Mars	♂	Mercury	☿
Luna ☾ the moon

4. The Hebrew Alphabet is given on page 53. Each letter represents a number and has also a meaning. Five letters have a different shape when written at the end of a word and also a different number.

Mem  (final) Of these finals, Mem is distinguished by being the only oblong letter.

 The other four—Kaph, Nun, Pe, Tzaddi—have tails which should come below the line as shown. Hebrew and Chaldee² letters are written from right to left.

The Hebrew Qabalists referred the highest and most abstract ideas to the emanations of deity or Sephiroth. They made them ten in number. Each one is a Sephirah, and when arranged in a certain manner they form the Tree of Life.

Hebrew letters are holy symbols. They should be carefully drawn and square.

The Sephiroth are:

1. Kether	K-Th-R	The Crown	כתר
2. Chokmah	Ch-K-M-H	Wisdom	חכמה
3. Binah	B-I-N-H	Understanding	בינה
4. Chesed	Ch-S-D	Mercy	חסד
5. Geburah	G-B-U-R-H	Severity	גבורה
6. Tiphareth	Th-Ph-A-R-Th	Beauty	תפארת
7. Netzach	N-Ts-Ch	Victory	נצח
8. Hod	H-O-D	Glory	הוד
9. Yesod	Y-S-O-D	The Foundation	יסוד
10. Malkuth	M-L-K-U-Th	The Kingdom	מלכות

The Dagesh or pointing which represents the vowel sounds in modern Hebrew script is not given. It was a later invention to standardize pronunciation and is described in Hebrew grammars.

The Hebrew Alphabet

א	A	1		Aleph	Ox
ב	B, V	2		Beth	House
ג	G, Gh	3		Gimel	Camel
ד	D, Dh	4		Daleth	Door
ה	H	5		He	Window
ו	O, U, V	6		Vau	Pin or Hook
ז	Z	7		Zayin	Sword or Armour
ח	Ch	8		Cheth	Fence, Enclosure

ט	T	9	Teth	Snake

Note by Regardie: Readers of the above who have perused my Tree of Life and Garden of Pomegranates will note the difference in Hebrew pronunciation, and in order to avoid any further confusion an explanatory note must here be added. As is true of every language, in Hebrew there are several quite distinct dialects. There are, however, two principal ones which should be mentioned. The Ashkenazic, a dialect mostly in employment in Germany, Poland, and Russia, and the Sephardic used in Spain, Portugal, and the Mediterranean generally. Now since the Qabalah attained its prominence in Spain, most Qabalists have employed the Sephardic dialect. Personally I have found that the Ashkenazic dialect answers more nearly than the other to the requirements of transliteration into English, and many problems that have assailed modern students would have been nonexistent had they known of the pronunciation which I employed in my former works. Actually, however, students must discover which of these two suits his own personal predilection and answers to the necessity imposed by the results of study and experience. The Order teaching employs the Sephardic pronunciation, and I have not ventured to interfere with that in any way at all. I simply mention the matter here to render impossible the likelihood of confusion arising.

First Meditation

Let the Neophyte consider a point as defined in mathematics—having position but no magnitude—and let him note the ideas to which this gives rise. Concentrating his faculties on this, as a focus, let him endeavour to realize the immanence of the divine throughout nature, in all her aspects.

Begin by finding a position, balanced, but sufficiently comfortable. Breathe rhythmically until the body is still and the mind quiet. Keep this state for a few minutes at first—and for longer as you get more used to preventing the mind from wandering. Think now of the subject for meditation in a general way—then choose out one thought or image and follow that to its conclusion.

The simplest rhythm for the beginner is the Fourfold Breath.

1. Empty the lungs and remain thus while counting four.
2. Inhale, counting four so that you feel filled with breath to the throat.
3. Hold this breath while counting four.
4. Exhale, counting four till the lungs are empty.

This should be practiced, counting slowly or quickly till you obtain a rhythm that suits you—one that is comforting and stilling. Having attained this, count the breath thus for two or three minutes, till you feel quiet, and then proceed with the meditation.

The Lesser Ritual of the Pentagram

Take a steel dagger in the right hand. Face east. Touch thy forehead and say Ateh (thou art). Touch thy breast and say Malkuth (the Kingdom). Touch thy right shoulder and say ve-Geburah (and the Power). Touch thy left shoulder and say ve-Gedulah (and the Glory). Clasp thy hands before thee and say Le-Olam (forever). Dagger between fingers, point up and say Amen.

Make in the air towards the east the invoking pentagram as shown and, bringing the point of the dagger to the centre of the pentagram, vibrate the deity name—Yod He Vau He—imagining that your voice carries forward to the east of the universe. Holding the dagger out before you, go to the south, make the pentagram, and vibrate similarly the deity name—Adonai.

Go to the west, make the pentagram, and vibrate Eheieh. Go to the north, make the pentagram, and vibrate Agla. Return to the east and complete your circle by bringing the dagger point to the centre of the first pentagram.

Stand with arms outstretched in the form of a cross and say: Before me, Raphael; behind me, Gabriel; at my right hand, Michael; at my left hand, Auriel; before me flames the pentagram—behind me shines the six-rayed star.

Again make the Qabalistic cross as directed above, saying Ateh, etc.

For banishing use the same ritual, but reversing the direction of the lines of the pentagram.

The Uses of the Pentagram Ritual

1. As a form of prayer the invoking ritual should be used in the morning, the banishing in the evening. The names should be pronounced inwardly in the breath vibrating it as much as possible and feeling that the whole body throbs with the sound and sends out a wave of vibration directed to the ends of the quarter.

2. As a protection against impure magnetism, the banishing ritual can be used to get rid of obsessing or disturbing thoughts. Give a mental image to your obsession and imagine it formulated before you. Project it out of your aura with the saluting sign of a Neophyte, and when it is about three feet away, prevent its return with the Sign of Silence. Now imagine the form in the east before you and do the Banishing Ritual of the Pentagram to disintegrate it, seeing it, in your mind's eye, dissolving on the farther side of your ring of flame.

3. It can be used as an exercise in concentration. Seated in meditation or lying down, formulate yourself standing up in robes and holding a dagger. Put your consciousness in this form and go to the east. Make yourself "feel" there by touching the wall, opening your eyes, stamping on the floor, etc.

Begin the ritual and go round the room mentally vibrating the words and trying to feel them as coming from the form. Finish in the east and try to see your results in the Astral Light, then walk back and stand behind the head of your body and let yourself be reabsorbed.³

The Pillars

In the explanation of the symbols of the grade of Neophyte, your attention has been directed to the general mystical meaning of the two pillars called in the ritual the pillars of Hermes, of Seth, and of Solomon. In the 9th chapter of the Ritual of the Dead they are referred to as the Pillars of Shu, the pillars of the gods of the dawning light, and also as the northern and southern columns of the gate of the Hall of Truth. In the 125th chapter, they are represented by the sacred gateway, the door to which the aspirant is brought when he has completed the negative confession. The archaic pictures on the one pillar are painted in black upon a white ground, and those on the other in white upon a black ground, in order to express the interchange and reconciliation of opposing forces and the eternal balance of light and darkness which gives force to visible nature.

The black cubical bases represent darkness and matter wherein the spirit, the Ruach Elohim, began to formulate the ineffable name, that name which the ancient rabbis have said “rushes through the universe,” that name before which the darkness rolls back at the birth of time.

The flaming red triangular capitals which crown the summit of the pillars represent the triune manifestation of the spirit of life, the Three Mothers of the Sepher Yetzirah, the three alchemical principles of nature—the sulphur, the mercury, and the salt.

Each pillar is surmounted by its own light-bearer veiled from the material world.

At the base of both pillars rise the lotus flowers, symbols of regeneration and metempsychosis. The archaic illustrations are taken from vignettes of the 17th and 125th chapters of the Ritual of the Dead, the Egyptian Book of the Per-em-Hru or the Book of Coming Forth into the Day, the oldest book in the world as yet discovered. The recension of the priests of On is to be found in the walls of the Pyramids of the Kings of the fifth and sixth dynasties at Sakarah, the recension of the eleventh and twelfth dynasties on the sarcophagi of that period, and the Theban recension of the eighteenth dynasty and onward is found on papyri, both plain and illuminated. No satisfactory translation of these books is available, none having been yet attempted by a scholar having the qualifications of mystic as well as Egyptologist.

The Ritual of the Dead, generally speaking, is a collection of hymns and prayers in the form of a series of ceremonial rituals to enable the man to unite himself with Osiris the Redeemer. After this union he is no longer called the man, but Osiris, with whom he is now symbolically identified. "That they also may be one of us," said the Christ of the New Testament. "I am Osiris," said the purified and justified man, his soul luminous and washed from sin in the immortal and uncreated light, united to Osiris, and thereby justified, and the son of God; purified by suffering, strengthened by opposition, regenerate through self-sacrifice. Such is the subject of the great Egyptian ritual.

The 17th chapter of the Theban recension consists of a very ancient text with several commentaries, also extremely old, and some prayers, none of which come into the scheme of the original text. It has, together with the 12th chapter, been very carefully translated for the purpose of this lecture by the V.H. Frater M.W.T., and the V.H. Soror S.S.D.D. has made many valuable suggestions with regard to the interpretation.⁴ The title and preface of the 17th chapter reads:

"Concerning the exaltation of the glorified ones, of coming and going forth in the divine domain, of the genies of the beautiful land of Amentet. Of coming forth in the light of day in any form desired, of hearing the forces of nature by being enshrined as a living Bai."

And the rubric is:

“The united with Osiris shall recite it when he has entered the harbour. May glorious things be done thereby upon earth. May all the words of the adept be fulfilled.”

Owing to the complex use of symbols, the ritual translation of the chapter can only be understood by perpetual reference to the ancient Egyptian commentaries, and therefore the following paraphrase has been put together to convey to modern minds as nearly as possible the ideas conceived by the old Egyptians in this glorious triumphal song of the soul of man made one with Osiris, the Redeemer.

“I am Tum made One with all things.

“I have become Nu. I am Ra in his rising ruling by right of his power. I am the great god self-begotten, even Nu, who pronounced his names, and thus the circle of the gods was created.

“I am yesterday and know tomorrow. I can never more be overcome. I know the secret of Osiris, whose being is perpetually revered of Ra. I have finished the work which was planned at the beginning, I am the spirit made manifest, and armed with two vast eagle’s plumes. Isis and Nephthys are their names, made one with Osiris.

“I claim my inheritance. My sins have been uprooted and my passions overcome. I am pure white. I dwell in time. I live through eternity, when initiates make offering to the everlasting gods. I have passed along the pathway. I know the northern and the southern pillars, the two columns at the gateway of the Hall of Truth.

“Stretch unto me your hands, O ye dwellers in the centre. For I am transformed to a god in your midst. Made one with Osiris, I have filled the eye socket in the day of the morning when good and evil fought together.

“I have lifted up the cloud-veil in the sky of the storm, till I saw Ra born again from out the Great Waters. His strength is my strength, and my strength is his strength. Homage to you, Lords of Truth, chiefs who Osiris rules. Granting release from sin, followers of Ma where rest is glorious, whose throne Anubis built in the day when Osiris said:

“Lo! A man wins his way to Amentet. I come before you, to drive away my faults. As ye did to the seven glorious ones who follow their lord Osiris. I am that spirit of earth and sun.

“Between the two pillars of flame. I am Ra when he fought beneath the Ashad tree, destroying the enemies of the ancient of days. I am the dweller in the egg. I am he who turns in the disc. I shine forth from the horizon, as the gold from the mine. I float through the Pillars of Shu in the ether, without a peer among the gods. The breath of my mouth is as a flame. I light upon the earth with my glory. Eye cannot gaze on my darting beams, as they reach through the heavens and lick up the Nile with tongues of flame. I am strong upon earth with the strength of Ra. I have come into harbour as Osiris made perfect. Let priestly offerings be made to me as one in the train of the ancient of days. I brood as the divine spirit. I move in the firmness of my strength. I undulate as the waves that vibrate through eternity. Osiris has been claimed with acclamation, and ordained to rule among the gods, enthroned in the domain of Horus where the spirit and the body are united in the presence of the ancient of days. Blotted out are the sins of his body in passion. He has passed the eternal gate, and has received the New Year feast with incense, at the marriage of earth with heaven.

“Tum has built his bridal chamber. Rururet has founded his shrine. The procession’s completed. Horus has purified, Set has consecrated, Shu made one with Orisis has entered his heritage.

“As Tum he has entered the kingdom to complete union with the invisible. Thy bride, O Osiris, is Isis, who mourned thee when she found thee slain. In Isis, thou art born again. From Nephthys is thy nourishment. They cleansed thee in thy heavenly birth. Youth waits upon thee, ardour is ready at thy hand; and their arms shall uphold thee for millions of years. Initiates surround thee and thine enemies are cast down. The powers of darkness are destroyed. The companions of thy joys are with thee. Thy victories in the battle await their reward in the pillar. The forces of nature obey thee. Thy power is exceeding great. The gods curse him that curseth thee. Thine aspirations are fulfilled. Thou art the mistress of splendour. They are destroyed who barred thy way.”

The 125th chapter is concerned with the entry of an initiate into the hall of the two columns of justice, and commenced with a most beautiful and symbolic description of death, as a journey from the barren wilderness of earth, to the glorious land which lies beyond. The literal translation of the opening lines is as follows:

Images on Black Pillar

“I have come from afar to look upon thy beauties. My hands salute thy name of justice. I have come from afar, where the acacia tree grew not; where the tree thick with leaves is not born; where there come not beams from herb or grass. I have entered the place of mystery. I have communed with Set. Sleep came upon me, I was wrapped therein, bowing down before the hidden things. I was ushered into the house of Osiris. I saw the marvels that were there: the princes of the gates in their glory.”

The illustrations in this chapter represent the Hall of Truth as seen through the open leaves of its door. The hall is presided over by a god who holds his right hand over the cage of a hawk, and his left over the food of eternity. On each side of the god is a cornice crowned by a row of alternate feathers and uraei symbolizing justice and fiery power. The door leaf which completes the right hand of a stall is called “possessor of truth controlling the feet,” while that on the left is “possessor of strength, binding the male and female animals.” The forty-two judges of the dead are represented as seated in a long row, and each of them has to be named, and the sin over which he presided has been denied.

This chapter describes the introduction of the initiate into the Hall of Truth by Anubis, who, having questioned the aspirant, receives from him an account of his initiation, and is satisfied by his right to enter. He states that he has been taken into the antechamber of the temple and there stripped and blindfolded, he had to grope for the entrance of the hall, and having found it, he was reclothed and anointed in the presence of the initiated. He is then asked for the passwords and demands that his soul should be weighed in the great balance of the Hall of Truth, whereupon Anubis again interrogates him concerning the symbolism of the door of the hall, and his answers being found correct, Anubis says: “Pass on, thou knowest it.”

Among other things the initiate states that he has been purified four times, the same number of times that the Neophyte is purified and consecrated in the ceremony of the Neophyte. He then makes the long negative confession, stating to each judge in turn that he is innocent of that form of sin over which he judges. Then he invokes the judges to do him justice, and afterwards describes how he had washed in the washing place of the south, and rested in the north, in the place called “Son of the Deliverers” and he becomes the dweller under the olive tree of peace, and how he was given a tall flame of fire and a sceptre of cloud which he preserved in the salting tank in which mummies were swathed. And he found there another sceptre called “Giver of Breath” and with that he extinguished the flame and shattered the sceptre of cloud, and made a lake of it. The initiate is then brought to the actual pillars, and has to name them and their parts under the symbol of the scales of a balance. He also has to name the guardian of the gateway, who prevents his passage, and when all these are propitiated, the plea of the hall itself cries out against his steps, saying: “Because I am silent, because I am pure,” and it must know that his aspirations are pure enough and high enough for him to be allowed to tread upon it. He is then allowed to announce to Thoth that he is clean from all evil and has overcome the influence of the planets, and Thoth says to him: “Who is he whose pylons are of flame, whose walls of living uraei, and the flames of whose house are streams of water?” And the initiate replies “Osiris!”

And it is immediately proclaimed: “Thy meat shall be from the infinite, and thy drink from the infinite. Thou art able to go forth to the sepulchral feasts on Earth, for thou hast overcome.”

Thus, these two chapters, which are represented by their illustrations upon the pillars, represent the advance and purification of the soul and its union with Osiris, the Redeemer, in the Golden Dawn of the infinite light, in which the soul is transfigured, knows all, and can do all, for it is made one with the eternal God.

1. Note by JMG: Herschel was at one point an alternate name for Uranus.
2. Note by JMG: Chaldee, also known as Aramaic, is a language related to Hebrew and used in some Qabalistic writings.
3. Note by Regardie: In the Introduction I have given instructions for the performance of the Qabalistic cross. When tracing the pentagrams, the imagination should be exerted to visualize them as flaming stars all about one. The impression should be of a fire ring studded in four places with stars of flame. Likewise, when vibrating the angelic names, the student should endeavour to imagine four vast towering figures about him. But see further in my book The Middle Pillar.

Second Knowledge Lecture

The names and alchemical symbols of the three principles of nature are:

Sulphur	♁
Mercury	☿
Salt	☾

The metals attributed to the planets in alchemy are:

Lead	♄
Tin	♅
Iron	♂
Gold	☼
Copper	♀
Quicksilver	☿
Silver	♁

The following terms are used in books about alchemy. They have the meanings given below.

Sol Philosophorum: The pure living alchemical spirit of gold—the refined essence of heat and dryness.

Luna Philosophorum: The pure living alchemical spirit of silver—the refined essence of heat and moisture.

The Green Lion: The stem and root of the radical essence of metals.

The Black Dragon: Death—putrefaction—decay.

The King: Red—The Qabalistic Microprosopus.

Tiphareth—Analogous to gold and the sun.

The Queen: White—The Qabalistic Bride of Microprosopus.

Malkah—Analogous to silver and the moon.

The four orders of the elementals are:

1. The spirits of the earth—Gnomes
2. The spirits of the air—Sylphs
3. The spirits of the water—Undines
4. The spirits of the fire—Salamanders

These are the essential spiritual beings called upon to praise God in the “Benedicite Omnia Opera.” ⁵

The Kerubim are the living powers of Tetragrammaton on the material plane and the presidents of the four elements. They operate through the fixed or Kerubic signs of the zodiac and are thus symbolized and attributed:

Kerub of air—Man—Aquarius
Kerub of fire—Lion—Leo
Kerub of earth—Bull—Taurus
Kerub of water—Eagle—Scorpio

Tetragrammaton means “four-lettered name” and refers to the unpronounceable name of God symbolized by Jehovah.

The laver of water of purification refers to the waters of Binah, the female power reflected in the waters of creation.

The altar of burnt offering for the sacrifice of animals symbolizes the Qliploth, or evil demons of the plane contiguous to and below the material universe. It points out that our passions should be sacrificed. The Qliploth are the evil demons of matter and the shells of the dead.

The altar of incense in the Tabernacle was overlaid with gold. Ours is black to symbolize our work which is to separate the philosophic gold from the black dragon of matter.

This altar diagram (page 68) shows the ten Sephiroth with all the connecting Paths numbered and lettered, and the serpent winding over each Path. Around each Sephirah are written the names of the deity, archangel, and angelic host attributed to it. The twenty-two Paths are bound together by the serpent of wisdom. It unites the Paths but does not touch any of the Sephiroth, which are linked by the flaming sword. The flaming sword is formed by the natural order of the Tree of Life. It resembles a flash of lightning.

Together the Sephiroth and the twenty-two Paths form the thirty-two Paths of the Sepher Yetzirah or Book of Formation.

The two pillars either side of the altar represent:

Active: The white pillar on the south side.
 Male.
 Adam.
 Pillar of light and fire.
 Right Kerub.
 Metatron.

Passive: The black pillar on the north side.Female.
 Eve.
 Pillar of cloud.
 Left Kerub.
 Sandalphon.

The four worlds of the Qabalah are:

Atziluth, archetypal—pure deity.

אצילות

Briah, creative—archangelic.

בריאה

Yetzirah, formative—angelic.

יצירה

Assiah, action—matter, man, shells, demons.

עשיה

The ten houses, or heavens, of Assiah, the material world are:

1. Primum Mobile, Rashith ha Gilgalim.

ראשית הגלגלים

2. Sphere of the Zodiac, Mazloth.
3. Sphere of Saturn, Shabbathai.
4. Sphere of Jupiter, Tzedek.
5. Sphere of Mars, Madim.

The Serpent on the Tree of Life

The traditional tarot consists of a pack of seventy-eight cards made up of four suits of fourteen cards each, together with twenty-two trumps, or major arcana, which tell the story of the soul. Each suit consists of ten numbered cards, as in the modern playing cards, but there are four instead of three honours: King or Knight, Queen, Prince or Emperor, Princess or Knave.

The four suits are:

1. Wands or Sceptres comparable to Diamonds.
2. Cups or Chalices comparable to Hearts.
3. Swords comparable to Spades.
4. Pentacles or Coins comparable to Clubs.

Second Meditation

Let the Zelator meditate on a straight line. Let him take a ruler or a pencil and by moving it a distance equal to its length, outline a square. Having done this, let him, after quieting his mind with the rhythmic breathing taught in the first meditation, mentally formulate a cube, and endeavour to discover the significance of this figure and its correspondences.

Let him meditate upon minerals and crystals, choosing especially a crystal of salt and, entering into it, actually feel himself of crystalline formation. Looking out on the universe from this standpoint, let him identify himself with the earth spirits in love and sympathy, recalling as far as he can their prayer as said in the closing of the Zelator grade.

Let him meditate upon the earth triplicity, visualizing the symbols of a bull—a virgin—a goat—which stand for Kerubic earth—mutable earth—cardinal earth. For the above terms consult a simple astrology manual. Make notes of the ideas and pictures which arise in your mind.

5. Note from JMG: This is a canticle used in Christian worship, also known as the Song of Creation, in which all the works of creation are called upon to bless, praise, and sanctify God.
6. Note by Regardie: This is sometimes rendered Cholem Yesodoth, and translated “The Breaker of Foundations.” I am pretty certain that this is a mistake no doubt due to a printer’s error in reproducing “Ch” in place of “Gh,” the latter being intended for Ayin, according to some older systems of transliteration.

THEORICUS GRADE PAPERS

Third Knowledge Lecture

The soul is divided by the Qabalists into three principal parts:

1. Neschamah, the highest part, answering to the three supernals.
2. Ruach, the middle part, answering to the six Sephiroth from Chesed to Yesod inclusive.
3. Nephesch, the lowest, answering to Malkuth.

Neschamah answers to the higher aspirations of the soul. Ruach answers to the mind and reasoning powers. Nephesch answers to the animal instincts. Chiah answers to Chokmah, yechidah to Kether, while neschamah itself is referred to Binah.⁷

The Sepher Yetzirah divides the Hebrew letters into three classes of three, seven, and twelve.

Three mothers: ש : מ : נ

Seven double letters: ב ג ד כ פ ר ת

Twelve single letters: ה ו ז ח ט י ל נ ס ע צ ק

The Holy Place embraces the symbolism of the twenty-two letters. The table of shewbread, the single letters. The Altar of Incense, the three mothers.

Astral spirits are those belonging to the astral plane. Such are false and illusionary forms, shells of the dead, and ghosts and phantoms. Elemental spirits are those belonging to the nature of the elements; some are good and some are evil. An angel is a pure and high spirit of unmixed good in office and operation.

In the tarot, the ten small cards of each suit refer to the Sephiroth. The four suits refer to the letters of Tetragrammaton thus:

Sceptres or Wands to Yod

Cups—Heh

Swords—Vau

Pentacles—Heh (final)

The four suits also refer to the four worlds of the Qabalists thus:

Sceptres to Atziluth

Cups—Briah

Swords—Yetzirah

Pentacles—Assiah

The honours of the tarot pack are, as it were, the vice-gerents of the Great Name, in the Qabalistic world to which each suit is referred. They also symbolize father, mother, son, daughter, birth, life, death, and resurrection.

The seventeen squares out of a square of lesser squares, refer to the sun in the twelve signs of the zodiac and the four elements.

This form of the caduceus of Hermes is that of the three mother letters placed on one another thus:

Fylfot Cross

Mother Letters Caduceus

The caduceus has another meaning on the Tree of Life. The upper part wings touch Chokmah and Binah: These are the three supernals. The seven lower Sephiroth are embraced by the twin serpents whose heads rest upon Chesed and Geburah.

The meaning of Luna on the Tree of Life is thus: in its increase it embraces the side of mercy; in its decrease the side of severity; and at the full, it reflects the sun of Tiphareth.

Tree of Life Caduceus

Third Meditation

Let the Theoricus practice the moon breath, while saying mentally the word Aum. (Moon breath is through the left nostril only.)

Let him meditate upon the waxing and waning crescents, while visualizing a silver crescent upon an indigo background.

Let him now call before his mind the signs of the airy triplicity zgem, zlib, and zaqua and enclosed in these, let him meditate upon the numbers nine and five and therewith the forms of the pentagram and pentangle.

Let him now rise in imagination above the mineral world into the world of trees and flowers and identify himself in love and sympathy with the powers of the elements behind these.

Let him realize the mental world where mind rules over matter, and let him meditate upon the ideas of appearance and reality.

7. Note by JMG: That is, yechidah, chiah, and neschamah are the three highest parts of the soul; the term neschamah is also used for all three collectively.

 Puer Aries	 Puella Libra
 Amissio Taurus	 Rubeus Scorpio
 Albus Gemini	 Acquisitio Sagittarius
 Populus Cancer	 Carcer Capricorn
 Via Cancer	 Tristitia Aquarius
 Fortuna Major Leo	 Laetitia Pisces
 Fortuna Minor Leo	 Caput Draconis Dragon's Head

The numbers and lineal figures appropriate to the planets are:

Saturn	3	Triangle
Jupiter	4	Square
Mars	5	Pentagram
Sun	6	Hexagram
Venus	7	Heptagram
Mercury	8	Octagram
Moon	9	Enneagram

The magical squares of the planets are formed of the squares of the number of the planet, arranged so as to yield the same number each way. The number of the sum of each column of figures and the number of the total of all the numbers of the square, are also numbers especially attached to the planet. Thus the number of the planet Saturn is three, square nine, sum of all columns vertical, horizontal, and diagonal fifteen; total sum of all numbers, forty-five.

These numbers are then formed into divine and spirit names, as is demonstrated in that section of this book dealing with sigils.

The solid Greek Cubical Cross, the admission badge for the Path of Tau, is composed of twenty-two squares, answering to the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

Solid Greek Cubical Cross

The solid triangle or tetrahedron, or Pyramid of Fire, the admission badge for the Path of Shin, represents the simple fire of nature and the latent or hidden fire.

The three upper triangles refer to fire—solar, volcanic, and astral—while the lowest or basal triangle represents the latent heat.

Tetrahedron

The Greek Cross of Thirteen Squares, the admission badge for the Path of Resh, is referred to the sun in the twelve signs of the zodiac, and also in the midst of the four elements.

Greek Cross

The Cup of Stolistes, the admission badge to the grade of $3^{\text{ox}} = 8^{\text{hx}}$, is thus referred to the Tree of Life. It embraces nine of the Sephiroth, exclusive of Kether.

Yesod and Malkuth are referred to the triangle below, the former to the apex, the latter to the base. Like the caduceus, it further represents the three elements: water, fire, and air. The crescent refers to the waters above the firmament, the sphere to the firmament, and the basal triangle to the consuming fire, which is opposed to the fire symbolized by the upper part of the caduceus.

Cup of Stolistes

The symbol of ♀ury on the Tree of Life embraces all but Kether. The horns spring from Daath (Knowledge), which is not, properly speaking, a Sephirah, but rather a conjunction of Chokmah and Binah.

Fourth Meditation

Let the Practicus meditate upon the symbols of the rhomboid and the vesica. Let him seek out their meanings and correspondences. Let him contemplate the symbol of ♀ury and the number eight.

Let him now learn to control his emotions, on no account giving way to anger, hatred, or jealousy, but to turn the force he hitherto expended in these directions towards the attainment of perfection, that the malarial marsh of his nature may become a clear and limpid lake, reflecting the divine nature truly and without distortion.

Let him identity himself with the powers of water, considering the water triplicity in all its aspects, with its attributions and correspondences.

Notes on the Tarot

by Frater S.R.M.D.⁸

In the Tree of Life in the tarot, each Path forms the connecting link between two of the Sephiroth. The king and the queen are the correlations of the Abba and the Aima in that suit; the knight or prince answers to Microprosopus, and the knave or princess which was anciently a female figure, is referred to the bride, Kallah or Malkah.

Combining, then, the material attributions of the Sephiroth and the Paths, it results that:

0. Fool = The crown of wisdom, the primum mobile acting through the air on the zodiac.
1. The Juggler = The crown of understanding, the beginning of material production, the primum mobile acting through the philosophic ♃ on Saturn.
2. High Priestess = The crown of beauty, the beginning of sovereignty and beauty, the primum mobile acting through the moon on the sun.
3. Empress = The wisdom of understanding, the union of the powers of origination and production; the sphere of the zodiac acting through Venus upon Saturn.
4. Emperor = The wisdom of sovereignty and beauty, and the originator of them; the sphere of the zodiac acting through Aries upon the sun and initiating spring.
5. Hierophant = The wisdom and fountain of ♃; the sphere of the zodiac acting through Taurus upon Jupiter.
6. The Lovers = The understanding of beauty and production of beauty and sovereignty. Saturn acting through Gemini upon Sol.
7. Chariot = Understanding acting upon severity. Saturn acting through Cancer upon Mars.
8. Strength = Fortitude. ♃ tempering severity. The glory of strength. Jupiter acting through Leo upon Mars.
9. Hermit = The ♃ of beauty, the magnificence of sovereignty, Jupiter acting through Virgo upon Sol.
10. Wheel of Fortune = The ♃ and magnificence of victory. Jupiter acting through Jupiter directly upon Venus.
11. Justice = The severity of beauty and sovereignty. Mars acting through Libra upon Sol.

12. The Hanged Man = The severity of splendour. Execution of judgment. Mars acting through water upon ♄ury.
13. Death = The sovereignty and result of victory. Sol acting through Scorpio upon Venus, or Osiris under the destroying power of Typhon afflicting Isis.
14. Temperance = The beauty of a firm basis. The sovereignty of fundamental power. Sol acting through Sagittarius upon Luna.
15. The Devil = The sovereignty and beauty of material (and therefore false) splendour. Sol acting through Capricorn upon ♄ury.
16. The Tower = The victory over splendour. Venus acting through Mars upon ♄ury. Avenging force.
17. Star = The victory of fundamental strength. Venus acting through Aquarius upon Luna. Hope.
18. Moon = The victory of the material. Venus acting through Pisces upon the cosmic elements, deceptive effect of the apparent power of material forces.
19. Sun = The splendour of fundamental strength.⁹ ♄ury acting through the sun upon the moon.
20. Judgment = The splendour of the material world. ♄ury acting through fire upon the cosmic elements.
21. Universe = The foundation of the cosmic elements and of the material world. Luna acting through Saturn upon the elements.

The Garden of Eden Before the Fall

This diagram is described in the Practicus Ritual. It shows in a glyph the teaching proper to the Practicus on entering the Sephirah Hod which he has reached by the Paths of Shin and Resh from Malkuth and Yesod respectively.

At the summit are the three supernal Sephiroth summed up into one—Aima Elohim, the Mother Supernal—the woman of the Apocalypse ¹⁰ (Chap. 12) clothed with the sun, the moon under her feet, and on her head the crown of twelve stars.

It is written “So the name Jehovah is joined to the name Elohim, for Jehovah planted a garden eastward in Eden.” ¹¹

From the three supernals follow the other Sephiroth of the Tree of Life. Below the Tree, proceeding from Malkuth, is the Tree of Knowledge of Good and of Evil which is between the Tree of Life and the world of Assiah or shells, represented by the coiled up dragon with seven heads and ten horns—being the seven infernal palaces and the ten averse Sephiroth.¹²

The River Naher flows forth from the supernal Eden and in Daath it is divided into four heads:

Pison: Fire—flowing to Geburah where there is gold.

Gihon: Water—the waters of Oy , flowing into Chesed.

Hiddikel: Air—flowing into Tiphareth.

Phrath (Euphrates): Earth—flowing into Malkuth.

It is written: “In Daath the depths are broken up and the clouds drop down dew.” ¹³

The word Naher has the meaning “perennial stream”—“never failing waters” as opposed to other words meaning torrent or brook.

The river going out of Eden is the river of the Apocalypse, the waters of life, clear as crystal proceeding from the throne, on either side of the Tree of Life, bearing all manner of fruit.¹⁴

Thus the rivers form a cross and on it the great Adam, the son who is to rule the nations, was extended from Tiphareth and his arms stretch out to Geburah and Gedulah, and in Malkuth is Eve, supporting with her hands the two pillars.

On the General Guidance and Purification of the Soul

Learn first, O Practicus of our ancient Order, that true equilibrium is the basis of the soul. If thou thyself hast not a sure foundation, whereon wilt thou stand to direct the forces of nature?

Know then that as man is born into this world amidst the darkness of nature and the strife of contending forces, so must his first endeavour be to seek the light through their reconciliation. Thus, thou who hast trial and trouble of this life, rejoice because of them, for in them is strength, and by their means is a pathway opened unto that light divine.

How should it be otherwise, O man, whose life is but a day in eternity, a drop in the ocean of time? How, if thy trials were not many, couldst thou purge thy soul from the dross of earth?

Is it but now that the higher life is beset with dangers and difficulties; hath it not been ever thus with the sages and hierophants of the past? They have been persecuted and reviled, they have been tormented of men, yet through this has their glory increased. Rejoice, therefore, O initiate, for the greater thy trial, the brighter thy triumph. When men shall revile thee and speak against thee falsely, hath not the Master said “Blessed art thou.”¹⁵ Yet, O Practicus, let thy victories bring thee not vanity, for with increase of knowledge should come increase of wisdom. He who knows little, thinketh he knows much; but he who knoweth much hath learned his own ignorance. Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? There is more hope of a fool than of him.

Be not hasty to condemn another’s sin. How knowest thou that in their place thou couldst have resisted the temptation? And even were it so, why shouldst thou despise one who is weaker than thyself? Be thou well sure of this, that in slander and self-righteousness is sin. Pardon therefore the sinner, but encourage not the sin. The Master condemned not the adulterous woman, but neither did he encourage her to commit the sin.¹⁶

Thou therefore who desirest magical gifts, be sure that thy soul is firm and steadfast, for it is by flattering thy weakness that the evil one will gain power over thee. Humble thyself before thy God, yet fear neither man nor spirit. Fear is failure and the forerunner of failure; and courage is the beginning of virtue. Therefore fear not the spirits, but be firm and courteous with them, for thou hast no right either to despise or to revile them, and this too may lead thee into sin. Command and banish the evil ones. Curse them by the great names of God, if need be; but neither mock nor revile them, for so assuredly thou wilt be led into error.

A man is what he maketh himself within the limits fixed by his inherited destiny; he is a part of mankind. His actions affect not himself only, but also those with whom he is brought into contact, either for good or for evil.

Neither worship nor neglect the physical body, which is thy temporary connection with the outer and material world. Therefore let thy mental equilibrium be above disturbances by material events. Restrain the animal passions and nourish the higher aspirations; the emotions are purified by suffering.

Do good unto others for God's sake, not for reward, not for gratitude from them, not for sympathy. If thou art generous, thou wilt not long for thine ears to be tickled by expressions of gratitude. Remember that unbalanced force is evil, that unbalanced severity is but cruelty and oppression, but that also unbalanced softness is but weakness which would allow and abet evil.

True prayer is as much action as word; it is will. The gods will not do for man what his higher powers can do for himself if he cultivates will and wisdom. Remember that this Earth is but an atom in the universe, and thou thyself but an atom thereon. And that even couldst thou become the god of this Earth whereon thou crawlest and grovellest, thou wouldst even then be but an atom and one among many. Nevertheless, have the greatest self-respect, and to that end sin not against thyself. The sin which is unpardonable is knowingly and willfully to reject spiritual truth, but every sin and act leaveth its effect.

To obtain magical power, learn to control thought. Admit only true ideas which are in harmony with the end desired, and not every stray and contradictory idea that presents itself. Fixed thought is a means to an end; therefore pay attention to the power of silent thought and meditation. The material act is but the outward expression of the thought, and therefore it hath been said that "the thought of foolishness is sin."¹⁷ Thought therefore is the commencement of action, and if a chance thought can produce much effect, what cannot fixed thought do? Therefore, as has been already said, establish thyself firmly in the equilibrium of forces, in the centre of the cross of the elements, that cross from whose centre the creative word issued in the birth of the dawning universe.

As it was said unto thee in the grade of Theoricus: “Be thou therefore prompt and active as the sylphs, but avoid frivolity and caprice. Be energetic and strong like the salamanders, but avoid irritability and ferocity. Be flexible and attentive to images like the undines, but avoid idleness and changeability. Be laborious and patient like the gnomes, but avoid grossness and avarice.” So shalt thou gradually develop the powers of thy soul and fit thyself to command the spirits of the elements.

For wert thou to summon the gnomes to pander to thy avarice, thou wouldst no longer command them, but they would command thee. Wouldst thou abuse the pure creatures of God’s creation to fill thy coffers and to satisfy thy lust for gold? Wouldst thou defile the spirits of driving fire to serve thy wrath and hatred? Wouldst thou violate the purity of the souls of the water to pander to thy lust and debauchery? Wouldst thou force the spirits of the evening breeze to minister to thy folly and caprice?

Know that with such desires thou canst but attract the evil and not the good, and in that can the evil will have power over thee.

In true religion there is no sect. Therefore take heed that thou blaspheme not the name by which another knoweth his god for if thou doest this thing in Jupiter, thou wilt blaspheme YHVH; and in Osiris Yeheshuah.

“Ask of God and ye shall have,

Seek and ye shall find.

Knock, and it shall be opened unto you.” ¹⁸

PHILOSOPHUS GRADE PAPERS

Fifth Knowledge Lecture

Azoth is a word formed from the initial and final letters of the Greek, Latin, and Hebrew alphabets thus: A and Z, Aleph and Tau, Alpha and Omega. It is used with various meanings by different writers but generally signifies “essence.”

The following names occur in Qabalistic writings:

Ain—the Negative	אין	(Nothing—Not)
Ain Soph	אין סוף	(Limitless)
Ain Soph Aur	אין סוף אור	(The Limitless Light)

These are the Veils of the Negative Existence depending from Kether.

Arik Anpin אריך אנפין—Macroprosopus or the Vast Countenance is a title of Kether, and another of its titles is the Ancient of Days, Aatik Yomin עתיך יומין

Kether or the Vast Countenance emanates first as Abba, the supernal father, and Aima, the supernal mother.

Abba אבא the supernal father is referred to Yod of Tetragrammaton, and Aima אימא the supernal mother is referred to Heh. Elohim אלהים is a name given to these two persons united.

As Elohim they become the parents of the son, Zauir Anpin זאיר אנפין, also called Microprosopus or the Lesser Countenance.

Abba is referred to Yod and the Sephira Chokmah. Aima is referred to Heh and the Sephirah Binah. Zauir Anpin is referred to the six Sephiroth—Chesed, Geburah, Tiphareth, Netzach, Hod, and Yesod, and of these especially to Tiphareth.

Malkah מלכה the Queen and Kallah כלה the Bride are titles of Malkuth considered as the spouse of Zauir Anpin, the Microprosopus. The letters of the Name YHVH contain these meanings, thus: Yod is referred to Abba. Heh to Aima. Vau to Zauir Anpin. Heh (final) to Malkah.

These letters are also referred to the four worlds and the four suits of the tarot thus:

Yod	Atziluth	Wands
Heh	Briah	Cups
Vau	Yetzirah	Swords
Heh (f)	Assiah	Pentacles

Tetragrammaton on the Tree

In each of the four worlds are the ten Sephiroth of that world, and each Sephirah has its own ten Sephiroth, making 400 Sephiroth in all—the number of the letter Tau, the cross, the universe, the completion of all things.

The tarot is thus referred to the Tree of Life:

The four aces are placed on the throne of Kether—the remaining small cards of the suit desired on the respective Sephiroth, two on Chokmah, three on Binah, etc. The twenty-two trumps are then arranged on the Paths between them, according to the letters to which they correspond.

The king and queen of the suit are placed beside Chokmah and Binah respectively; the knight and knave by Tiphareth and Malkuth.

The tarot trumps thus receive the equilibrium of the Sephiroth they connect.

The admission badges used in the grade of Philosophus are as follows:

Calvary Cross of Twelve Squares

The Calvary Cross of twelve squares, admitting to the Path of Qoph, the twenty-ninth Path, refers to the zodiac and to the eternal river of Eden divided into four heads:

Naher, the River

נהר

1. Hiddikel

הדקל

2. Pison

פישון

3. Gihon

גיהון

4. Phrath

פרת

Pyramid of the Four Elements

The pyramid of the four elements admits to the Path of Tzaddi, the twenty-eighth Path.

On the sides are the Hebrew names of the elements. On the apex is the word Eth—Essence—and on the base the word Olam meaning “World.”

Calvary Cross of Ten Squares

The Calvary Cross of ten squares admits to the Path of Peh, Mars—the twenty-seventh Path. The ten squares are referred to the ten Sephiroth in balanced disposition. It is also the opened out form of the double cube of the Altar of Incense.

Hegemon's Badge

The cross of the Hegemon's badge admits to the Grade of Philosophus. This cross embraces Tiphareth, Netzach, Hod, and Yesod, and rests upon Malkuth. The Calvary Cross of six squares also refers to the six Sephiroth of Microprosopus and is the opened out form of the cube.

Venus on the Tree of Life

The symbol of Venus on the Tree of Life embraces the whole ten Sephiroth. It is a fitting emblem of the Isis of nature. As it contains all the Sephiroth its circle should be made larger than that of Mercury.

Names especially connected with the four elements:

Fifth Meditation

Let the Philosophus meditate upon the symbol of the fire triangle in all its aspects.

Let him contemplate the symbol of the planet Venus until he realizes the universal love which would express itself in perfect service to all mankind and which embraces nature both visible and invisible.

Let him identify himself with the powers of fire, consecrating himself wholly until the burnt sacrifice is consummated and the Christ is conceived by the spirit.

Let him meditate upon the triplicity of fire—its attributes and correspondences.

The Diagrams

As confusion is found to exist with regard to the right and left pillars of the Sephiroth on the Tree of Life in relation to the right and left sides of a man, and as to the phases of the moon—you must note:

That in every diagram and picture, the right hand side of the observer is next to the Pillar of Mercy—Chokmah, Chesed, and Netzach—while the Pillar of Severity is on the observer's left hand. Yet when you apply the Tree of Life to yourself, your right side, arm, and leg represent the side of strength and severity, Binah, Geburah, and Hod, and your left side refers to the Pillar of Mercy. So that when you look at a diagram, you are looking, as it were, at a man facing you, that your right side faces his left. His merciful side forms the right hand pillar in front of you, so that it is as if you looked at yourself in a mirror.

Just as the man looks at you, so does the moon look at you and so you say that the moon in her increase is on the side of mercy, the right hand pillar of the Sephiroth; and in her decrease, the crescent is on the left hand Pillar of Severity.

A diagram, then, is a picture of a man or the moon facing you. The temple pillars are similar:

Black Pillar	Severity	Left	North
White Pillar	Mercy	Right	South
Black Pillar	Boaz	Stolistes
White Pillar	Jachin	Dadouchos

That is, the white mercy or Jachin Pillar is on your right hand as you approach the altar from the west and from the Hiereus. (See 2 Chronicles 3:17.) “And call the name on the right hand (of him who enters) Jachin, and the name of that on the left, Boaz.”

Now Boaz = strength, severity, Binah, black pillar, and Jachin = white pillar of mercy.

So in making the Qabalistic cross on your breast it is correct to touch the forehead and say Ateh—Thou art; the Heart—Malkuth; Right Shoulder, ve-Geburah; left shoulder ve-Gedulah, and with the fingers clasped on the breast say, Le, olam, Amen!

The Garden of Eden After the Fall

This diagram is described in the Philosophus Ritual. It shows in a glyph the teaching proper to a Philosophus on entering the Sephirah Netzach which he has reached by the three Paths of Qoph, Tzaddi, and Peh from the Sephiroth Malkuth, Yesod, and Hod respectively.

The great goddess Eve, being tempted by the fruits of the Tree of Knowledge whose branches tend upwards to the seven lower Sephiroth, but also downward to the kingdom of shells, reached down to them and the two pillars were left unsupported.

Then the Sephirotic Tree was shattered. She fell and with her fell the great Adam. And the great red dragon arose with his seven heads and ten horns, and Eden was desolated—and the folds of the dragon enclosed Malkuth and linked it to the kingdom of the shells.

And the heads of the dragon rose into the seven lower Sephiroth, even up to Daath at the feet of Aima Elohim.

Thus were the four rivers of Eden desecrated and the dragon mouth gave forth the infernal waters in Daath—and this is Leviathan, the piercing and crooked serpent.

But Tetragrammaton Elohim placed the four letters YHVH of the name and the flaming sword of the ten Sephiroth between the devastated garden and the supernal Eden, that this should not be involved in the fall of Adam.

And it became necessary that a second Adam should arise to restore the system, and thus, as Adam had been spread on the cross of the four rivers, so the second Adam should be crucified on the infernal rivers of the four armed cross of death—yet to do this he must descend into the lowest, even Malkuth the earth, and be born of her. (Psalm 74: “Thou breakest the heads of Leviathan in pieces.”)

And on the dragon heads were the names of the eight kings of Edom and on his horns the names of the eleven dukes of Edom, for Daath having developed in the dragon a new head, the seven-headed dragon with ten horns became eight headed and eleven horned. (Genesis, 36:31–43, Chronicles 1: 43–54.)

Note: The Edomites were the descendants of Esau who sold his birthright. Their kings came to symbolize unlawful and chaotic forces.

The Seven Palaces Attributed to the Ten Sephiroth

The Astrological Symbols of the Planets

These are derived from the three primary forms of the cross, the crescent, and the circle, either singly or in combination.

The circle denotes sun and gold; the crescent the moon and silver, respectively analogous to the red and white alchemical natures.

The cross is the symbol of corrosion. The corrosion of metals is usually of the complementary colour to that to which they naturally approximate. Thus copper, which is reddish, becomes green in its corrosion of verdigris, etc.

Mercury is the only planet which unites these three primary forms in one symbol. Saturn is composed of the cross and the crescent showing that lead is corrosive internally and Luna externally. Jupiter is the reverse. Mars is solar internally but corrosive externally.

Venus is opposite. Copper is externally of the nature of gold, but internally corrosive. Hence the name of the sphere of Venus is Nogah—denoting external splendour but internal corruption.

The Serpent Nehushtan, which Moses made when the children of Israel were bitten by serpents of fire in the wilderness, is the serpent of the Paths of the Tree. And he set it on a pole—that is, twined it round the middle pillar of the Sephiroth. And the word used in the passage in Numbers 21 for fiery serpents is the same as the name of the angels of Geburah, the same spelling, the same pointing, Seraphim. Round the Middle Pillar of the Sephiroth, because that is the reconciler between the fires of Geburah or Severity, and the waters of Chesed or ♀y—and hence it is said in the New Testament that it is a type of Christ, the Reconciler. And the serpent is of brass, the metal of Venus, whose sphere is called Nogah, or external splendour, as shewn further by the alchemical symbol of Venus, wherein the circle of the sun is exalted above the cross of corrosion. And therefore it is said in the Zohar that “alone of the shells is the serpent Nogah found in holiness” and he is called the balance of justice. Why, then, is he called the external or false splendour? Because he indeed uniteth the Paths, but comprehendeth not the Sephiroth. Nevertheless, he is also the celestial serpent of wisdom. But the serpent of the temptation is the serpent of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and of Evil, and not that of the Tree of Life.

Here is a method of writing Hebrew words by the Yetziratic attribution of the alphabet, whence results some curious hieroglyphic symbolism. Thus Tetragrammaton will be written by Virgo, Aries, Taurus, Aries. Eheieh, by air, Aries, Virgo, Aries. From Yeheshua, the Qabalistic mode of spelling Jesus, which is simply the Tetragrammaton with the letter Shin placed therein, we obtain a very peculiar combination—Virgo, Aries, fire, Taurus, Aries. Virgo born of a virgin, Aries the sacrificial lamb, fire the fire of the Holy Spirit, Taurus the ox of the earth in whose manger He was laid, and lastly Aries the flocks of sheep whose herdsmen came to worship Him. Elohim yields air, Libra, Aries, Virgo, water—the firmament, the balanced forces, the fire of the spirit (for Aries is a fiery sign), operating in the zodiac, the fire goddess, and the waters of Creation.

The terms Raven or Crow, Lion, and Eagle have various alchemical significations. Generally:

Raven—Initiation through blackness

Lion—Heat and sulphurous action

Eagle—Sublimation

One great difference between chemical and alchemical processes is that alchemy only employs a gradual heat continually but carefully increased, and does not commence with violent heat.

The cucurbite is a glass boiler attached to the lower part of the alembic. It consists of a tube, a head, and a receiver added thereto for purposes of distillation.

The athanor or philosophical furnace is to produce a graduated heat.

The balneum mariae is the modern water bath—a vessel of hot water in which was placed the vessel to be heated.

The balneum arenae or sand bath is a vessel of sand in which is placed the vessel to receive a dry heat.

The philosophic egg is an oval glass vessel in which is placed the water or liquid to be acted upon, and which may be hermetically sealed.

Sulphur on the Tree of Life

This represents the alchemical symbol of sulphur on the Tree of Life. It does not touch the four lower Sephiroth. The cross terminates in Tiphareth, whereby, as it were, the supernal triangle is to be grasped, and Tiphareth is the purified man.

The hexagram of Tiphareth is formed from the pillars on each side. In Chesed is the water triangle, in Geburah the fire triangle, and Tiphareth unites and reconciles them so as to form a reconciliation between them in the form of the hexagram.

Salt on the Tree of Life

The symbol of salt on the Tree of Life embraces all the Sephiroth but Malkuth, and is, as it were, the reconciler between the sulphur and Mercury. The horizontal dividing line implies the precept of Hermes, “as above so below.”

19. Note by Regardie: The following items and attributions are those which were formerly eliminated from the so-called knowledge lectures and rituals. They have been assembled here and added as an appendix since this was assumed to be more satisfactory than inserting them once again into the knowledge lectures.

20. Note by Regardie: The following angelic names have been assembled and tabulated systematically from a Philosophus manuscript entitled "The Lecture on the Shemhamphoresch." This document deals principally with the traditional modes of forming angelic names. It describes how various verses are taken from the book of Exodus, and by methods of permutation, are formed into seventy-two names of three letters each. To each of these names is added the suffix Yah or El, thus yielding angelic names and formulae. These seventy-two angels are allotted to each quinary, or division of 5°, in the celestial heavens, so that with the other names a very complete hierarchy is given. Thus every sign of the zodiac has an archangel, angel, angel of its corresponding house, and a vast sub-hierarchy.

Too much space would have been consumed to detail the methods by which these names are given. So I have contented myself to list, simply, all the archangelic and angelic names of the twelve zodiacal signs, and state that they are very important names, and their arrangement should be carefully studied. The documents on tarot attribute two of these angels to each of the thirty-six small cards, and the Anglicized transliteration of their names will there be found. But I have thought it advisable here to give the Hebrew letters and spelling so that the student may have them at his hand when dealing with the matters of sigils and telematic images, which are, as elsewhere explained, formed from the Hebrew spellings.

PORTAL GRADE PAPERS

On the Work to Be Undertaken between Portal and $5^{\circ} = 6^{\square}$

The work comes under six headings as follows:

1. A thesis on the rituals.
2. A meditation on the crosses which have been used as admission badges in the grades. This is a preparation for the meditation which precedes the $5^{\circ} = 6^{\square}$ grade and should be applied for when you have been a Portal member for seven months.
3. A complete diagram of the Tree of Life.
4. The practice of control of the aura.
5. The placing of the Tree of Life in the aura.
6. Tattwas—astrology—divination.

1. The Thesis. Read the rituals. Build them up in imagination. Compare the opening and closing in the various grades. Note the general underlying scheme for each elemental grade—and note where the differences occur. Follow the careers of the various officers. Note at what grade an officer disappears.

Make a precis of each ritual so that the general scheme becomes apparent. This is of the greatest assistance when you are called on to take office because you will not then need to follow everything in the ritual but need only turn to the page where your office is mentioned and when you have no more to say, you can turn to the closing and put the ritual aside till required for that. Ability to do this and to move correctly in the temple adds greatly to the harmony and repose of the whole ceremony.

Note the positions of the various officers—what mathematical shapes they make among themselves from time to time as they take up their places in the temple. It may be a triangle, a cross, a pentagram, etc.

Read the speeches carefully, and read them sometimes aloud so that you get familiar with the sound of your own voice in saying the words. Note that some speeches are designed to create atmosphere by their archaic form and should be read rhythmically and sonorously, while others are informative and should be read in such a way as to make their points clear.

Examples of archaic passages are challenges of gods: “Thou canst not pass the gate of the western heaven unless thou canst tell me my name.” And the speeches of the Kabiri in the grades of Practicus and Philosophus. Information is given in speeches about tarot keys and diagrams.

Note the technique for traversing the various Paths—the words and the badges with which the Path is entered, the length of the circumambulation and the special symbolism described therein.

Let all these things soak into your mind, make notes as ideas occur to you—and presently your personal reaction to the grades will crystallize out and you will be able to write your thesis.

2. Make a list and drawings of the crosses which have been given you as admission badges throughout the grades, from the swastika of the Zelator to the five-squared cross which you put on as you stood at the altar at the second point of the Portal grade. Read what is said of them in the rituals and knowledge lectures, and make notes about them.

3. The Tree of Life. This should be done fairly large in order that the writing and symbols should be clear. It is essential to show the deity names, names of archangels and angels in Hebrew in the Sephiroth, and to number the Paths and give their attributions. Apart from this, the Tree should be your personal synthesis of the Order symbolism as it applies to the Tree of Life. Colours may be used.

4. Control of the Aura. If you are not already familiar with the parts of your own body such as nervous system, respiratory system, digestive system, get some simple textbook such as is used in ambulance work, or attend a course of first-aid lectures so that, before starting to work on your subtle body, you may know something about your physical body.

Your physical body is interpenetrated by a subtle body or aura which also surrounds the physical body like an egg of light. You should now begin to practice controlling this aura or sphere of sensation. This means that you must first try to get your emotional reactions under conscious control. Instead of automatically liking this, disliking that, you must try to understand the mechanism which underlies these feelings. To assist you in this, the study of psychology is recommended. There are many books on the subject, of which the following are easy to understand and clearly stated.

Psychology by Wm. McDougall (Home University Library).

Psychoanalysis for Normal People by Geraldine Coster.

Psycho-Synthesis by the Dean of Chester Cathedral.

Machinery of the Mind by Violet Firth.²¹

Having built up some idea of the mechanism of your mental processes, you should now try to make yourself negative or positive at will towards people or ideas. If you are likely to meet someone who always makes you argumentative and irritable, decide that your aura is dosed to their power of irritating you and that your mind will not be disturbed by what they say. It is good sometimes to listen to views with which you disagree to teach you not only to make no verbal response, but to keep your feelings in abeyance also. In this way you come to learn how much of your disagreement is due to prejudice or personal factors, and how much to your regard for abstract truth.

Again, sometimes practice opening your aura to people or ideas in an endeavour to see things from another's point of view.

The practice of deep breathing is also of help in establishing poise and in controlling nervousness. It is good to expand the chest to its fullest extent and then to expand the diaphragm below the ribs as well and then to let the breath out slowly and steadily on a vowel sound such as "ah" or "O."

If you are nervy, you will find that your breathing is shallow and that your muscles are tense. You tend to clench your hands and tighten up the abdominal muscles. To cure this, take a deep breath to full capacity, hold it while tensing and relaxing alternately the abdominal muscles. Do this (i.e., the tensing and relaxing of the muscles) three times and then relax completely into a chair. Allow all your muscles to go limp and let your breath out to the last gasp. Do the whole process three times, if necessary. It is designed to stimulate the solar plexus which is the heart of the nervous system which governs emotion.

Another good exercise is to say the deity names aloud. Take a deep breath and say them softly, smoothly, and slowly, imagining the while that your voice travels out to the confines of the universe. This can be done in conjunction with the pentagram ritual.

5. The Tree of Life in the Aura. In the aura which interpenetrates and surrounds our physical bodies, we are to build up a replica of the Tree of Life. The Pillar of Severity is on our right side, the Pillar of ♀y on our left, and the Pillar of Beneficence in our midst.

It is best to build up the Middle Pillar first. To do this stand up and raise yourself in imagination to your Kether—a brilliant light above your head. Imagine this light descending to Daath, at the nape of your neck, and thence to Tiphareth in your heart where it glows like sunlight and whence it radiates into the other Sephiroth. From Tiphareth the light goes to Yesod in the region of the hips, and thence to Malkuth in which your feet are planted. Having made a clear image of the Middle Pillar, you can then establish the other Sephiroth by vibrating the deity names. This can be done as an alternative to the pentagram ritual as a preparation for meditation.

The Middle Pillar and the Human Body

1. Imagine yourself standing in the temple, facing west. The black Pillar of Severity will be on your right—the white Pillar of Mercy on your left. You will make the Middle Pillar as you stand between them.

2. Imagine now that the black pillar is reflected in your right side—the white pillar in your left.

3. Take a deep breath and raise your consciousness to your Kether above your head and vibrate the name Eheieh—which means “I am.” Imagine the light flowing down through Daath (at the nape of your neck) to Tiphareth.

4. In the same manner, establish Yesod in the name Shaddai El Chai, and Malkuth in the name Adonai ha-Aretz.

5. Make the Qabalistic cross to indicate that you have called down the light of your Kether and balanced it in your aura. Then let your imagination dwell on the aura and see it oval and clear, pulsing with the glow from Tiphareth.

If you are called to see anyone who is ill, who is depressed, or who has a depressing effect on you, you should do this exercise beforehand. In the case of the person who has a depressing effect on you, you may also imagine that your aura is hardened at the edge so that they are unable to penetrate it, and so deplete you of vitality (which is generally what such sensations mean).

In all these practices it is well to remember that “strength is in silence.” If you talk about them, save to your Chief, or if you try to analyse their effects, you will not benefit by them. Try them with simple faith and in silence for a year before rationalizing them.

It is better at first to keep your aura to yourself, rather than to try to flow out towards others. Unless you are particularly vital and well balanced, you will only waste energy. So-called modes of healing and of “doing good to others” should be eschewed for a time. Such methods have a technique of their own and require trained and balanced minds and bodies to carry them out. Get yourself right first before you attempt to interfere with others in any way but the ordinary ways of kindly decent society.

When you have practiced the exercise of the Middle Pillar for some time and can visualize it easily, you can establish the other Sephiroth.²²

6. Tattwas—Astrology—Divination. The tattwas are designed to assist you in your researches into the soul of nature. They are at first done with a senior member, and later can be done alone or with a companion of your own grade. They should never be allowed to become uncontrolled daydreams. The method taught should be strictly adhered to—a definite time, preferably in the morning, being set aside—and they should not be attempted when you are feeling tired or when your mind is too occupied with other things to let you “get away.” They should not be done too frequently—once in three weeks or a month is enough, once a week if time and circumstances permit. Notes of the pictures and symbols seen should be kept together in a book.

Astrology. This should be done as time permits. The subject is vast and highly technical and can be studied fully through the various schools and correspondence classes if you are interested in it. From the Order lectures you should be able to set up a true birth horoscope for any place and any time. You can practice setting up horoscopes for the cases given in Alan Leo’s little book 1001 Notable Nativities and see whether you can tell for what the horoscope was remarkable. You should attempt the reading of a horoscope for someone you know and then get the data for someone about whom you know nothing, and see whether you can give a reading which satisfies their friends.

The Order requires only that you should be able to set up an accurate horoscope and that you should know how to work out the aspects and how to make a simple assessment of the good and bad factors in a horary figure. If astrology interests you further, it is a very fascinating field of research.

Divination. You may try to develop your intuition by the use of horary and natal astrology, geomancy, and the reading of the tarot cards by the method given in the small book by Mr. A.E. Waite.

You are advised to attempt only questions in which you are not emotionally involved because methods of divination can be a fruitful source of self-deception to those who are psychic but not self-knowing. If you are given to having intuitions you must learn to say not only “I was right about that” but also “I was quite wrong about that,” and if you advertise only successes (as is usual) at the bar of your own conscience, learn to assess them honestly.

The interval of time between Portal and $5^{\circ} = 6^{\square}$ should be given to the study of the whole makeup of yourself. All these methods are designed to assist you to get as far as you can along the road to self-knowledge.

You are to realize the different layers of your being—some of which you have been led through symbolically in the outer grades—“which in one sense quitteth not Malkuth”—the kingdom of yourself.

This line of thought, coupled with the study of the rituals, may lead you to realize what it was you gathered together in the first point of the Portal ritual, and what it is you are trying to perfect to lay on the altar of the spirit.

We are told in the Portal that the nine months' wait which must intervene before the Portal is again opened for the aspirant has a correspondence to the nine months of gestation before birth. As the unborn child, stage by stage, grows through the ancestral history of the race so the candidate in the Portal by a single circumambulation for each, recalls his past grades and, at the end of the first point, regards their symbols upon the altar as parts of his body and contemplates them as coming together in one place—the unity of his person.

In the second point, he sacrifices his name—symbol of his idea of himself in order that the idea of a new self and a new consciousness may be attained.

This has a correspondence in the birth of a child. It emerges from the membranes and placenta which hitherto have been its body and source of life and finds itself not “dead” after the dread change, but translated to a larger consciousness.

Thus the Portal foreshadows the kind of change and development necessary for understanding the symbolism of the $5^{\circ} = 6^{\circ}$.

We do not know what consciousness the unborn child has—how far it has choice in its development—through what agency it unfolds the potencies of its tiny seed and draws to itself the necessary materials for growth. The miracle happens—and gives us courage to believe that a similar miracle is even now enacting whereby a body will be ready for us when this, which seems so real to us, shall share the same fate as the placenta and membranes which “die” at our birth.

But tradition, as embodied in our Order and shown somewhat less directly in the revealed religions, teaches that this development can be assisted by conscious effort—indeed, that there comes a time when this effort must be made through the body and mind we are now endowed with. And realizing that we are indeed in a path of darkness groping for light, we must feel our way to an understanding of the meaning of life—the reason for death.

To those who feel the call to make this effort, comes the order with a series of pictures, symbolic of the growth of the soul to new life. The meditations given with each grade are designed to lead the mind towards ideas which will assist in self-knowledge—universal impersonal ideas which each must find in his own way—“the secrets which cannot be told save to those who know them already.”

The aspirant is led to look backwards. First he must acknowledge his debt to evolution through which has been perfected the instrument wherein his mind works and gathers material. Then, through meditation, he is led to see himself as not only self-conscious—as one who receives impressions—one who criticizes and watches—one whose will is interfered with—one who is misunderstood—one to whom others are “persons” or masks (from Latin persona, a mask)—but, standing outside himself, he now becomes one who endeavours to sense how his mask appears to others—sees himself as part of the consciousness of others, as one who impresses, one who is criticized and watched, one who interferes with the will of others, one who misunderstands.

He may recall periods in his life when his convictions were sure, his judgments harsh and unjust, his actions shameful, and view himself in that picture dispassionately as an entity operative in the give and take of life, something growing and as outside the category of blame as is the bitterness of unripe fruit.

As the knowledge of his place and relative importance in the universe matures, he will attain strength to be honest with himself—ashamed of nothing he finds in his mind—one watching the antics of his personality with tolerant amusement—yet always learning.

He will reflect on words and the power of words. He will catch himself weaving them—twisting their meaning—deceiving himself and others with them. He will catch himself under obsession to them—he will see how they fix and make possible the recall of events and emotions, and with this knowledge he will become aware of how his words affect other people.

As he begins to realize the tremendous miracle of words, the magic both good and evil of human communion by words, he will begin to grasp why the Order reiterates the importance of silence. The true magician must understand his tools and, in periods of silence, he must contemplate words as one of them.

As he thus traverses the long road to dispassionate self-knowledge, and no longer has to waste energy in doing battle for and indulging wounded feelings in defense of a totally false idea of himself, he is led to meditate on the varied symbols of the cross, and from this to contemplate the Crucified One, revealed to the west as Jesus of Nazareth.

This life and the sayings of Jesus given in the meditation should be studied and pictured in the mind.

The mind must be taught to die to useless churnings over past things and vain apprehensions about future things. This is difficult, for human phantasies die hard, but once the effort is made, however transient the result, it becomes easier with time to replace wasteful thoughts with those that cluster round a powerful symbol of eternal truth.

As the time for the 5° = 6° ceremony approaches, the aspirant should withdraw as far as may be from externals that these symbols may work in his mind.

He will find them waiting on the threshold of his mind ready to tell their story as he walks about or is occupied in mechanical tasks. Once a place has been made for them no “time” is required to develop them. They grow in the waste places.

Definite times, too, should be set aside for meditation wherein ideas may be formulated as far as possible.

Before going to sleep, the aspirant should do the pentagram ritual and impress on his mind that he must recall on waking any teaching that has been given him in dream or vision. This may be assisted, if on waking, he calls before his mind the sun rising, thinly veiled in clouds.

This should be done at least the week preceding the grade.

The ceremony will be a true initiation for the aspirant only in so far as he has prepared himself to receive it.

Like a word, it is a symbol, the communication of whose essence depends on the understanding and experience of the recipient.

Portal Meditation

Let the aspirant meditate upon the cross in its various forms and aspects as shown in the admission badges throughout the grades. Let him consider the necessity and prevalence of sacrifice throughout nature and religion.

Let him realize the saying of the Master: “Whosoever shall save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his life shall save it.”²³

“Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.”²⁴

Let him endeavour to realize his own place and relative importance in the universe, striving to stand outside himself and allowing only such claims as he would allow to another.

Let him carefully abstain from talking of himself, his feelings, or experiences that he may gain continence of speech, and learn to control the wasteful activities of his mind.

Let him contemplate the sun as thinly veiled in clouds.

21. Note by JMG: Firth is better known by her occult pen name Dion Fortune. Trained as a lay Freudian therapist, she wrote several books on psychology under her legal name.
22. Note by Regardie: The reader or student who is interested particularly in this subject of the sphere of sensation, or aura as it is called, would be well advised to study very carefully the Order tarot teaching. There is much in that set of documents which concerns the application of the ideology of the Qabalistic Tree of Life to a sphere. In that case the pillar arrangement becomes slightly altered or extended so as to produce four pillars about an invisible axis, the Middle Pillar. There is also much profound wisdom in the very skeletal attributions of the five divisions of the tarot pack to the surface or parts of the solid sphere. The aces to the north pole, and the thirty-six decanate cards to the south pole up to the ecliptic, while in between range the princess cards which are the thrones of the aces, the other court cards, and the trumps. The studied application of this intricate scheme to the extended arrangement of the Tree of Life, and thence to the human personality and sphere in all its branches will yield a wealth of significant material.
- I have also elaborated this scheme in two books. In The Art of True Healing I have dealt with the aura and the Middle Pillar solely from the therapeutic point of view. My other book, The Middle Pillar, considers the technique from a considerably wider view. Moreover it attempts to associate the results of training with the terminology of analytical psychology.

ADEPTUS MINOR GRADE PAPERS

Concerning the Tree of Life

This is the Book of the Path of the Chameleon—the knowledge of the colours of the forces which lie beyond the physical universe. Study thou well that saying of Hermes “that which is below is like that which is above,” for if that which is below is conformed according to the law of the Concealed One—great is His name—be thou well assured that the closer thou adherest unto the law of the universe in thy working, by so much the more is thy magical working just and true.

Recall what was said unto thee in the ritual of the Paths of the Portal of the Vault of the Adepti. “Therefore, by the straight and narrow path of Samekh, let the Philosophus advance like the arrow from the bow of Qesheth.” Now Qesheth the bow is the rainbow of promise stretched above the earth, whose name is formed from the letters of the Paths leading from Malkuth. If then it be by the Path of Samekh that the Philosophus should advance to the knowledge of the adept, turning aside neither unto the right hand nor unto the left, whereon are the evil and threatening symbols of Death and the Devil, he must have a perfect and absolute knowledge of the bow, ere he can follow the path of the arrow. But the bow is of brilliant and perfect colour, whose analysis and synthesis yield others of the same scale, and hence is this book entitled The Book of the Path of the Chameleon—that path, namely, which ascendeth alone through the force of Qesheth the bow.

And if thy knowledge and application of the outer knowledge, which thou hast already learned, be faulty and incorrect, how wilt thou be able to keep thyself from turning aside unto thy hurt? Therefore, learn not knowledge by rote only as an unreasoning child, but meditate, search out, and compare, and to the end, see that thou think but little of thyself—for only he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. Magical knowledge is not given unto thee to tickle thy vanity and conceit, but that by its means, thou mayest purify and equilibrate thy spiritual nature and honour the Vast and Concealed One.

This is the explanation of the first diagram of the Paths—the Sephiroth being in the feminine scale and the Paths in the masculine or King scale. It is the key of the forces which lie in Qesheth the bow. Treasure it in thy heart and mark it well, seeing that therein is the key of nature. Meditate on it and reveal it not unto the profane, for many and great are its mysteries.

NOTE: There are four scales of colour which correspond to the four worlds. They are:

The King scale	Atziluth	Wands	Yod	Fire
The Queen scale	Briah	Cups	Heh	Water
The Prince scale	Yetzirah	Swords	Vau	Air
The Princess scale	Assiah	Pentacles	Heh	Earth

The colours differ according to the world or aspect of the great name they represent:

Thus Samekh in:

The King scale is	Deep Blue
The Queen scale is	Yellow
The Prince scale is	Green
The Princess scale is	Grey Blue

Tiphareth in:

The King scale is	Rose
The Queen scale is	Gold
The Prince scale is	Pink
The Princess scale is	Tawny Yellow

The Tree of Life for the use of an Adeptus Minor is compounded of the first two scales. The Sephiroth are in the feminine, passive, or Queen scale. The Paths are in the masculine, active, or King scale. It thus represents the forces of Atziluth in the Paths uniting the Sephiroth as reflected in the Briatic world, one of the possible arrangements of the powers inherent in Yod He of the Great Name.

First are the feminine colours of the Sephiroth, the Queen's scale. In Kether is the divine white brilliance, the scintillation and coruscation of the divine glory—that light which lighteth the universe—that light which surpasseth the glory of the sun and beside which the light of mortals is but darkness, and concerning which it is not fitting that we should speak more fully. And the sphere of its operation is called Rashith ha-Gilgalim—the beginning of whirling (or whirls, or whorls), the primum mobile or first mover, which bestoweth the gift of life in all things and filleth the whole universe. And Eheieh is the name of the divine essence in Kether; and its archangel is the prince of countenances—Metatron or Metraton, he who bringeth others before the face of God. And the name of its order of angels is called Chaioth ha-Qadesh, the holy living creatures, which are also called the order of Seraphim.²⁵

In Chokmah is a cloudlike grey which containeth various colours and is mixed with them, like a transparent pearl-hued mist, yet radiating withal, as if behind it there was a brilliant glory. And the sphere of its influence is in Mazloth, the starry heaven, wherein it disposeth the forms of things. And Yah is the divine ideal wisdom, and its archangel is Ratziel, the prince or princes of the knowledge of hidden and concealed things, and the name of its order of angels is Auphanim, the wheels or the whirling forces which are also called the order of Kerubim.

In Binah is a thick darkness which yet veileth the divine glory in which all colours are hidden, wherein is mystery and depth and silence, and yet, it is the habitation of the supernal light. There is the supernal triad completed. And the sphere of its operation is Shabbathai, or rest, and it giveth forms and similitudes unto chaotic matter and it ruleth the sphere of action of the planet

Saturn. And Jehovah Elohim is the perfection of creation and the life of the world to come. And its archangel is Tzaphqiel, the prince of the spiritual strife against evil, and the name of the order of angels is Aralim, the strong and mighty ones who are also called the Order of Thrones. The angel Jophiel is also referred unto Binah.

In Chokmah is the radix of blue and thence is there a blue colour pure and primitive and glistening with a spiritual light which is reflected unto Chesed. And the sphere of its operation is called Tzedek or justice, and it fashioneth the images of material things, bestowing peace and Oy ; and it ruleth the sphere of the action of the planet Jupiter. And Al is the title of a god strong and mighty, ruling in glory, magnificence, and grace. And the archangel of Chesed is Tzadkiel, the prince of Oy and beneficence, and the name of the order of angels is Chashmalim, brilliant ones, who are also called the Order of Dominions or Dominations. The Sephira Chesed is also called Gedulah or magnificence and glory.

In Binah is the radix of red, and therein is there a red colour, pure and scintillating and flashing with flame which is reflected unto Geburah. The sphere of its operation is called Madim or violent rushing force, and it bringeth fortitude, and war and strength and slaughter, as it were, the flaming sword of an avenging God. And it ruleth the sphere of action of the planet Mars. And Elohim Gibor is the Elohim, mighty and terrible, judging and avenging evil, ruling in wrath and terror and storm, and at whose steps are lightning and flame. And its archangel is Kamael the prince of strength and courage, and the name of the order of angels is Seraphim, the flaming ones, who are also called the Order of Powers. The Sephira Geburah is also called Pachad, terror and fear.

In Kether is the radix of a golden glory and thence is there a pure, primitive and sparkling, gleaming golden yellow which is reflected unto Tiphareth. Thus is the first reflected triad completed. And the sphere of its operation is that of Shemesh, the solar light, and bestoweth life, light, and brilliancy in metallic matter, and it ruleth the sphere of action of the sun. And Yhvh Eloah va-Daath is a god of knowledge and wisdom, ruling over the light of the universe; and its archangel is Raphael, the prince of brightness, beauty, and life. And the name of the order of angels is Melechim or Malakim, that is kings or angelic kings, who are also called the Order of Virtues, Angels, and Rulers. The angels Peniel and Pelial are also referred unto this Sephira. It especially rules the mineral world.

The beams of Chesed and of Tiphareth meet in Netzach and thence in Netzach arises a green, pure, brilliant, liquid, and gleaming like an emerald. And the sphere of its operations is that of Nogah or external splendour, producing zeal, love, harmony, and it ruleth the sphere of action of the planet Venus and the nature of the vegetable world. And Jehovah Tzabaoth is a god of hosts and of armies, of triumph and of victory, ruling the universe in justice and eternity. And its archangel Haniel is the prince of love and harmony, and the name of the Order of Angels is Elohim or gods who are also called the Order of Principalities. The angel Cerviel is also referred unto this Sephira.

The beams of Geburah and Tiphareth meet in Hod and thence arises in Hod a brilliant pure and flashing orange tawny. And the sphere of its operation is that of Kokab, the stellar light, bestowing elegance, swiftness, and scientific knowledge and art, and constancy of speech, and it ruleth the sphere of the action of the planet Mercury. And Elohim Tzabaoth is also a god of hosts and of armies, of ☿ and of agreement, of praise and honour, ruling the universe in wisdom and harmony. And its archangel is Michael, the prince of splendour and of wisdom, and the name of the Order of Angels is Beni Elohim, or sons of the gods, who are also called the Order of Archangels.

The beams of Chesed and Geburah meet in Yesod and thence ariseth in Yesod a brilliant deep violet-purple or puce, and thus is the third triad completed. And the sphere of its operation is that of Levanah, the lunar beam, bestowing change, increase, and decrease upon created things and it ruleth the sphere of action of the moon and the nature of mankind. And Shaddai is a god who sheddeth benefits, omnipotent and satisfying, and Al Chai is the god of life, the Living One. Its archangel is Gabriel the prince of change and alteration. And the name of the Order of Angels is Kerubim or Kerubic ones who are also called the Order of Angels.

And from the rays of this triad there appear three colours in Malkuth together with a fourth which is their synthesis. Thus from the orange tawny of Hod and the green nature of Netzach, there goeth forth a certain greenish “citrine” colour, yet pure and translucent withal. From the orange tawny of Hod mingled with the puce of Yesod there goeth forth a certain red russet brown, “russet” yet gleaming with a hidden fire. And from the green of Netzach and the puce of Yesod there goeth forth a certain other darkening green “olive” yet rich and glowing withal. And the synthesis of all these is a blackness which bordereth upon the Qlippoth.

Thus are the colours of the Sephiroth completed in their feminine or rainbow scale. Moreover, though the Tree of Life operates through all the ten Sephiroth, yet it is referred in a special manner to Tiphareth. Also, though the branches of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and of Evil stretch into the seven lower Sephiroth and downwards into the kingdom of shells, yet it is referred especially unto Malkuth. Similarly with Netzach and Hod, the right and left columns of the Sephiroth are referred respectively thereto.

In Malkuth, Adonai ha-Aretz is God, the lord and king, ruling over the kingdom and empire which is the visible universe. And Cholem Yesodoth, the breaker of foundations (or Olam Yesodoth—the world of the elements) is the name of the sphere of operation of Malkuth which is called the sphere of the elements from which all things are formed, and its archangels are three: Metatron, the prince of countenances reflected from Kether, and Sandalphon, the prince of prayer (feminine), and Nephesch ha Messiah, the soul of the reconciler for earth. And the Order of Angels is Ashim or flames of fire, as it is written “Who maketh his angels spirits and his ministers as a flaming fire,”

²⁶ and these are also called the Order of Blessed Souls, or of the souls of the just made perfect.

(Note the three archangels attributed to Malkuth with reference to Christian symbolism in regard to Our Father, Our Lady, and Our Lord.)

The following table consists of a classification of the scales of colour in each of the four worlds. The numbers 1 to 10 refer to the Sephiroth, and those from 11 to 32 inclusive to the Paths.

The Four Colour Scales

The Microcosm—Man

Thou shalt know that the whole sphere of sensation which surroundeth the whole physical body of a man is called “the magical mirror of the universe.” For therein are represented all the occult forces of the universe projected as on a sphere, convex to the outer, but concave to man. This sphere surroundeth the physical body of a man as the celestial heavens do the body of a star or a planet, having their forces mirrored in its atmosphere. Therefore its allotment or organization is the copy of that greater world or macrocosm. In this “magical mirror of the universe,” therefore, are the ten Sephiroth projected in the form of the Tree of Life as in a solid sphere.²⁷

A man’s physical body is within the ten Sephiroth projected in a sphere. The divisions and parts of the body are formed from the Sephiroth of the Tree of Life, thus.

Kether is above the crown of the head and represents a crown which indeed is powerful, but it requires one worthy to wear it. In the crown of the head is placed the faculty of neschamah, which is the power of aspiration unto that which is beyond. This power of neschamah is especially attributed unto the supernal triad in Assiah, of which there are three manifestations which are included in the general concept, neschamah.

From Chokmah and Binah are formed the sides of the brain and head. Therein exist the intellectual faculties of wisdom and understanding, shining into and illuminating their inferior, the ruach. They are the mansions of the practical administration of the intellect, whose physical shewing forth is by reflection in ruach. In the magical mirror of the universe, or the sphere of sensation, man is placed in the midst of four pillars of the Tree of Life as projected in a sphere. These keep their place and move not. But the man himself places in his sphere of sensation that point of the zodiac which ascended at the moment of his birth and conception (for the same degree of the zodiac ascendeth at both, otherwise the birth could not take place). That is to say that at those times the same degree of the zodiac is ascending in the east of the heavens of the star whereon he is incarnated. Thus doth he remain during that incarnation facing that particular point in his sphere of sensation. That is to say, this sphere doth not revolve about the physical body.

From Chesed and Geburah are formed the arms. Therein exist the faculties of operative action, wherefore at their extremities are the symbols of the four elements and the spirit, thus:

Thumb	Spirit
Third Finger	Fire
Index Finger	Water
Little Finger	Air
Second Finger	Earth

The arms are the manifestors of the executive power of the ruach, and therein are the faculties of touch strongly expressed.

From Tiphareth is formed the trunk of the body, free from the members, and therein as in a receptacle of influences are situated the vital organs.

The blood is spirit mingled with and governing the watery principle. The lungs are the receptacles of air which tempereth the blood as the wind doth the waves of the sea—the mephitic impurities of the blood in its traversal of the body requiring the dispersing force of the air, even as the sea, under a calm, doth putrefy and become mephitic.

The heart is the great centre of the action of fire, lending its terrible energy as an impulse unto the others. Thence cometh from the fiery nature the red colour of the blood.

The part above the heart is the chief abode of the ruach, as there receiving and concentrating the other expressions of its Sephiroth. This part is the central citadel of the body and is the particular abode of the lower and more physical will. The higher will is in the Kether of the body. For the higher will to manifest, it must be reflected into the lower will by neschamah. This lower will is immediately potent in the lower membranes and thus, in the region about the heart, is the lower will seated like the king of the body upon its throne.

The concentration of the other faculties of the ruach in and under the presidency of the will, at the same time reflecting the administrative governance of Chokmah and Binah, is what is called the human consciousness. That is, a reflection of two creative Sephiroth under the presidency of the four elements, or the reflection of Aima and Abba as the parents of the human Jehovah. But the human neschamah exists only when the higher will is reflected by the agency of aspiration from Kether into the lower body, and when the flaming letter Shin is placed like a crown on the head of Microprosopus. Thus only doth the human will become the receptacle of the higher will and the action of neschamah is the link therewith. The lower will is the human Jehovah—an angry and jealous god, the Shaker of the Elements, the manifestor in the life of the body. But illuminated by the higher will, he becometh Yeheshuah, no longer angry and jealous, but the self-sacrificer and the Atoning and Reconciling One.

This as regards the action of the more physical man.

Unto this ruach also are presented the reflections of the macrocosmic universe in the sphere of sensation. They surround the ruach which, in the natural man, feeleth them but vaguely and comprehendeth them not. The faculties of the earth are shown forth in the organs which digest and putrefy, casting forth the impurities, even as the earth is placed above the Qliploth.

Thou wilt say, then, that the ruach cannot be the reasoning mind, seeing that it reflecteth its reason from Chokmah and Binah but it is the executive faculty which reasoneth, which worketh with and combineth the faculties reflected into it. The reasoning mind, therefore, is that which useth and combineth the principia of Chokmah and Binah so that the parts of Chokmah and Binah which touch the ruach are the initiators of the reasoning power. The reason itself is a process and but a simulacrum of the action of the higher wisdom and understanding. For the air is not the light—only the translator of the light. Yet without the air, the operations of the light could not so well be carried out. The word ruach, spirit, also meaneth air. It is like a thing that goeth out thou knowest not whither, and cometh in thou knowest not whence.

“The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh nor whither it goeth. So is every one that is born of the Spirit.” ²⁸

This air, the ruach, permeateth the whole physical body but its concentrated influence is about the heart. Yet, were it not for the boundary force of Chokmah and Binah above, of the sphere of sensation surrounding it, and of Malkuth below, the ruach could not concentrate under the presidency of the name, and the life of the body would cease.

Thus far concerning the ruach as a whole, that is, the action of the will in Tiphareth.

From Netzach and Hod are formed the thighs and legs, and they terminate in the symbols of five, as do the arms; but they are not so movable, owing to the effect of Malkuth. In them are placed the faculties of support and firmness and balance; and they show the more physical qualities of the ruach. In them is the sustaining force of the ruach. They are the affirmation of the pillars of the Sephiroth, as answering to the passive, the arms more answering to the two pillars which are active. They are the columns of the human temple.

From Yesod are formed the generative and excretory organs, and therein is the seat of the lower desires, as bearing more on the double nature of, on the one hand, the rejection of the Qliploth, and on the other hand the simulacrum of the vital forces in Tiphareth. It is the special seat of the automatic consciousness. That is, not the will, but the simulacrum of the will in Tiphareth. Yesod is the lowest of the Sephiroth of the ruach, and representeth “fundamental action.” It therefore governeth generation. In Yesod is therefore the automatic consciousness or simulacrum of the will. This automatic consciousness is to the nephesch what the Daath action is to the ruach. Thus, therefore, there being a simulacrum or reflection of the heart and vital organs in the parts governed by Yesod, if the consciousness of the Tiphareth be given unto this wholly, it shall pave the way for disease and death. For this will be a withdrawing of the vital forces of the name, which are in the citadel of Tiphareth, to locate them in Yesod, which is a more easily attacked position. For the automatic consciousness is the translator of the ruach unto the nephesch.

From Malkuth is formed the whole physical body under the command and presidency of the nephesch. The nephesch is the subtle body of refined Astral Light upon which, as on an invisible pattern, the physical body is extended. The physical body is permeated throughout by the rays of the ruach, of which it is the material completion. The nephesch shineth through the material body and formeth the magical mirror or sphere of sensation. This magical mirror or sphere of sensation is an imitation or copy of the sphere of the universe. The space between the physical body and the boundary of the sphere of sensation is occupied by the ether of the astral world; that is to say, the container or recipient of the astral rays of the macrocosm.

The nephesch is divided into its seven palaces, combining the Sephirotic influences in their most material forms. That is, the world of passions dominated by the ruach, or by the world which is beyond. That is, its Sephiroth are passionate, expressing a passionate dominion. Thus, its three supernal Sephiroth—Kether, Chokmah, and Binah—are united in a sense of feeling and comprehending impressions. Its Chesed is expressed by laxity of action. Its Geburah by violence of action. Its Tiphareth is expressed by more or less sensual contemplation of beauty, and love of vital sensation. Its Hod and Netzach, by physical well-being and health. Its Yesod, by physical desires and gratifications. Its Malkuth, by absolute increase and domination of matter in the material body.

The nephesch is the real, the actual body, of which the material body is only the result through the action of ruach, which by the aid of the nephesch, formeth the material body by the rays of ruach, which do not ordinarily proceed beyond the limits of the physical body. That is to say, in the ordinary man the rays of ruach rarely penetrate into the sphere of sensation.

Shining through infinite worlds, and darting its rays through the confines of space, in this sphere of sensation is a faculty placed even as a light is placed within a lantern. This is a certain sense placed in an aperture of the upper part of the ruach wherein act the rays from Chokmah and Binah which govern the reason—Daath. This faculty can be thrown downwards into the ruach, and thence can radiate into the nephesch. It consists of seven manifestations answering to the hexagram, and is like the soul of Microprosopus or the Elohim of the human Tetragrammaton. Therefore in the head, which is its natural and chief seat, are formed the seven apertures of the head. This is the spiritual consciousness as distinct from the human consciousness. It is manifested in seven as just said or in eight if Daath be included. The father is the sun (Chokmah). The mother is the moon (Binah). The wind beareth it in his bosom (ruach). Its nurse is the earth (nephesch). The power is manifested when it can be vibrated through the earth.²⁹

The following is the true attribution of the seven apertures of the head:

Right ear:	Saturn	Left ear:	Jupiter
Right eye:	Sol	Left eye:	Luna
Mouth: Mercury (who is the messenger of the Gods)
Right nostril:	Mars	Left nostril:	Venus

These latter³⁰ represent here the sonoriiferous sense. The right and left eye, the luminous sense, as the sun and moon are the luminaries of the macrocosm.

The right and left nostrils through which the breath passes, giving strength to the physical body, are under Mars and Venus. The mouth is under Mercury, the messenger and the speaker.

This spiritual consciousness is a focus of the action of neschamah. The lower willpower should control the descent of this spiritual consciousness into the ruach, and thence into the nephesch, for the consciousness must descend into the nephesch before the images of the sphere of sensation can be perceived. For it is only the rays of this consciousness permeating the ruach that can take cognizance thereof. This faculty of the spiritual consciousness is the seat of thought. Thought is a light proceeding from the radiation of this spiritual consciousness, traversing the ruach as light traverseth air, and encountering thereafter the symbols reflected in the sphere of sensation, or magical mirror of the universe. These symbols are by its radiation (i.e., that of the thought) reflected again into the spiritual consciousness where they are subjected unto the action of the reasoning mind and of the lower will. That is, in the ordinary natural man when awake, the thought acteth through the ruach, subject when there to the action of the lower will, and submitted to the reasoning power derived as aforesaid from Chokmah and Binah. But in the ordinary man when sleeping, and in the madman, the idiot, and the drunkard, the process is not quite the same.

In the sleeping man, the concentration of the ruach in his heart during the waking time hath produced a weakening of the action of the ruach in its subsidiary Sephiroth in the physical body. To preserve the salutary conjunction of the ruach with the nephesch in the physical body (whose limits are fixed by the Sephiroth of the ruach) it is necessary to weaken the concentration in Tiphareth to repair the strain which is produced by the concentration of the ruach therein during the waking state. This reflux of the ruach into its subsidiary Sephiroth produceth naturally a weakening of the lower will; and the ruach, therefore, doth not reflect so clearly the reasoning faculty. Wherefore, the thought of the spiritual consciousness reflecteth the image in a confused series, which are only partially realized by the lower will. (This is as regards the ordinary natural man in sleep.)

In the madman, as considered apart from obsession (thought-obsession is frequently the accompaniment of mania, and still more frequently its cause) the thought and lower will are very strongly exercised to the detriment of the reasoning faculty. That is, that there is an alliance between the two former which overpowereth the action of Chokmah and Binah in the latter.

Monomania is shown in the consideration of only one certain symbol which is too attractive to the will. A chain of thought is therefore simply a graduated vibration arising from the contact of a ray of thought with a symbol. If controlled by the reasoning power and licensed by the will, such vibrations will be balanced and of equal length. But if uncontrolled by the lower will and the reason, they will be unbalanced and inharmonious. (That is, of uneven length.)

In the case of the drunkard, the equilibrium of the sphere of sensation and consequently of the nephesch, is disturbed. In consequence the thought rays are shaken at each vibration, so that the sphere of sensation of the nephesch is caused to rock and waver at the extremities of the physical body where the ruach's action is bounded. The thought therefore is dazzled by the symbols of the sphere of sensation, in the same way as the eyes can be dazzled in front of a mirror if the latter be shaken or waved. The sensation therefore then conveyed by the thoughts is that of the sphere of sensation oscillating and almost revolving about the physical body, bringing giddiness, sickness, vertigo, and the loss of idea of place and position. Nearly the same may be said of seasickness and the action of certain drugs.

Restoration of the equilibrium of the sphere of sensation after this naturally produceth a slackening of the concentration of the ruach in Tiphareth, whence sleep is an absolute necessity to the drunkard. This is so imperative that he cannot fight against the need. If he does so, or if this condition be constantly repeated, the thought rays are launched through the sphere of sensation so irregularly and so violently that they pass its boundary without either the lower will or the reasoning power or even the thought itself consenting thereto; and the latter is therefore without the protection of the will. Thence arise the conditions of delirium tremens, and an opening is made in the sphere of sensation which is unguarded, and through which hostile influences may enter. But this latter cometh under the head of obsession.

All thought action in the spiritual consciousness originateth in radiation, and radiation is as inseparable from the spiritual consciousness as it is from light.

This spiritual consciousness is the focus of the action of neschamah. The spiritual consciousness is, in its turn, the throne or vehicle of the life of the spirit which is Chiah; and these combined form the chariot of that higher will which is in Kether. Also it is the peculiar faculty of neschamah to aspire unto that which is beyond. The higher will manifests itself through yechidah.

The Chiah is the real life principle, as distinct from the more illusionary life of the physical body. The shining flame of the divine fire, the Kether of the body, is the real self of the incarnation. Yet but few of the sons of men know it or feel its presence. Still less do they believe in or comprehend those higher potencies—angelic, archangelic, or divine, of which the manifestation directly touching yechidah is the higher genius.³¹

This yechidah in the ordinary man can but rarely act through the spiritual consciousness, seeing that for it to do so the king of the physical body, that is the lower will, must rise from his throne to acknowledge his superior. That is the reason why, in some cases, in sleep only doth the higher will manifest itself by dream unto the ordinary man. In other cases it may be manifested; at times through the sincere practice of religious rites, or in cases where the opportunity for self-sacrifice occurreth. In all these cases the lower will hath for a moment recognized a higher form of itself, and the YHVH of the man hath reflected from the eternal lord of the higher life. This yechidah is the only part of the man which can truly say—Eheieh, “I am.” This is then but the Kether of the Assiah of the microcosm, that is, it is the highest part of man as man. It is that which toucheth, or is the manifestation of, a higher and greater range of being. This yechidah is at the same time the higher human self and the lower genius, the god of the man, the Atziluth of his Assiah, even as Chiah and neschamah form his Briah, and ruach his Yetzirah. This is the higher will and the divine consciousness, as Daath is the spiritual consciousness, Tiphareth the human consciousness, and Yesod the automatic consciousness.

It is the divine consciousness because it is the only part of man which can touch the all-potent forces. Behind yechidah are angelic and archangelic forces of which yechidah is the manifestor. It is therefore the lower genius or viceroy of the higher genius which is beyond, an angel mighty and terrible. This great angel is the higher genius, beyond which are the archangelic and divine.

Recall the Tiphareth clause of an Adeptus Minor: "I further solemnly promise and swear that with the divine permission I will from this day forward apply myself unto the Great Work which is so to purify and exalt my spiritual nature, that with the divine aid I may at length attain to be more than human, and thus gradually raise and unite myself to my higher and divine genius, and that in this event, I will not abuse the great power entrusted unto me."

Note that this clause answereth unto Tiphareth, seeing that it is the lower will that must apply itself unto this work, because it is the king of the physical man. All the shining ones (whom we call angels) are microcosms of the macrocosm Yetzirah, even as man is the microcosm of the macrocosm of Assiah. All archangelic forms are microcosms of the macrocosm of Briah, and the gods of the Sephiroth are consequently the microcosms of the macrocosm of Atziluth. Therefore apply this perfecting of the spiritual nature as the preparation of the pathway for the shining light, the light divine.

The evil persona of a man is in the sphere of the Qlipoth, and the devils are the microcosms of the macrocosm of the Qlipoth. This evil persona hath its parts and divisions, and of it the part which toucheth the Malkuth of the nephesch is its Kether. Tremble therefore at the evil forces which be in thy own evil persona. And as above the Kether of a man are his angelic and other forms, so below the Malkuth of the evil persona are awful forms, dangerous even to express or think of.

Task Undertaken by the Adeptus Minor

This, then, is the task to be undertaken by the Adeptus Minor. To expel from the Sephiroth of the nephesch the usurpation by the evil Sephiroth; to balance the action of the Sephiroth of the ruach in those of the nephesch. To prevent the lower will and human consciousness from falling into and usurping the place of the automatic consciousness. To render the king of the body, the lower will, obedient to and anxious to execute the commands of the higher will, that he be neither a usurper of the faculties of the higher, nor a sensual despot—but an initiated ruler, and an anointed king, the viceroy and representative of the higher will, because inspired thereby, in his kingdom which is man. Then shall it happen that the higher will, i.e., the lower genius, shall descend into the royal habitation, so that the higher will and the lower will shall be as one, and the higher genius shall descend into the Kether of the man, bringing with him the tremendous illumination of his angelic nature. And the man shall become what is said of Enoch. “And Chanokh made himself to walk with God, and he was not, for God took him.” (Genesis 5:24)

Then also this shalt thou know, that the nephesch of the man shall become as the genius of the evil persona, so that the evil persona itself shall be as the power of the divine in the Qlipoth, as it is said: “Whither shall I go from thy spirit, or whither from thy presence shall I flee? If I ascend up to heaven, thou art there. If I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there.” (Psalm 139)

Therefore even the evil persona is not so evil when it fulfilleth its work. For it is the beginning of a dim reflection of the light unto the Qlipoth, and this is what is hidden in the saying that “Typhon is the brother of Osiris.” Hear thou, then, a mystery of the knowledge of evil. The 5°= 6° Ritual of the Adeptus Minor saith that even the “evil helpeth forward the good.” When the evil Sephiroth are expelled from the nephesch into the evil persona, they are, in a sense, equilibrated therein. The evil persona can be rendered as a great and strong, yet trained, animal whereupon the man rideth, and it then becometh a strength unto his physical base of action. This mystery shalt thou keep from the knowledge of the First Order, and still more from that of the outer world, that is as a formula, seeing that it is a dangerous secret.

Now then shalt thou begin to understand the saying “He descended into hell,” ³² and also to comprehend in part this strength, and thus begin to understand the necessity of evil unto the material creation. Wherefore, also, revile not overmuch the evil forces, for they have also a place and a duty, and in this consisteth their right to be. But check their usurpation, and cast them down unto their plane. Unto this end, curse them by the mighty names if need be, but thou shalt not revile them for their condition, for thus also shalt thou be led into error.

There is also a great mystery that the Adeptus Minor must know, viz.: How the spiritual consciousness can act around and beyond the sphere of sensation. “Thought” is a mighty force when projected with all the strength of the lower will under the guidance of the reasoning faculty and illuminated by the higher will. Therefore it is that, in thy occult working, thou art advised to invoke the divine and angelic names, so that thy lower will may willingly receive the influx of the higher will, which is also the lower genius behind which are the all-potent forces.

This, therefore, is the magical manner of operation of the initiate when “skrying” in the spirit vision. Through his own arcane wisdom, he knows the disposition and correspondences of the forces of the macrocosmos. Selecting not many, but one symbol, and that balanced and with its correlatives, then sendeth he a thought ray from his spiritual consciousness, illuminated by his higher will, directly unto the part of his sphere of sensation which is consonant with the symbol employed. There, as in a mirror, doth he perceive its properties as reflected from the macrocosmos, shining forth into the infinite abyss of the heavens. Thence can he follow the ray of reflection therefrom, and while concentrating his united consciousness at that point of his sphere of sensation, can receive the direct reflection of the ray from the macrocosmos. Thus receiving the direct ray as then reflected into his thought, he can unite himself with the ray of his thought so as to make one continuous ray from the corresponding point of the macrocosmos unto the centre of his consciousness.

If, instead of concentrating at that actual point of the sphere of sensation he shall retain the thought ray only touching the sphere of sensation at that point, he shall, it is true, perceive the reflection of the macrocosmic ray answering to that symbol in the sphere of his consciousness. But he shall receive this reflection tintured much by his own nature, and therefore to an extent untrue, because his united consciousnesses have not been able to focus along the thought ray at the circumference of the sphere of sensation. And this is the reason why there are so many and multifarious errors in untrained spirit visions. For the untrained seer, even supposing him free from the delusions of obsession, doth not know or understand how to unite his consciousnesses and the harmonies between his own sphere of sensation, and the universe, the macrocosmos. Therefore is it so necessary that the Adeptus Minor should correctly understand the principia and axiomata of our secret knowledge, which are contained in our rituals and lectures.

Of Travelling in the Spirit Vision

The symbol, place, direction, or plane being known whereon it is desired to act, a thought ray as before is sent unto the corresponding part of the sphere of sensation of the nephesch. The thought ray is sent like an arrow from the bow, right through the circumference of the sphere of sensation direct unto the place desired. Arrived there, a sphere of Astral Light is formed by the agency of the lower will, illuminated by the higher will, and acting through the spiritual consciousness by reflection along the thought ray. This sphere of Astral Light is partly drawn from the surrounding atmosphere. This sphere being formed, a simulacrum of the person of the skryer is reflected into it along the thought ray, and this united consciousness is then projected therein. This sphere is then a duplicate, by reflection, of the sphere of sensation. As it is said: "Believe thyself to be in a place and thou art there."

In this astral projection, however, a certain part of the consciousness must remain in the body to protect the thought ray beyond the sphere of sensation (as well as the sphere itself at that point of departure of the thought ray) from attack by any hostile force, so that the consciousness in this projection is not quite so strong as the consciousness when concentrated in the natural body in ordinary life. The return taketh place with a reversal of this process, and save to persons whose nephesh and physical body are exceptionally strong and healthy, the whole operation of skrying and travelling in the spirit vision is of course fatiguing.

Also there is another mode of astral projection which can be used by the more practiced and advanced adept. This consisteth in forming first a sphere from his own sphere of sensation, casting his reflection therein, and then projecting this whole sphere to the desired place, as in the previous method. But this is not easy to be done by any but the practiced operator.

Thus far, regarding skrying and travelling in the spirit vision.³³

Concerning the Microcosms of Macrocosm

As thou well knowest there be many and numberless other inhabitants of the macrocosmos besides man, angels, and devils. The animals are microcosms in a sense, yet not so complete as man. In them are many and great mysteries. They also have their magical mirror or sphere of sensation. But its polarization is usually horizontal rather than perpendicular, and this is owing to the Sephiroth not being shown therein. This sphere, then, is not bounded by the Sephirothic columns, but they are especially governed by the stellar system without the Sephiroth. They are therefore ruled by the Paths, rather than by the Sephiroth, and are consequently classed each under an element or a planet and a sign. Thus each followeth a formula which may be translated into letters, and these again form a vibratory name. As it is written: “And Adam gave names unto all the cattle and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field.” (Genesis 2:20) Yet they are ruled by the name YHVH, though classed rather by one or more of its letters:

Thus, Fish, etc., are under the influence of water

Birds are under the influence of air

Quadrupeds are under the influence of fire

Creeping things and insects are under the influence of earth

There are some which partake of two elements, but in them one element is usually chief, and besides the elements, each is under a planet and a sign.

The vegetable kingdom is again under a somewhat different law. These are under a planet and a sign, a planet first differentiated by a sign.

The mineral kingdom is under the signs only. Vegetables have a sphere of sensation, but corresponding only to the planets and zodiacal signs. The minerals have also a sphere which correspondeth unto the signs only. But the metals are under the planets only, and therein is the difference between them and the minerals, wherefore also are they stronger. Shining stones are especially under the light; and they are, as it were, centres for the action thereof in the darkness of matter, as it is said: “My light is concealed in all that shineth.” (This passage is believed to be from the Zend-Avesta.) They are therefore under the rule of the three active elements with an earthy base.

Shining through all things as a whole, are the rays of the macrocosmos. Besides these classes of life there be multitudinous existences representing forces of the macrocosm, each with its own microcosm. Such are elemental spirits, planetary spirits, Olympic spirits, fays, arch-fays, genii, and many other potencies which cannot be classed under these forms. Thus the macrocosmic universe is one vast infinite sphere containing so many and diverse infinite microcosmic forms, of which the perfect knowledge is only known unto the advanced adept.

Also it shall here suffice to say that thou shalt make a distinction between the four-handed race (the quadrumana, apes and monkeys) which be midway between man and beast and other animals. For they be neither the one or the other, but are the fallen and debased result of a most ancient magical effect to formulate a material and immediate link between the human and animal microcosms. This is elsewhere treated of, and it shall here be sufficient to say that they are not an ascent, from the beast unto the man, but a mistaken magical fall from a man unto a beast. Anciently they were a terrible power upon this planet, as then having more of the man than of the animal, whereas now they have more of the animal than of man. The ancient traditions of their primal conditions are preserved unto this day in the legends of ogres and, in certain records, cannibalism and its rites.

Regarding the beasts, they are, for the most part, easily obsessed, and they have not the spiritual responsibility of the man. Their nature is not evil but following a natural law—seeing that man is head of the Asiatic creation—so the animal is higher than the vegetables or mineral. Also bear thou well in mind that the race of the transformers are given unto cruelty. Such are above all the race of creeping things. As man hath his ruach which is upright in the Tree of Life, so hath the beast his ruach which is horizontal; as it is said: “The ruach of a man which goeth upwards (i.e., directeth itself upwards), and the ruach of the beast which goeth downwards (or crosswise) in the earth.”³⁴ The neschamah in the beast is not. The beast consisteth of a ruach and a nephesch with a rudimentary Daath or spiritual consciousness. This Daath ever seeketh that which is beyond it and thence are beasts not responsible, but are submitted unto obsession, and herein is a great mystery.

Man, therefore, is placed at the head of the beasts. Woe, woe, unto him if he teacheth their elementary Daath cruelty and injustice instead of ♀y and justice. For the man is a god unto the beast, and the aspiration of the beast is towards the man, and great is the office of the east, for he prepareth the foundation for the man. Man is responsible for creation, and since he was originally placed in creation to be its lord, as he is, so will the creation follow him. And thus it is possible for the genius of a nation to change the climate of a country, and the nature of the beasts therein. Men fell from primal estate, and then they who were formless became imaged in form, deformed. And this is a mystery of the demonic plane which entereth not into this section.

The elemental spirits and others of their kind are an organization not quite so complete as man. In spiritual consciousness more keen, and yet in some ways his spiritual superior though organically his inferior. They are the formers of the primal man, that is the elementary man, and they have other and greater offices, for in them are many worlds and ranks and spheres. They are as the younger man (i.e., child) and towards them also is man responsible, and he hath wrought them much injustice.

Of Obsession, Trance, Death

Obsession always entereth through a cutting off of the higher from the lower will, and it is ordinarily first induced by a thought ray of the spiritual consciousness (whence one danger of evil thoughts) ill-governed, penetrating the sphere of sensation and admitting another potency, either human embodied, or human disembodied, elemental or demonic. The first action of such a force is to flatter the lower will, until he shall have established firmly an entrance into the sphere of sensation, and thus shall cause a strain on the nephesch which shall render the ruach less concentrated. As soon as the ruach is sufficiently dispersed to repair the strain on the physical body, the lower will is weakened, and is soon seized upon and bound by the invader. Whence arise the sensations of chill and drowsiness which are the usual forerunners of obsession.

Now to yield the force necessary to overpower the lower will from any chance of communication with the higher the obsessing idea proceeds by seizing upon the Daath, and this consequently is the great point of attack, especially the part in the physical body which is at the back of the head about the junction with the spine. Now unless the lower will shall voluntarily endeavour to restore the connection, it is impossible for the higher will to intervene, seeing that the lower will is king of the physical body. Remember that no obsessing force can overpower the lower will, if that shall bravely and in spite of all opposition aspire unto the higher will.

Trance may arise from the action of obsession, or from the action of the higher will, therefore its aspects are varied.

Death superveneth in the natural man, when the mental action of the ruach and the nepesch is definitely and thoroughly interrupted in the physical body. In the adept death can only supervene when the higher will consenteth thereto, and herein is implied the whole mystery of the elixir of life.

BOOK TWO

Rituals of the Outer Order

The Stella Matutina or Golden Dawn

CEREMONY OF THE NEOPHYTE 0° = 0[□] GRADE

Officers—

On the dais:

Imperator—Cancellarius—Past Hierophant—Praemonstrator.
 Hierophant (red cloak, lamen, sceptre).

In the hall:

Hiereus (black cloak, lamen, sword).
 Hegemon (white cloak, lamen, sceptre).
 Kerux (lamen, lamp, and wand).
 Stolistes (lamen, cup of lustral water).

Dadouchos (lamen, thurible).

Sentinel (lamen, sword).

Required—

For the altar: red cross and white triangle, red rose, red lamp, cup of wine, paten of bread and salt.

For the candidate: black robe and red shoes, hoodwink, rope, Neophyte sash.

For the temple: chemical change.¹

Opening of the 0° = 0[□] Grade

When the members are assembled and robed, Hierophant gives one knock and each is seated in his proper place, and the officers rise.

Members present, but not taking on office, do not rise except for adorations to the east or when asked for the signs. They stand after the Hierophant says: “Let us adore the Lord of the universe and space” and face east, remaining so to the end of the adoration. These non-participating members do not circumambulate with the officers, but when they have occasion to move in the temple, they do so in the direction of the sun and make the Neophyte signs 2 on passing the throne of the east whether the Hierophant is there or not. The grade sign is made in the direction of movement except when entering or leaving the hall, when it is made towards the east or when asked to give the signs, and then it is made towards the altar.

┌—This sign represents one knock made by rapping the base or shaft of wand or the pommel of sword on a table.

HIERO: (One knock)

KERUX: (On hearing the Hierophant’s knock, goes to the northeast, to Hierophant’s right, faces west, raising his lamp and wand and says:)

Hekas! Hekas! Este bebeloi! ³

Kerux returns to his place.

HIERO: (Rises and knocks) Fratres and sorores of the (name) Temple of the Order of the Stella Matutina, assist me to open the hall of the Neophytes. Frater Kerux, see that the hall is properly guarded.

Kerux goes to the door and gives one knock. Sentinel replies with one knock.

KERUX: Very honoured Hierophant, the hall is properly guarded.

He salutes the Hierophant's throne and remains by the door.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, guard the hither side of the portal and assure yourself that all present have witnessed the Stella Matutina.

Hiereus goes to the door, stands before it with sword erect, Kerux being on his right with lamp and wand, and says:

HIEREUS: Fratres and Sorores of the Order of the Stella Matutina, give the signs of a Neophyte.

This done, Hiereus gives signs towards Hierophant, and says:

Very honoured Hierophant, all present have been so honoured.

Hiereus and Kerux return to their places. Hierophant gives the Sign of the Enterer towards the west, but not the Sign of Silence.

HIERO: Let the number of officers in this degree and the nature of their offices be proclaimed once again, that the powers whose images they are may be reawakened in the spheres of those present and in the sphere of this order, for by names and images are all powers awakened and reawakened. (He makes the Sign of Silence.) Honoured Hiereus, how many chief officers are there in this grade?

HIEREUS: There are three chief officers: the Hierophant, the Hiereus, and the Hegemon.

HIERO: Is there any peculiarity in these names?

HIEREUS: They all commence with the letter H.

HIERO: Of what is this letter a symbol?

HIEREUS: Of life; because the letter H is our mode of representing the ancient Greek aspirate or breathing, and breath is the evidence of life.

HIERO: How many lesser officers are there?

HIEREUS: There are three besides the Sentinel: the Kerux, the Stolistes, and the Dadouchos. The Sentinel is without the portal of the hall and has a sword in his hand to keep out intruders. It is his duty to prepare the candidate.

HIERO: Frater Dadouchos, your station and duties?

DAD: My station is in the south to symbolise heat and dryness, and my duty is to see that the lamps and fires of the temple are ready at the opening, to watch over the censer and the incense and to consecrate the hall and the fratres and sorores and the candidate with fire.

HIERO: Frater Stolistes, your station and duties?

STOL: My station is in the north to symbolise cold and moisture, and my duties are to see that robes and collars and insignia of the officers are ready at the opening, to watch over the cup of lustral water, and to purify the hall and the fratres and sorores and the candidate with water.

HIERO: Frater Kerux, your station and duties?

KERUX: My place is within the portal. My duties are to see that the furniture of the hall is properly arranged at the opening, to guard the inner side of the portal, to admit the fratres and sorores, and to watch over the reception of the candidate; to lead all mystic circumambulations carrying the lamp of my office, and to make all reports and announcements. My lamp is the symbol of the hidden knowledge, and my wand is the symbol of its directing power.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, your station and duties?

HEG: My station is between the two pillars of Hermes and Solomon and my face is towards the cubical Altar of the Universe. My duty is to watch over the gateway of the hidden knowledge, for I am the reconciler between light and darkness. I watch over the preparation of the candidate and assist in his reception, and I lead him in the path that conducts from darkness to light. The white colour of my robe is the colour of purity, my ensign of office is a mitre-headed sceptre to symbolise religion which guides and regulates life, and my office symbolises those higher aspirations of the soul which should guide its action.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, your station and duties?

HIEREUS: (Holds sword and banner.) My station is on the throne of the west and is a symbol of increase of darkness and decrease of light and I am the master of darkness. I keep the gateway of the west and watch over the reception of the candidate and over the lesser officers in the doing of their work. My black robe is an image of the darkness that was upon the face of the waters. I carry the Sword of Judgment and the Banner of the Evening Twilight, which is the Banner of the West, ⁴ and I am called fortitude by the unhappy.

HIERO: (Hierophant stands holding sceptre and Banner of the East.) My station is on the throne of the east, in the place where the sun rises, and I am the master of the hall, governing it according to the laws of the order, as He whose image I am, is the master of all who work for the hidden knowledge. My robe is red because of uncreated fire and created fire, and I hold the Banner of the Morning Light which is the Banner of the East. I am called power and mercy and light and abundance, and I am the expounder of the Mysteries.

He sits down.

HIERO: Frater Stolistes and Frater Dadouchos, I command you to purify and consecrate the hall with water and with fire.

Stolistes goes to the east, faces Hierophant, and making a cross in the air with his cup, sprinkles a few drops of water three times towards the east. He passes to the south, west, and north, repeating the purification in each quarter, and returns to the east to complete the circle. He then holds the cup on high and says.

STOL: I purify with water.

Dadouchos follows Stolistes when he goes to the east, and when Stolistes has gone to the south Dadouchos faces east, raises his censer, and swings it thrice towards the east. He then goes to the south, west, and north, repeating the censuring at each quarter, and he returns to the east where he completes the circle and raising the censer says:

DAD: I consecrate with fire.

Stolistes and Dadouchos return to their places.

HIERO: Let the mystic circumambulation take place in the pathway of light.

Hierophant stands holding the sceptre in his right hand, the Banner of the East in his left. Kerux goes to the northeast with lamp and wand. Then follow Hegemon, Hiereus with banner and sword, Stolistes with cup, Dadouchos with censer, and, last, Sentinel with sword. They all line up in this order behind the Kerux who leads the procession past Hierophant, making the signs of Horus and Harpocrates 5 as he passes. Each officer in turn does the same.

Hiereus falls out as soon as he reaches his throne. Hegemon returns to his place after passing Hierophant twice. The other officers pass Hierophant three times and then take their places as they come to them.

HIERO: The mystical circumambulation symbolical of the rise of light is accomplished. Let us adore the Lord of the Universe and space.

Members rise. All face east and make the saluting or the enterer (Horus) sign following the lead of Hierophant. The Sign of Silence is made at the end of the prayer.

Holy art Thou, Lord of the Universe! (Salute)

Holy art Thou, Whom nature hath not formed! (Salute)

Holy art Thou, the vast and the mighty one! (Salute)

Lord of the light and of the darkness! (Makes Sign of Silence.)

Hierophant, Hiereus, and Hegemon raise wands and sword in salute, and sink them. All face as usual but remain standing.

HIERO: Frater Kerux, in the name of the Lord of the Universe, I command you to declare that I have opened the hall of the Neophytes.

Kerux goes northeast, faces west, and raising his wand says:

KERUX: In the name of the Lord of the Universe, who works in silence and whom naught but silence can express, I declare that the sun has arisen and the shadows flee away.

Kerux returns to his place.

Hierophant knocks. ¶ Hiereus knocks. ¶ Hegemon knocks. ¶

HIERO: (Knocks) Khabs.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) Am.

HEG: (Knocks) Pekht.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) Konx.

HEG: (Knocks) Om.

HIERO: (Knocks) Pax.

HEG: (Knocks) Light.

HIERO: (Knocks) In.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) Extension.

The knocks are given before the words are said. When the battery is completed, all make the signs towards the altar and then sit down. Kerux removes the rose, cup, paten of bread and salt, and the lamp from the altar, leaving the cross and triangle only. He sees that a hassock is in readiness at the west for the candidate to kneel on.

Initiation of the 0° = 0[□] Grade

HIERO: Fratres and sorores of the (name) Temple of the Order of the Stella Matutina, I have received a dispensation from the greatly honoured chiefs of the Second Order, to admit (name of candidate) to the 0° = 0° degree of Neophyte. Honoured Hegemon, bid the candidate prepare for the ceremony of his admission, and superintend his preparation.

Hegemon rises and removes his chair from between the pillars and goes out, followed by Sentinel, who carries the hoodwink and rope. Hegemon sees that the candidate is properly robed and hoodwinked and that the rope goes three times round his waist. He then leads candidate to door, and gives one knock.

HEG: (One knock on the door.)

KERUX: (One knock from within.) The candidate seeks for entrance.

HIERO: I give permission to admit (name) who now loses his name and will henceforth be known among us as (magical motto). Let the Stolistes and the Dadouchos assist in the reception.

Stolistes and Dadouchos stand behind Kerux who is facing the entrance, ready to open the door. As soon as candidate is well in the hall, these three officers stand before him in triangular formation, and Sentinel is behind him. The officers then say their words in turn.

HEG: Inheritor of a dying world, arise and enter the darkness.

STOL: The mother of darkness hath blinded him with her hair.

DAD: The father of darkness hath hidden him under his wings.

HIERO: His limbs are still weary from the wars which were in heaven.

KERUX: Unpurified and unconsecrated, thou canst not enter our sacred hall.

Stolistes comes forward and dipping his thumb in the lustral water, makes with it a cross on the candidate's brow and sprinkles him three times, saying:

STOL: I purify thee with water.

Dadouchos comes forward and makes a cross over candidate with his censer, and waving it three times, says:

DAD: I consecrate thee with fire.

HIERO: Conduct the candidate to the foot of the altar. Inheritor of a dying world, why seekest thou to enter our sacred hall? Why seekest thou admission to our order?

Hegemon speaks for candidate.

HEG: My soul wanders in darkness and seeks the light of the hidden knowledge, and I believe that in this Order knowledge of that light may be obtained.

HIERO: We hold your signed pledge to keep secret everything that relates to this Order. I now ask you, are you willing to take a solemn obligation in the presence of this assembly, to keep the secrets and mysteries of our Order inviolate?

HEG: (Prompts candidate to say:) I am.

HIERO: There is nothing contrary to your civil, moral, or religious duties in this obligation. Although the magical virtues can indeed awaken into momentary life in the wicked and foolish hearts, they cannot reign in any heart that has not the natural virtues to be their throne. He who is the fountain of the spirit of man and of things, came not to break, but to fulfill the law. Are you ready to take this oath?

CAND: (Prompted by Hegemon) I am ready.

HIERO: Then you will kneel on both your knees.

Hierophant comes to the east of the altar with his sceptre. Hegemon assists candidate to kneel and stands right of candidate. Hiereus stands to left. Kerux, Stolistes, and Dadouchos complete the hexagram of officers as shown below on page 150.

HIERO: Give me your right hand which I place upon this holy symbol. Place your left hand in mine, bow your head, repeat your full name by which you are known on Earth, and say after me:

I, (name), in the presence of the Lord of the Universe, who works in silence and whom naught but silence can express, and in this hall of the Neophytes of the Stella Matutina, regularly assembled under warrant from the greatly honoured chiefs of the Second Order, do, of my own free will, hereby and hereon, most solemnly promise to keep secret this Order, its name, the names of its members, and the proceedings that take place at its meetings, from every person in the world who has not been initiated into it; nor will I discuss them with any member who has not the password for the time being, or who has resigned, demitted, or been expelled.

I undertake to maintain a kindly and benevolent relation with all the fratres and sorores of this Order.

I solemnly promise to keep secret any information I may have gathered concerning this Order before taking this oath.

I solemnly promise that any ritual or lecture placed in my care or any cover containing them shall bear the official label of this Order.

I will neither copy, nor allow to be copied, any manuscript, until I have obtained permission of the Second Order, lest our secret knowledge be revealed through my neglect.

I solemnly promise not to suffer myself to be placed in such a state of passivity, that any uninitiated person or power may cause me to lose control of my words or actions.

I solemnly promise to persevere with courage and determination in the labours of the divine science, even as I shall persevere with courage and determination through this ceremony which is their image—and I will not debase my mystical knowledge in the labour of evil magic at any time tried or under any temptation.

I swear upon this holy symbol to observe all these things without evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation, under the penalty of being expelled from this order for my perjury and my offence. Furthermore, if I break this, my magical obligation, I submit myself, by my own consent, to a stream of power, set in motion by the divine guardians of this Order, who live in the light of their perfect justice, and before whom my soul now stands.

They journey as upon the winds—

They strike where no man strikes—

They slay where no man slays—

and, as I bow my neck under the sword of the Hieres, so do I commit myself unto their hands for vengeance or reward.

So help me my mighty and secret soul, and the Father of my soul who works in silence and whom naught but silence can express.

Hieres, at the words “Bow my neck” places the flat of his sword on the nape of candidate’s neck.

HIERO: Rise, Neophyte, of the $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$ grade of the Order of the Stella Matutina.

Hierophant returns to his throne. Hieres removes hassock and returns to his throne. Hegemon assists candidate to rise. The other officers resume their seats.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, you will now place the Neophyte in the northern part of the hall—the place of forgetfulness, dumbness, and necessity, and of the greatest symbolical darkness.

Hegemon takes candidate to the north and faces him east. Kerux goes with lamp and wand to the northeast. Stolistes and Dadouchos stand ready to follow in the procession.

HIERO: The voice of my undying and secret soul said unto me—"Let me enter the path of darkness and, peradventure, there shall I find the light. I am the only being in an abyss of darkness; from an abyss of darkness came I forth ere my birth, from the silence of a primal sleep."

And the voice of ages answered to my soul—"I am He who formulates in darkness—the light that shineth in darkness, yet the darkness comprehendeth it not."

Let the mystical circumambulation take place in the path of knowledge that leadeth unto light, with the lamp of hidden knowledge to guide us.

Kerux leads forward, followed by Hegemon with candidate—Stolistes and Dadouchos coming last. As they pass Hierophant gives one knock, just as candidate passes. They pass on by south and west and passing Hiereus he also gives one knock as candidate passes. They pass on by the north and on passing east again Hierophant gives one knock as candidate passes. Kerux stops in the south after the second passing of Hierophant and barring the way with his wand, says:

KERUX: Unpurified and unconsecrated, thou canst not enter the path of the west!

Stolistes comes forward and, dipping his thumb in water, makes a cross on candidate's brow, sprinkles three times, and says:

STOL: I purify thee with water.

Dadouchos comes forward, censes in the form of a cross, waves incense three times, and says:

DAD: I consecrate thee with fire.

Stolistes and Dadouchos then step back to their places in the procession.

HEG: Child of Earth, twice purified and twice consecrated, thou mayest approach the gateway of the west.

Kerux leads the procession to throne of Hiereus. Hegemon raises the hoodwink for a moment. Hiereus stands threatening with his sword.

HIEREUS: Thou canst not pass by me, saith the guardian of the west, unless thou canst tell me my name.

HEG: Darkness is thy name, thou great one of the paths of the shades.

HIEREUS: Thou hast known me now, so pass thou on. Fear is failure so be thou without fear. For he who trembles at the flame and at the flood and at the shadows of the air, hath no part in God.

Kerux leads on. They pass Hierophant who gives one knock. Hiereus gives one knock as they pass. After this passing, Kerux halts in the north, and raises his wand.

KERUX: Unpurified and unconsecrated, thou canst not enter the path of the east!

STOL: I purify thee with water. (Cross and sprinkling as before.)

DAD: I consecrate thee with fire. (Cross and censing as before.)

HEG: Child of Earth, thrice purified and thrice consecrated, thou mayest approach the gateway of the east!

Kerux leads the procession forward to Hierophant who stands threatening with his sceptre. The hoodwink is again raised for a moment.

HIERO: Thou canst not pass by me, saith the guardian of the east, unless thou canst tell me my name.

HEG: Light dawning in darkness is thy name, the light of a golden day!

HIERO: Unbalanced power is the ebbing away of life. Unbalanced mercy is weakness and the fading out of the will. Unbalanced severity is cruelty and the barrenness of mind. Thou hast known me now, so pass thou on to the cubical altar of the universe.

The hoodwink is replaced.

Kerux leads the procession to the altar. Candidate is placed exactly west of the altar—Hegemon on his right—Hiereus on his left; Kerux, Stolistes, and Dadouchos at the rear form a supporting triangle. Hierophant, holding sceptre in his right hand and the Banner of the East in his left, advances between the pillars and comes to the east of the altar, saying:

HIERO: I come in the power of the light.

I come in the light of wisdom.

I come in the mercy of the light.

The light hath healing in its wings.

The officers now form a hexagram round the altar. Hiereus holds his sword in his right hand, the Banner of the West in his left. All the officers except Hierophant kneel down. Candidate is assisted to kneel. Hierophant stands, raising his hands, holding sceptre and Banner for the Invocation as follows.

HIERO: Lord of the Universe—the vast and the mighty one! Ruler of the light and of the darkness! We adore Thee and we invoke Thee! Look with favour on this Neophyte who now kneeleth before Thee, and grant Thine aid unto the higher aspirations of his soul, so that he may prove a true and faithful frater Neophyte among us. To the glory of Thine ineffable name. Amen!

All rise, candidate is assisted to rise and is brought close to the altar. Hierophant, Hiereus, and Hegemon raise their wands and sword to touch each other over the head of candidate. Kerux, at the word “Darkness,” removes the hoodwink.

HEG: Inheritor of a dying world, we call thee to the living beauty.

HIEREUS: Wanderer in the wild darkness, we call thee to the gentle light.
(Hoodwink removed.)

HIERO: Long hast thou dwelt in darkness—quit the night and seek the day.

HEG

HIEREUS } (Together) We receive thee into the Order of the Stella Matutina

HIERO

HIERO: Khabs.

HIEREUS: Am.

HEG: Pekht.

HIEREUS: Konx.

HEG: Om.

HIERO: Pax.

HEG: Light.

HIERO: In.

HIEREUS: Extension.

The officers take down their sceptres and sword. Kerux moves to northeast of the altar and raises his lamp. Hierophant points to the lamp to direct candidate's attention.

HIERO: In all thy wandering in darkness, the lamp of the Kerux went before thee, though it was not seen by thine eyes. It is the symbol of the light of the hidden knowledge.

The officers return to their places, Hierophant to his throne. Hegemon and candidate remain west of the altar.

Let the Neophyte be led to the east of the altar.

Hegemon places him to the east, near but not between the pillars, and then he takes his place outside the white pillar.

Honoured Hiereus, give the Neophyte the secret signs, token, and words, together with the present password of the $0^{\circ} = 0^{\circ}$ grade of the Stella Matutina. Place him between the mystical pillars and superintend his fourth and final consecration.

Hiereus passes by the north to the black pillar. He comes round to the east. Hegemon advances to meet him and take from him his sword and banner. Hiereus steps between the pillars, and facing candidate, says:

HIEREUS: Frater (name), I shall now proceed to instruct you in the secret step, signs, grip, and words of this grade.

Firstly, advance your left foot a short space, as if entering a portal. This is the step.

The signs are two. The first or saluting sign is given thus: Lean forward and stretch both arms out thus: (make Neophyte do this). It alludes to your condition in a state of darkness, groping for light. The second sign is the Sign of Silence, and is given by placing the left forefinger on your lip thus (makes Neophyte do it). It is the position shown in many ancient statues of Harpocrates, and it alludes to the silence you have sworn to maintain concerning everything connected with this Order. The first sign is always answered by the second.

The grip or token is given thus: advance your left foot touching mine, toe and heel, extend your right hand to grasp mine, fail, try again, and then succeed in touching the fingers only. It alludes to the seeking guidance in darkness.

The grand word is Har-Par-Krat, and it is whispered in this position mouth to ear, in syllables. (They exchange the word.) It is the Egyptian name for the god of silence, and should always remind you of the strict silence you have sworn to maintain.

The password is (word). It is periodically changed each equinox, so that a member who has resigned, demitted, or been expelled, may be in ignorance of the existing password.

I now place you between the two pillars of Hermes and of Solomon in the symbolical gateway of occult wisdom.

Hiereus leads Neophyte forward and then takes back the sword and banner as Hegemon hands them to him. He stands northeast of the black pillar and says:

HIEREUS: Let the final consecration take place.

Stolistes and Dadouchos come forward and purify and consecrate the hall as in the opening, but on returning to the east, Stolistes turns round to Neophyte, makes a cross of water on his brow, sprinkles three times, and says:

STOL: I purify thee with water.

Dadouchos likewise turns round from the east and says after making a cross and censuring three times:

DAD: I consecrate thee with fire. (They return to their places.)

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, I command you to remove the rope, last remaining symbol of the path of darkness, and to invest our frater with the badge of this degree.

Hegemon comes forward and hands his sceptre and ritual to Hiereus. He removes the rope and puts on the sash over the left shoulder.

HEG: By command of the very honoured Hierophant, I invest you with the badge of this degree. It symbolises light dawning in darkness.

Hegemon takes sceptre, etc. and returns to white pillar.

HIERO: Let the mystical circumambulation take place in the pathway of light.

Kerux goes to the northeast. Hegemon takes candidate behind black pillar, and stands behind Kerux. Hiereus comes next, followed by Stolistes and Dadouchos. Kerux leads off, all salute on passing Hierophant who stands holding sceptre and banner as in the opening. Hiereus drops out on reaching his throne. Hegemon returns to between the pillars after passing Hierophant twice. He directs Neophyte to follow Kerux, who with the other officers passes Hierophant thrice. After the third passing, Hierophant says:

HIERO: Take your place northwest of the Stolistes.

Kerux indicates this and goes on followed by Stolistes who falls out in the north and returns to his place.

Hegemon replaces his chair between the pillars and sits down. Kerux replaces the rose, lamp, cup, and paten in their proper places on the altar.

All are seated.

HIERO: The threefold cord bound about your waist was an image of the threefold bondage of mortality, which amongst the initiated is called earthly or material inclination, that has bound into a narrow place the once far-wandering soul; and the hoodwink was an image of the darkness, of ignorance, of mortality that has blinded men to the happiness and beauty their eyes once looked upon.

The double cubical altar in the centre of the hall is an emblem of visible nature or the material universe, concealing within herself the mysteries of all dimensions, while revealing her surface to the exterior senses. It is a double cube because, as the Emerald Tablet has said, “The things that are below are a reflection of the things that are above.” The world of men and women created to unhappiness is a reflection of the world of divine beings created to happiness. It is described in the Sepher Yetzirah, or the Book of Formation, as “an abyss of height” and as “an abyss of depth,” “an abyss of the east” and “an abyss of the west,” “an abyss of the north” and “an abyss of the south.” The altar is black because, unlike divine beings who unfold in the element of light, the fires of created beings arise from darkness and obscurity.

On the altar is a white triangle to be the image of that immortal light, that triune light, which moved in darkness and formed the world of darkness and out of darkness. There are two contending forces and one always uniting them; and these three have their image in the threefold flame of our being and in the threefold wave of the sensual world.

Hierophant stands in the form of cross, saying:

HIERO: Glory be to Thee, Father of the undying. For Thy glory flows out rejoicing to the ends of the earth!

He reseats himself.

The red cross above the white triangle is an image of Him who was unfolded in the light. At its east, south, west, and north angles are a rose, fire, cup of wine, and bread and salt. These allude to the four elements: air, fire, water, earth.

The mystical words—Khabs Am Pekht—are ancient Egyptian, and are the origin of the Greek “Konx Om Pax” which was uttered at the Eleusinian Mysteries. A literal translation would be “light rushing out in one ray,” and they signify the same form of light as that symbolised by the staff of the Kerux.

East of the double cubical altar of created things are the pillars of Hermes and of Solomon. On these are painted certain hieroglyphics from the 17th and the 125th chapters of the Book of the Dead. They are the symbols of the two powers of day and night, love and hate, work and rest, the subtle force of the lodestone and the eternal outpouring and inpouring of the heart of God.

The lamps that burn, though with a veiled light, upon their summits show that the pathway to hidden knowledge, unlike the pathway of nature—which is a continual undulation, the winding hither and thither of the serpent—is the straight and narrow way between them.

It was because of this that I passed between them, when you came to the light, and it was because of this that you were placed between them to receive the final consecration.

Two contending forces and one which unites them eternally. Two basal angles of the triangle and one which forms the apex. Such is the origin of creation—it is the triad of life.

My throne at the gate of the east is the place of the guardian of the dawning sun.

The throne of the Hiereus at the gate of the west is the place of the guardian against the multitudes that sleep through the light and awaken at the twilight.

The throne of the Hegemon seated between the columns is the place of balanced power, between the ultimate light and the ultimate darkness. These meanings are shown in detail and by the colour of our robes.

The wand of the Kerux is the beam of light from the hidden wisdom, and his lamp is an emblem of the ever-burning lamp of the guardian of the mysteries.

The seat of the Stolistes at the gate of the north is the place of the guardian of the cauldron and the well of water—of cold and moisture. The seat of the Dadouchos at the gate of the south is the place of the guardian of the lake of fire and the burning bush.

Frater Kerux, I command you to declare that the Neophyte has been initiated into the mysteries of the 0° = 0° grade.

Kerux advances to the northeast, faces west, raises his wand, and says:

KERUX: In the name of the Lord of the Universe, who works in silence and whom naught but silence can express, and by command of the very honoured Hierophant, hear ye all, that I proclaim that (name), who will henceforth be known to you by the motto (motto), has been duly admitted to the 0° = 0° grade as a Neophyte of the Order of the Stella Matutina.

Kerux returns to his place.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, I delegate to you the duty of pronouncing a short address to our frater on his admission.

HIEREUS: Frater (motto), it is my duty to deliver this exhortation to you. Remember your obligation in this Order to secrecy—for strength is in silence, and the seed of wisdom is sown in silence and grows in darkness and mystery.

Remember that you hold all religions in reverence, for there is none but contains a ray from the ineffable light that you are seeking. Remember the penalty that awaits the breaker of his oath. Remember the mystery that you have received, and that the secret of wisdom can be discerned only from the place of balanced powers.

Study well the great arcanum of the proper equilibrium of severity and mercy, for either unbalanced is not good. Unbalanced severity is cruelty and oppression; unbalanced mercy is but weakness and would permit evil to exist unchecked, thus making itself, as it were, the accomplice of that evil.

Remember that things divine are not attained by mortals who understand the body alone, for only those who are lightly armed can attain the summit.

Remember that God alone is our light and the bestower of perfect wisdom, and that no mortal power can do more than bring you to the pathway of that wisdom, which He could, if it so pleased Him, put into the heart of a child. For as the whole is greater than the part, so are we but sparks from the unsupportable light which is in Him.

The ends of the earth are swept by the borders of His garment of flame—from Him all things proceed, and unto Him all things return.

Therefore, we invoke Him. Therefore even the Banner of the East falls in adoration before Him.

HIERO: Before you can ask to pass to a higher grade, you will have to commit certain rudiments of occult knowledge to memory. A manuscript lecture in these subjects will be supplied you by the chief in whose charge they are. When you can pass an examination in this elementary Qabalistic knowledge, you will inform the member in whose charge you are, and arrangements will be made for you to sit for examination. If you are found perfect you will then apply for admission to the next degree. Remember, that without a dispensation from the Second Order, no person can be admitted or advanced to a grade of the First Order.

Kerux conducts Neophyte to his table and gives him one of the small dishes of solution to hold.

KERUX: Nature is harmonious in all her workings, and that which is above is as that which is below. Thus also, the truths which by material science we investigate, are but special examples of the all-pervading laws of the universe. So, within this pure and limpid fluid, lie hidden and unperceived of mortal eyes, the elements bearing the semblance of blood, even as within the mind and brain of the initiate lie concealed the divine secrets of the hidden knowledge. Yet if the oath be forgotten, and the solemn pledge broken, then that which is secret shall be revealed, even as this pure fluid reveals the semblance of blood.

Kerux adds fluid from the other dish.

Let this remind thee ever, O Neophyte, how easily by a careless or unthinking word, thou mayst betray that which thou hast sworn to keep secret and mayst reveal the hidden knowledge imparted to thee, and planted in thy brain and in thy mind. And let the hue of blood remind thee that if thou shalt fail in this thy oath of secrecy, thy blood may be poured out and thy body broken; for heavy is the penalty exacted by the guardians of the hidden knowledge from those who willfully betray their trust.

Hierophant comes to the table. The register is signed.

HIERO: Resume your seat, and remember that your admission to this Order does not give you the right to initiate any other person without a dispensation from the greatly honoured chiefs of the Second Order.

Kerux directs Neophyte to his seat. Hierophant returns to the dais.

Closing of the 0° = 0[□] Grade

HIERO: (Gives knock) ¶

Kerux goes to the northeast, faces west, and raising lamp and wand, says:

KERUX: Hekas! Hekas! Esti bebeloi!

He returns to his place.

HIERO: Fratres and sorores of the (name) Temple of the Order of the Stella Matutina, assist me to close the Hall of the Neophytes.

All rise. Neophyte is directed to rise by Stolistes.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) ¶

HEG: (Knocks) ¶

KERUX: (Knocks) ¶

SENTINEL: (Knocks) ¶

HIERO: Frater Kerux, see that the hall is properly guarded.

KERUX: The hall is properly guarded, very honoured Hierophant.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, assure yourself that all present have beheld the Stella Matutina.

HIEREUS: Fratres and sorores, give the signs. (Done.) Very honoured Hierophant, all present have been so honoured.

HIERO: Let the hall be purified by water and by fire.

STOL: I purify with water. (Purifying as in the opening.)

DAD: I consecrate with fire. (Consecrating as in the opening.)

HIERO: Let the mystical reverse circumambulation take place in the pathway of light.

Kerux goes by the south to the southeast.

Hegemon goes to the north and leads the new Neophyte by west and south, directing him to follow Hegemon in the procession.

Hiereus follows Neophyte and Stolistes follows Hiereus, accompanied or followed by Dadouchos, and Sentinel ends the procession. As they pass the Hierophant, who is standing and holding the Banner of the East in his left hand, the sceptre in his right, they make the Neophyte signs. Hiereus drops out when his throne is reached. Hegemon passes Hierophant twice and then takes his place between the pillars, directing Neophyte to follow Kerux who, after the third passing of Hierophant, directs Neophyte to his seat, the other officers dropping out as their places are reached.

HIERO: The mystical circumambulation is accomplished. It is the symbol of fading light. Let us adore the Lord of the universe.

All turn east. Stolistes directs Neophyte to rise and face east. Hierophant faces east, making the salute at each adoration—the others, officers and members repeating it also.

Holy art Thou, Lord of the Universe! (Salute)

Holy art Thou, whom nature hath not formed! (Salute)

Holy art Thou, the vast and the mighty one! (Salute)

Lord of the light and of the darkness! (Sign of Silence)

Nothing now remains but to partake together in silence, of the mystic repast, composed of the symbols of the four elements, and to remember our pledge of secrecy.

All are seated.

Hierophant puts down his sceptre and returns the Banner of the East to its place. He goes to the west of the altar and facing east gives the saluting sign but not the Sign of Silence, and taking up the rose says:

I invite you to inhale with me the perfume of this rose, as a symbol of air. (Smells rose.)

To feel with me the warmth of this sacred fire. (Spreads his hands over it.)

To eat with me this bread and salt as types of earth. (Dips bread in salt and eats.)

And finally to drink with me this wine, the consecrated emblem of elemental water. (Makes a cross with the cup and drinks.)

Hierophant puts down the cup between the cross and triangle. He comes east of the altar and faces west.

The Praemonstrator then comes to the west of the altar and makes the saluting sign. Hierophant replies with the Sign of Silence and then hands the elements, beginning with the rose which Praemonstrator smells and returns; then feels the warmth of the lamp, eats the bread and salt, and receives from the Hierophant the cup with which he makes a cross, and having drunk, returns it. Hierophant then passes by west and south to his throne. Praemonstrator then comes to the east of the altar. Imperator comes to the west, exchanges signs and partakes. He returns to his place after serving Cancellarius, who in turn serves Past Hierophant. After the chiefs, the officers partake in this order: Hiereus, Hegemon, Stolistes, Dadouchos. When all the officers except Kerux have partaken, the Inner Order members in order of seniority of admission, partake but do not wait for instruction in this. If there is a pause, one comes forward. Next come the members of the Outer Order in the same manner—the Neophytes coming last piloted by Hegemon or any officer appointed. The order of procedure for Outer Order members is: Philosophi, Practici, Theorici, Zelatores, Neophytes. When the last Neophyte stands east of the altar, Kerux comes to the west, exchanges the signs and partakes. (Hegemon directs Neophyte to return to his place as soon as Kerux takes the cup.) Kerux, on receiving the cup, drains it, inverts it, and says:

KERUX: It is finished!

Kerux replaces the cup and returns to his place.

All rise.

HIERO: (Knocks) ¶ Tetelestai!

HIEREUS: (Knocks) ¶

HEG: (Knocks) ¶

HIERO: (Knocks) Khabs.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) Am.

HEG: (Knocks) Pekht.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) Konx.

HEG: (Knocks) Om.

HIERO: (Knocks) Pax.

HEG: (Knocks) Light.

HIERO: (Knocks) In.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) Extension.

All make the signs towards the altar.

HIERO: May what we have partaken maintain us in our search for the quintessence, the stone of the philosophers, true wisdom, perfect happiness, the summum bonum.⁶

1. Note by JMG: Two glasses half full of water, one containing sodium salicylate, the other ferric ammonium sulfate. Both solutions are transparent, but when poured together, a chemical reaction turns the water blood red.
2. Note by JMG: Many modern Golden Dawn temples make only the Sign of the Enterer when passing the east or entering or leaving the hall. The standard practice in the Order of the Golden Dawn and its immediate successors, however, was to do both Neophyte signs in these situations.

3. Note by JMG: “Begone! Begone! Ye profane ones!” in Greek. These words traditionally announced that the ancient Greek Mysteries were about to be celebrated.
4. Note by JMG: See color insert page 3 for the Banner of the East and the Banner of the West.
5. Note by JMG: As previously noted, it was standard practice in the original order to make both Neophyte signs when passing the east.
6. Note by JMG: summum bonum: Latin, “sum of good.”
7. Note by Regardie: Full instructions as to the magical work performed by the officers during the ceremony are given in documents Z.1 and Z.3. These latter will be found in Book Five of this work.

CEREMONY OF THE 1° = 10[□] GRADE OF ZELATOR

Officers—the same as for the Neophyte grade.⁸

Temple—arranged as in diagram.

Required—

For the candidate: hoodwink, Zelator sash

For the temple: Fylfot Cross, three portal symbols, shewbread diagram, candlestick diagram, earth tablet, altar diagrams.

For the altar: red cross, white triangle, red light, altar diagram (the flaming sword of the Kerubim).

Opening of the 1° = 10[□] Grade

The members, having assembled and robed, each is seated in his proper place. Hierophant gives one knock. All rise. 1 = one knock.

HIERO: (Sitting) Fratres and sorores of the 1° = 10[□] grade of the Stella Matutina, assist me to open the temple in the grade of Zelator. Frater Kerux, see that the temple is properly guarded.

KERUX: (Knocks once without opening the door.) Very honoured Hierophant, the temple is properly guarded.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, see that none below the grade of Zelator is present.

HIEREUS: Fratres and Sorores, give the signs of 1° = 10[□]. (All give signs of Zelator.)

HIEREUS: (Gives sign.) Very honoured Hierophant, no one below the grade of Zelator is now present.

HIERO: (Giving sign.) Purify and consecrate the temple with water and with fire.

Kerux advances between the pillars. Stolistes and Dadouchos, one on each side of the pillars, advance to the centre of the hall. All salute. Dadouchos makes cross in air with censer and swings it forward three times, saying:

DAD: I consecrate with fire.

Stolistes makes cross with cup and sprinkles thrice towards east, saying:

STOL: I purify with water.

KERUX: The temple is cleansed.

Salutes with 1° = 10[□] signs. All three retire, Kerux leading and passing with 0° = 0[□] signs.

HIERO: Let the element of this grade be named that it may be awakened in the spheres of those present and in the sphere of the order.

HEG: The element of earth.

HIERO: (Gives one knock.) Let us adore the Lord and King of Earth.

All face east.

HIERO: Adonai ha-Aretz. Adonai Melekh. Unto thee be the kingdom and the power (makes cross on self) and the glory. Malkuth, Geburah, Gedulah.

He makes cross and circle with sceptre before him as he says Malkuth, etc.

The rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley, Amen.

All give Zelator signs. Kerux goes to north, and sprinkles salt before the tablet, saying:

KERUX: Let the Earth adore Adonai!

Hierophant leaves his place and goes to north. He stands facing the centre of the tablet of the north and at a convenient distance therefrom, say six feet. Hiereus takes his place at the right of Hiero. Hegemon on left of Hiero; Stolistes behind Hiereus, Dadouchos behind Hegemon. All officers face north. Hierophant makes sign in front of and concentric with tablet of the north, an invoking pentagram of earth, saying:

HIERO: And the Elohim said, “Let us make Adam in our image, after our likeness, and let him have dominion over the fish of the sea and over the fowl of the air and over the cattle and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth over the earth.” And the Elohim created Eth ha-Adam in their own image, in the image of the Elohim created they them. In the name of Adonai Melekh and of the bride and queen of the kingdom, spirits of Earth adore Adonai!

Hierophant hands his sceptre to Hiereus and, taking his sword, makes the ox ☉ in centre of pentagram, saying:

HIERO: In the name of Auriel, the great archangel of earth, and by the sign of the head of the ox—spirits of earth, adore Adonai!

Hierophant returns sword to Hiereus and takes mitre-headed sceptre from Hegemon, and makes cross in the air, saying:

In the names and letters of the great northern quadrangle, spirits of earth, adore Adonai!

Hierophant returns sceptre to Hegemon, and takes cup from Stolistes, making cross, and sprinkling thrice to north, saying:

In the three great secret names of God, borne upon the Banner of the North—EMOR DIAL HECTEGA⁹—spirits of earth, adore Adonai!

Hierophant returns cup to Stolistes and takes censer from Dadouchos, and making three forward swings, says:

In the name of Ic Zod Heh Chal,¹⁰ great king of the north, spirits of earth, adore Adonai!

Hierophant returns censer to Dadouchos, takes back sceptre from Hiereus, and returns to throne. All officers return to places. All members face as usual.

HIERO: In the name of Adonai ha-Aretz, I declare this temple duly opened in the 1° = 10[□] grade of Zelator.

HIERO: ווּוּ ווּוּ ווּוּ

HIEREUS: ווּוּ ווּוּ ווּוּ

HEG: ווּוּ ווּוּ ווּוּ

Ceremony of Advancement—First Part

Hierophant sits east of altar, Hiereus north, and Hegemon south.

HIERO: Fratres and sorores, our Frater (Soror) having made such progress in the paths of occult science as has enabled him (her) to pass an examination in the required knowledge, is now eligible for advancement to this grade, and I have duly received a dispensation from the greatly honoured chiefs of the Second Order to admit him (her) in due form. Honoured Hegemon, superintend the preparation of the Neophyte and give the customary alarm.

Hegemon salutes with $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ sign, and leaves the room by south and west. Hegemon prepares Neophyte who wears sash of the $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$ grade and is blindfolded. He carries the Fylfot Cross in right hand. Hegemon instructs Neophyte in knocks of the grade. Kerux opens the door to be just ajar.

HEG: Let me enter the portal of wisdom.

KERUX: I will.

Opens door and admits them, Kerux having turned down lights previously.

HIERO: Except Adonai build the house, their labour is but lost that build it.
Except Adonai keep the city, the watchman waketh in vain. Frater (Soror) Neophyte, by what aid dost thou seek admission to the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ grade of Zelator of the Stella Matutina?

HEG: (For Neophyte) By the guidance of Adonai; by the possession of the necessary knowledge; by the dispensation of the greatly honoured chiefs of the Second Order; by the signs and tokens of the $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$ grade; by this symbol of the hermetic cross.

Kerux takes cross from Neophyte.

HIERO: Give the step and signs of a Neophyte.

Neophyte gives them.

HIERO: Frater Kerux, receive from the Neophyte the token, grand word, and password of the $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$ grade.

Kerux places himself in front of Neophyte and says:

KERUX: Give me the grip of the Neophyte. (Done.)

Give me the grand word. (Done.)

Give me the password. (Done.)

Having received it, he turns to Hierophant, gives grade salute, and says:

KERUX: Very honoured Hierophant, I have received them.

HIERO: (To Hegemon) Lead the Neophyte to the west and set him between the mystic pillars, with his face towards the east.

Hegemon places Neophyte between the pillars, and remains behind him.

Frater (Soror) will you pledge yourself to maintain the same secrecy regarding the mysteries of this grade as you are pledged to maintain regarding those of the $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$ grade—never to reveal them to the world, and not even to confer them upon a Neophyte without a dispensation from the greatly honoured Chiefs of the Second Order?

NEO: I will.

HIERO: Then you will kneel on both your knees, lay your right hand on the ground, and say: “I swear by the earth whereon I kneel.” (Done.)

Let the symbol of blindness be removed.

Hegemon unbinds Neophyte’s eyes. Kerux turns up lights. Hegemon goes back to his proper place. Neophyte remains kneeling between the pillars with his hand on the ground. Kerux takes the salt from before the tablet of the north, and passing round the altar with Sol ¹¹ stands in front of Neophyte facing him and holds the salt in front of him.

HIERO: Take salt with your left hand and cast it to the north, saying: “Let the powers of earth witness my pledge.”

Done. Kerux replaces salt, and returns to his place.

HIERO: Let the Neophyte rise and let him be purified with water and consecrated with fire, in confirmation of his pledge, and in the name of the Lord of the Universe who works in silence and whom naught but silence can express.

Dadouchos comes forward round south pillar, stands before Neophyte and makes three forward swings of censer, saying:

DAD: In the name of the Lord of the Universe, who works in silence and whom naught but silence can express, I consecrate thee with fire.

Dadouchos returns by way he came. Stolistes comes round north pillar, stands before Neophyte, makes cross on forehead, sprinkles thrice, saying:

STOL: In the name of the Lord of the Universe, who works in silence and whom naught but silence can express, I purify thee with water.

Returns to place as he came.

HIERO: The $0^\circ = 0^\square$ grade of Neophyte is a preparation for other grades, a threshold before our discipline, and it shows by its imagery, the light of the hidden knowledge dawning in the darkness of creation; and you are now to begin to analyse and comprehend the nature of that light. To this end, you stand between the pillars, in the gateway where the secrets of the $0^\circ = 0^\square$ grade were communicated to you.

Prepare to enter the immeasurable region.

And Tetragrammaton Elohim planted a garden eastward in Eden, and out of the ground made Tetragrammaton Elohim to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food; the tree of life also, in the midst of the garden, and the Tree of Knowledge of Good and of Evil. This is the tree that has two paths, and it is the tenth Sephirah Malkuth, and it has about it seven columns, and the four splendours whirl around it as in the vision of the Merkabah ¹² of Ezekiel; and from Gedulah it derives an influx of mercy, and from Geburah an influx of severity, and the tree of the knowledge of good and of evil shall it be until it is united with the supernals in Daath.

But the good which is under it is called the archangel Metatron, and the evil is called the archangel Samael, and between them lies the straight and narrow way where the archangel Sandalphon keeps watch. The souls and the angels are above its branches, and the Qliploth or demons dwell under its roots.

Let the Neophyte enter the pathway of evil.

Kerux takes his place in front of Neophyte, leads him in a northeast direction towards the Hiereus, halts, and steps out of the direct line between Hiereus and Neophyte.

HIEREUS: Whence comest thou?

KERUX: I come from between the two pillars, and I seek the light of the hidden knowledge in the name of Adonai.

HIEREUS: And the great angel Samael answered, and said: "I am the prince of darkness and of night. The foolish and rebellious gaze upon the face of the created world, and find therein nothing but terror and obscurity. It is to them the terror of darkness and they are as drunken men stumbling in the darkness. Return, for thou canst not pass by."

Kerux leads Neophyte back as he came, to between the pillars.

HIERO: Let the Neophyte enter the pathway of good.

Kerux leads Neophyte southeast and halts opposite Hegemon, stepping aside from before Neophyte.

HEG: Whence comest thou?

KERUX: I come from between the pillars, and I seek the light of the hidden knowledge in the name of Adonai.

HEG: The great angel Metatron answered, and said: "I am the angel of the presence divine. The wise gaze upon the created world and behold there the dazzling image of the Creator. Not yet can thine eyes bear that dazzling image. Return, for thou canst not pass by."

Kerux turns and leads Neophyte back between the pillars.

HIERO: Let the Neophyte enter the straight and narrow pathway which turns neither to the right hand nor to the left hand.

Kerux leads Neophyte directly up centre of hall until he is near the altar, halts, and steps aside from before Neophyte, leaving him to face altar unobstructed.

HIEREUS, HEGEMON (Together): Whence comest thou?

They cross sceptre and sword before altar.

KERUX: I come from between the pillars, and I seek the light of the hidden knowledge in the name of Adonai.

Hierophant advances to east of altar with sceptre, which he thrusts between sword of Hiereus and sceptre of Hegemon, and raising it to an angle of 45 degrees says:

HIERO: But the great angel Sandalphon said: "I am the reconciler for Earth, and the celestial soul therein. Form is invisible alike in darkness and in blinding light. I am the left hand Kerub of the Ark and the feminine power, as Metatron is the right hand Kerub and the masculine power, and I prepare the way to the celestial light."

Hegemon and Hiereus step back to south and north of altar respectively. Hierophant takes Neophyte by right hand with his left, and pointing to the altar and diagram says:

HIERO: And Tetragrammaton placed Kerubim at the east of the garden of Eden and a flaming sword which turned every way to keep the path of the Tree of Life, for He has created nature that man being cast out of Eden may not fall into the void. He has bound man with the stars as with a chain. He allures him with scattered fragments of the divine body in bird and beast and flower, and He laments over him in the wind and in the sea and in the birds. When the times are ended, He will call the Kerubim from the east of the garden, and all shall be consumed and become infinite and holy.

Receive now the secrets of this grade. The step is thus given—6 by 6—showing you have passed the threshold. The sign is given by raising the right hand to an angle of 45 degrees. It is the position in which the Hierophant interposed for you between the Hiereus and the Hegemon. The token is given by grasping fingers, the thumb touching thumb to form a triangle. It refers to the ten Sephiroth. The word is Adonai ha-Aretz, and means Adonai the Lord of the Earth, to which element this grade is allotted. The mystic number is 55, and from it is formed the password Nun He. It means “ornament,” and when given is lettered separately. The badge of this grade is the sash of the Neophyte with the narrow white border, a red cross within the triangle, and the number 1 within a circle and 10 within a square, one on each side of the triangle.

He invests Neophyte with the sash, and points out the three portals, saying:

The three portals facing you in the east, are the gates of the Paths leading to the three further grades, which with the Zelator and the Neophyte forms the first and lowest order of our fraternity. Furthermore, they represent the Paths which connect the tenth Sephirah Malkuth with the other Sephiroth. The letters Tau, Qoph, and Shin make the word Qesheth—a bow, the reflection of the rainbow of promise stretched over our earth, and which is about the throne of God.

Hegemon points out the flaming sword on the altar diagram, saying:

HEG: This drawing of the flaming sword of the Kerubim is a representation of the guardians of the gates of Eden, just as the Hiereus and Hegemon symbolise the two paths of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and of Evil.

HIEREUS: In this grade, the red cross is placed within the white triangle upon the altar, and it is thus the symbol of the Banner of the West. The triangle refers to the three Paths and the cross to the hidden knowledge. The cross and the triangle together represent life and light.

Hierophant points out the tablet of the north, saying:

HIERO: This grade is especially referred to the element of earth, and therefore one of its principal emblems is the great watchtower or terrestrial tablet of the north. It is the third or great northern quadrangle or earth tablet, and it is one of the four great Tablets of the Elements said to have been given to Enoch by the great angel Ave. It is divided within itself into four lesser angles. The mystic letters upon it form various divine and angelic names, in what our tradition calls the angelic secret language. From it are drawn the three holy secret names of God, EMOR DIAL HECTEGA,¹³ which are borne upon the Banner of the North, and there are also numberless names of angels, archangels, and spirits ruling the element of earth.

Kerux comes forward and hands Fylfot Cross to Hierophant.

HIERO: The hermetic cross, which is also called Fylfot, hammer of Thor, and swastika, is formed of seventeen squares out of a square of twenty-five lesser squares. These seventeen represent the sun, the four elements, and the twelve signs of the zodiac. In this grade, the lights on the pillars are unshaded, showing that you have quitted the darkness of the outer world. You will leave the temple for a short time.

Kerux takes Neophyte out.

Ceremony of Advancement—Second Part

The temple is arranged as in the diagram above.

HIERO: Frater Kerux, when the Neophyte gives the proper alarm, you will admit him. Fratres Stolistes and Dadouchos, assist the Kerux in the reception.

Kerux goes out and instructs Neophyte in the knocks. Stolistes and Dadouchos take up positions so as to face Neophyte as he enters hall. Kerux opens door and admits Neophyte, but does not stand in front of him.

HIERO: Frater (name), as in the grade of Neophyte, you came out of the world to the gateway of hidden knowledge, so in this grade you pass through the gateway and come into the holy place.¹⁴ You are now in the court of the Tabernacle, where stood the Altar of Burnt Offering, whereon was offered the sacrifices of animals, which symbolised the Qlippoth or evil demons who inhabit the plane contiguous to and below the material universe.

Dadouchos makes cross in air with censer and censes Neophyte in silence with three forward swings.

HIERO: Between the altar and the entrance into the holy place stood the laver of brass wherein the priests washed before entering the Tabernacle. It was the symbol of the waters of creation.

Stolistes makes cross with water on Neophyte's forehead and sprinkles thrice in silence.

Having made offering at the altar of burnt sacrifice, and having been cleansed at the laver of brass, the priest then entered the holy place.

Kerux takes Neophyte behind pillars to north. Stolistes and Dadouchos return to their places. Hiereus takes his stand between the pillars (Kerux having removed the chair) facing Neophyte. He guards the path with his sword and says:

HIEREUS: Thou canst not pass the gateway which is between the pillars, unless thou canst give the signs and words of a Neophyte.

Neophyte gives them and, instructed by Kerux, advances to a position between the pillars. Hiereus returns to his place. Hegemon comes forward, stands east of pillars facing Neophyte, and bars the way into the temple with sceptre, saying:

HEG: Thou canst not enter the holy place, unless thou canst give the sign and grip of a Zelator.

Neophyte gives them. Kerux resumes his seat after handing Neophyte over to charge of Hegemon. Hegemon leads Neophyte to north, and says:

HEG: To the northern side of the holy place stood the table of shewbread. The drawing before you represents its occult meaning. On it twelve loaves were laid as emblems of the bread of life, and it is an image of the mystery of the rose of creation. The twelve circles are the twelve signs of the zodiac, while the lamp in the centre is symbolic of the sun, which is the source of heat and life. The four triangles whose twelve angles each touch one of the twelve circles are those of fire, earth, air, and water, and allude to the four triplicities of the zodiacal signs. The triangle inscribed within each of the twelve circles alludes to the three decanates, or phases of ten degrees of each sign. On one side of each triangle is the permutation of the divine name Yod Heh Vau Heh, which is referred to that particular sign, while in the opposite side of it is the name of one of the twelve tribes which is also attributed to it.

Table of Shewbread

HEG: Now the twenty-two sounds and letters of the Hebrew alphabet are the foundations of all things. Three mothers, seven doubles, and twelve simples. The twelve simple letters are allotted to the twelve directions in space, and those diverge to infinity, and are in the arms of the Eternal. These twelve letters He designed and combined, and formed with them the twelve celestial constellations of the zodiac. They are over the universe as a king upon his throne, and they are in the revolution of the year as a king traversing his dominions, and they are in the heart of man as a king in warfare.

And the twelve loaves are the images of those ideas, and are the outer petals of the rose; while within are the four archangels ruling over the four quarters, and the Kerubic emblems of the lion, man, bull, and eagle.

Around the great central lamp, which is an image of the sun, is the great mother of heaven, symbolised by the letter Heh, the first of the simple letters, and by its number five, the pentagram, Malkah the bride, ruling in her kingdom Malkuth, crowned with a crown of twelve stars.

These twelve circles further represent the twelve foundations of the holy city of the Apocalypse, while in Christian symbolism the sun and the twelve signs are referred to Christ and His twelve apostles.

Hegemon leads Neophyte to Hiereus and then returns to his place and is seated. Hiereus leads Neophyte to the south, and says:

HIEREUS: On the southern side of the holy place stood the seven-branched candlestick, wherein was burned pure olive oil. It is an image of the mystery of the Elohim, the seven creative ideas. The symbolic drawing before you represents its occult meaning. The seven circles which surround the heptagram represent the seven planets and the seven Qabalistic palaces of Assiah, the material world—which answer to the seven Apocalyptic churches which are in Asia or Assiah¹⁵—as these again allude to the seven lamps before the throne on another plane.

HIEREUS: Within each circle is a triangle to represent the threefold creative idea operating in all things. On the right hand side of each is the Hebrew name of the angel who governs the planet; on the left side is the Hebrew name of the sphere of the planet itself; while the Hebrew letter beneath the base is one of the duplicated letters of the Hebrew alphabet which refer to the seven planets.

Seven-Branded Candlestick

The seven double letters of the Hebrew alphabet have each two sounds associated with them, one hard and one soft. They are called “double” because each letter represents a contrary or permutation, thus: life and death; peace and war; wisdom and folly; riches and poverty; grade and indignity; fertility and solitude; power and servitude.

These seven letters point out seven localities: zenith, nadir, east, west, north, south, and the place of holiness in the midst sustaining all things. The archetypal Creator designed, produced, combined, and formed with them the planets of the universe, the days of the week, and in man, the gates of the soul. He has loved and blessed the number seven more than all things under His throne. The powers of these seven letters are also shown forth in the seven palaces of Assiah and the seven stars of that vision are the seven archangels who rule them.

He leads Neophyte to west of altar, returns to his place, and is seated. Hierophant comes to east of altar, takes censer from altar, and holding it with chain short, makes cross and three forward swings, replaces it, and says:

HIERO: Before the veil of the Holy of Holies stood the altar of incense, of which this altar is an image. It was of the form of a double cube, thus representing material form as a reflection and duplication of that which is spiritual. The sides of the altar, together with the top and bottom, consist of ten squares, thus symbolising the ten Sephiroth of which the basal one is Malkuth, the realisation of the rest upon the material plane, behind which the others are concealed. For were this double cube raised in the air immediately above your head, you would but see the single square forming the lowest side, the others from their position being concealed from you. Just so, behind the material universe lies the concealed form of the majesty of God.

The Altar of Incense was overlaid with gold to represent the highest degree of purity, but the altar before you is black to represent the terrestrial earth. Learn, then, to separate the pure from the impure, and refine the gold of the spirit from the black dragon, the corruptible body. Upon the cubical altar were fire, water, and incense, the three mother letters of the Hebrew alphabet: Aleph, Mem, and Shin. Mem is silent, Shin is sibilant, and Aleph is the tongue of a balance between these contraries in equilibrium, reconciling and mediating between them. In this is a great mystery, very admirable and recondite. The fire produced the heavens, the water, the earth, and the air is the reconciler between them. In the year, they bring forth the hot, the cold, and the temperate seasons, and in man, they are imaged in the head, the chest, and the trunk.

I now confer upon you the mystic title of Periclinus de Faustis,¹⁶ which signifies that on this earth you are in a wilderness, far from the garden of the happy.

And I give you the symbol of Aretz which is the Hebrew name for earth, to which the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ grade of Zelator is referred. The word Zelator is derived from the ancient Egyptian Zaruator, signifying “Searcher of Athor,” goddess of nature; but others assign to it the meaning of the zealous student whose first duty was to blow the athanor of fire which heated the crucible of the alchemist.

Hierophant resumes seat on dais. Kerux leads new Zelator to seat in northwest.

HIERO: Frater Kerux, you have my command to declare that our frater has been duly admitted to the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ grade of Zelator.

Kerux comes to northwest of Hierophant, faces west, raises wand and says:

KERUX: In the Name of Adonai Melekh, and by command of the very honoured Hierophant, hear ye all that I proclaim that Frater (name) has been duly admitted to the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ grade of Zelator, and that he has obtained the mystic title of Periclinus (Pericline)¹⁷ de Faustis and the symbol of Aretz.

He returns to his place by east, saluting, and by south and west.

HIERO: In the Zelator grade, the symbolism of the tenth Sephirah Malkuth is especially shown, as well as the tenth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah. Among other mystic titles, Malkuth is called Shaar, the Gate, which by metathesis becomes Ashur, meaning the number ten. Also in Chaldee it is called Thraa, the Gate, which has the same number as the great name Adonai, written in full: Aleph, Daleth, Nun, Yod, which both equal 671 in total numeration. It is also called “the gate of death,” “the gate of tears,” “the gate of justice,” “the gate of prayer,” and “the gate of the daughter of the mighty ones.” It is also called “the gate of the garden of Eden” and the inferior mother, and in Christian symbolism, it is connected with the three holy women at the foot of the Cross. The tenth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah which answereth to Malkuth is called “the resplendent intelligence,” because it exalts above every head and sitteth upon the throne of Binah. It illuminateth the splendour of all the lights (the zohar me-ouroth), and causeth the current of the divine influx to descend from the prince of countenances, the great archangel Metatron.

Frater (name), before you can be eligible for advancement to the next grade of $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$, you will be required to pass an examination in certain subjects. A manuscript on these will be supplied to you. When you are well satisfied that you are well informed on these, notify the officer in charge.

Closing of the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ Grade

HIERO: Fratres and sorores, assist me to close this temple in the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ grade of Zelator.

All rise.

Frater Kerux, see that the temple is properly guarded.

KERUX: (On inner side of the door, knocks. Sentinel knocks.) Very honoured Hierophant, the temple is properly guarded.

HIERO: Let us adore the Lord and King of Earth.

All face east.

Adonai ha-Aretz, Adonal Melekh, blessed be Thy name unto the countless ages. Amen.

Hierophant gives $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ sign. All give sign and face as usual. Hierophant leaves his throne and passes to the north, standing before the tablet of the north, Hiereus stands on right of Hierophant; Hegemon on his left; Kerux behind Hierophant; Stolistes behind Hiereus, Dadouchos behind Hegemon.

HIERO: Let us rehearse the prayer of the earth spirits:

“O invisible king, who, taking the earth for foundation, didst hollow its depths to fill them with Thy almighty power. Thou whose name shaketh the arches of the world, Thou who causest the seven metals to flow in the veins of the rocks, king of the seven lights, rewarder of the subterranean workers, lead us into the desirable air and into the realm of splendour. We watch and we labour unceasingly, we seek and we hope, by the twelve stones of the holy city, by the buried talismans, by the axis of the lodestone which passes through the centre of the earth—O Lord, O Lord, O Lord! Have pity upon those who suffer. Expand our hearts, unbind and upraise our minds, enlarge our natures.

“O stability and motion! O darkness veiled in brilliance! O day clothed in night! O master who never dost withhold the wages of Thy workmen! O silver whiteness—O golden splendour! O crown of living and harmonious diamond! Thou who wearest the heavens on Thy finger like a ring of sapphire! Thou who hidest beneath the earth in the kingdom of gems, the marvelous seed of the stars! Live, reign, and be Thou the eternal dispenser of the treasures whereof Thou hast made us the wardens.”

Depart ye in peace unto your abodes. May the blessing of Adonai be upon you. (Makes Banishing Pentagram of Earth.) Be there peace between us and you, and be ye ready to come when ye are called.

All return to their places and face as usual.

HIERO: In the Name of Adonai Melekh, I declare this temple closed in the grade of Zelator.

HIERO: וְיָרֵם וְיָרֵם וְיָרֵם

HIEREUS: וְיָרֵם וְיָרֵם וְיָרֵם

HEG: וְיָרֵם וְיָרֵם וְיָרֵם

8. Note by JMG: This statement is in the original documents, but is not quite accurate; the Sentinel has no part in the ceremonial work of the Zelator, while he has an active role in the Neophyte grade.

9. Note by JMG: Properly spelled MOR DIAL HCTGA; see Part One of the Book of the Concourse of the Forces.
10. Note by JMG: Properly spelled ICZHIHAL or ICZHIHCHAL.
11. Note by JMG: That is to say, clockwise.

13. Note by JMG: See footnote 43.
14. Note by JMG: The description that follows is based on the description of the Hebrew tabernacle in Exodus 26 and 27. The “holy place” is the inner sanctuary of the Tabernacle, where the ark of the covenant was kept.
15. Note by JMG: The seven churches in Asia named in the second and third chapters of the Book of Revelation, a staple of Christian Qabalah and esoteric Christianity generally.
16. Note by JMG: Pereclinus de Faustis in Latin means “fallen away from the happy.” The meanings of the mystic titles of later grades are given in the text of the rituals.
17. Note by JMG: Pericline is the feminine form, and should be used when a soror is initiated.

Ceremony of Advancement in the Path of Tau

HIERO: (Knocks) Fratres and sorores, our Frater (Soror) (name) having made such progress in the paths of occult knowledge as has enabled him to pass an examination in the requisite knowledge, is now eligible for advancement to the grade of Theoricus, and I have duly received a dispensation from the greatly honoured Chiefs of the Second Order, to advance him in due form.

Honoured Hegemon, superintend the preparation of the Zelator and give the customary alarm.

Hegemon rises and saluting, quits the temple. He prepares the Zelator by seeing he is robed and wearing his sash, presents him with Greek cubical cross, hoodwinks him, and comes to the door, giving the knock.

Kerux meanwhile, places fan by Hierophant, lamp by Hegemon, cup by Hiereus, and salt by his own place. Kerux, on hearing the alarm, opens the door and allows Hegemon to enter with Zelator, and then closes it.

HEG: Quit the material and seek the spiritual.

HIERO: Conduct the Zelator to the east.

HIERO: Give me the step and sign of a Zelator. (Done.)

Give me the grip or token. (Done.)

Give me the grand word, mystic title, and the mystic number of a Zelator.
What is the password formed from the mystic number?

This is done, Hegemon prompting if necessary.

HIERO: Frater Periclinus de Faustis, do you solemnly pledge yourself to maintain the same strict secrecy regarding the mysteries of the thirty-second Path and the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ grade of Theoricus, which you have already sworn to maintain regarding those of the preceding grades?

ZELATOR: I do. (Kerux gives back cross to Zelator.)

HIERO: Then you will stretch out your hand, holding the cubical cross towards heaven, and say: "I swear by the Firmament of Heaven."

This is done, Zelator repeating the words.

HIERO: Let the hoodwink be removed.

Done. Hegemon returns to his place in the south. Kerux is now in charge of Zelator.

HIERO: Stretch forth your right hand, holding the cubical cross towards the east, in the position of the Zelator sign, saying: "Let the powers of air witness my pledge."

Done.

HIERO: (Knocks) Facing you are the portals of the thirty-first, thirty-second, and twenty-ninth Paths leading from the grade of Zelator to the three other grades which are beyond. The only Path now open to you, however, is the thirty-second, which leads to the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ of Theoricus, and which you must traverse before arriving at that grade.

Take in your right hand the cubical cross and in your left the Banner of Light (gives it to him) and follow your guide, Anubis the Guardian, who leads you from the material to the spiritual.

KERUX: Anubis the Guardian said to the aspirant, "Let us enter the presence of the Lord of Truth. Arise and follow me."

Kerux turns to the right and leads Zelator round the hall once slowly, while Hiereus reads. Hierophant rises with Banner of the West in left hand, fan in right.

HIEREUS: The sphinx of Egypt spake and said: "I am the synthesis of the elemental forces. I am also the symbol of man. I am life and I am death. I am the child of the night of time."

As Kerux and Zelator approach the east, Hierophant bars the way with the Banner of the West and fan.

HIERO: The priest with the mask of Osiris spake and said: "Thou canst not pass the gate of the eastern heaven unless thou canst tell me my name."

KERUX: Thou art Nu, goddess of the Firmament of Air. Thou art Hormaku, lord of the eastern sun.

HIERO: In what signs and symbols do ye come?

KERUX: In the letter Aleph, in the Banner of Light, and the symbol of the equated forces.

Hierophant stands back and makes sign of Aquarius before Zelator with fan.

HIERO: In the sign of the man, child of air, thou art purified. Pass thou on.

Gives the Banner of the West to Kerux who leads Zelator on, and hands the banner to Hegemon in passing, while Hiereus again reads:

HIEREUS: I am Osiris, the soul in twin aspect, united to the higher by purification, perfected by suffering, glorified through trial. I have come where the great gods are, through the power of the mighty name.

Kerux and Zelator have now reached Hegemon, who bars their way, lamp in right hand, the Banner of the West in left hand.

HEG: The priest with the mask of the lion spake and said: "Thou canst not pass by the gate of the southern heaven unless thou canst tell me my name."

KERUX: Mau the lion, very powerful, lord of fire, is thy name. Thou art Ra, the sun in his strength.

HEG: In what signs and symbols do ye come?

KERUX: In the letter Shin, in the Banner of the East, and the symbol of the cubical cross.

HEG: (Standing back and making the sign of Leo before Zelator with lamp.)

In the sign of the lion, child of fire, thou art purified. Pass thou on.

He replaces lamp and takes the place of Kerux, who returns to his seat in the north. Hegemon leads Zelator past Hiereus, to whom he hands the Banner of the West. Meanwhile, Hiereus reads for the third time, Hegemon being careful to lead Zelator slowly round the temple, returning to Hiereus when the speech is finished.

HIEREUS: (As they go round the third time) I have passed through the gates of the firmament. Give me your hands, for I am made as ye, ye lords of truth! For ye are the formers of the soul.

Hiereus puts down sword and stands with cup in right hand, the Banner of the West in left; barring the way of Hegemon and Zelator.

HIEREUS: The priest with the mask of the eagle spake and said: "Thou canst not pass the gate of the western heaven unless thou canst tell me my name."

HEG: Heka, mistress of Hesur, ruler of water, is thy name. Thou art Toum, the setting sun.

HIEREUS: In what signs and symbols do ye come?

HEG: In the letter Mem, in the Banner of Light, and the symbol of the twenty-two letters.

HIEREUS: (Standing back and making sign of  eagle's head ¹⁸ over Zelator with cup.) In the sign of the eagle, child of water, thou art purified. Pass thou on.

He gives the Banner of the West to Hegemon who continues to circumambulate with Zelator, giving the Banner of the West to Kerux as he passes him. Hiereus reads as they go round the fourth time, while Kerux rises with salt in his right hand, the Banner of the West in left.

HIEREUS: (As they go round) O Lord of the Universe, Thou art above all things and Thy name is in all things; and before Thee, the shadows of night roll back and the darkness hasteth away.

KERUX: (Barring the way with salt and the Banner of the West) The priest with the mask of the ox spake and said: “Thou canst not pass the gate of the northern heaven unless thou canst tell me my name.”

HEG: Satem in the abode of Shu, the bull of earth, is thy name. Thou art Khephra, the sun at night.

KERUX: In what signs and symbols do ye come?

HEG: In the letters Aleph, Mem, and Shin, and in the symbols of banner and cross.

Kerux: (Standing back, and makes the sign of Taurus over Zelator with salt.) In the sign of the head of the ox, child of the elements, thou art purified. Pass thou on.

Hegemon leads the Zelator to Hierophant between the pillars; Kerux accompanies them with the Banner of the West, which he hands to Hierophant to replace on stand. Hegemon now hands up the Banner of the East, which Zelator has been holding. This is also replaced. Hegemon hands cubical cross to Hierophant. Kerux collects the fan, lamp, cup, and salt and replaces them in their right places on the altar, round the diagram.

HIERO: (Holding cubical cross.) The cubical cross is a fitting emblem of the equilibrated and balanced forces of the elements. It is composed of twenty-two squares externally, thus referring to the twenty-two letters that are placed thereon. Twenty-two are the letters of the eternal voice, in the vault of heaven; in the depth of earth; in the abyss of water; in the all-presence of fire. Heaven cannot speak their fullness—earth cannot utter it. Yet hath the Creator bound them in all things. He hath mingled them in water. He hath whirled them aloft in fire. He hath sealed them in the air of heaven. He hath distributed them through the planets. He hath assigned unto them the twelve constellations of the universe. (Places cross aside.)

The thirty-second Path of the Sepher Yetzirah, which answereth unto the letter Tau, is called the administrative intelligence, and it is so called because it directeth and associateth in all their operations, the seven planets, even all of them in their own due courses. To it, therefore, is attributed the due knowledge of the seven abodes of Assiah, the material world, which are symbolised in the Apocalypse by the seven churches.¹⁹

It refers to the universe as composed of the four elements, to the Kerubim, to the Qlipboth, and to the astral plane. It is the reflection of the sphere of Saturn. It represents the connecting and binding link between the material and formative worlds, Assiah and Yetzirah, and necessarily passes through the astral plane, the abode of the elementals and the shells of the dead. It is the rending of the veil of the tabernacle, whereon the Kerubim and the palm trees are depicted. It is the passing of the gate of Eden.

Hierophant rises and leads Zelator to the west of altar. He draws attention to the key of the Universe.

Tarot Key 21, The Universe

HIERO: These ideas are symbolically resumed in the representation of the twenty-first key of the tarot in front of you. Within the oval formed of the seventy-two circles, is a female form, nude save for a scarf that floats round her. She is crowned with the lunar crescent of Isis and holds in her hands two wands. Her legs form a cross. She is the bride of the Apocalypse, the Kabbalistic queen of the Canticles, the Egyptian Isis or great feminine Kerubic angel Sandalphon on the left hand of the mercy seat of the ark.

The wands are the directing forces of the positive and negative currents. The seven pointed heptagram or star alludes to the seven palaces of Assiah; the crossed legs to the symbol of the four letters of the name.²⁰

The surmounting crescent receives alike the influences of Geburah and Gedulah. She is the synthesis of the thirty-second Path, uniting Malkuth to Yesod.

The oval of the seventy-two smaller circles refers to the Schemhamphoresch, or seventy-twofold name of the deity. The twelve larger circles form the zodiac. At the angles are the four Kerubim, which are the vivified powers of the letters of the name Yod He Vau He operating in the elements, through which you have just symbolically passed in the preceding ceremony.

The fan, lamp, cup, and salt represent the four elements themselves, whose inhabitants are the sylphs, salamanders, undines, and gnomes.

Be thou, therefore, prompt and active as the sylphs, but avoid frivolity and caprice. Be energetic and strong as the salamanders, but avoid irritability and ferocity. Be flexible and attentive to images, like the undines, but avoid idleness and changeability; be laborious and patient like the gnomes, but avoid grossness and avarice.

So shalt thou gradually develop the powers of thy soul, and fit thyself to command the spirits of the elements.

The altar, as in the preceding degree, represents the material universe. On its right is symbolically the garden of Eden, represented by the station of Hegemon, while on its left is symbolically Gehenna, the abode of shells, represented by the station of Kerux.

Hierophant returns to his throne. Kerux steps forward and stands at Zelator's left hand.

HIERO: I have much pleasure in conferring on you the title of Lord of the thirty-second Path. You will now quit the temple for a short time, and on your return the ceremony of your reception into the 2° = 9th grade of Theoricus will be proceeded with.

Kerux leads Zelator out.

Ceremony of Reception into the 2° = 9th Grade

Theoricus Temple 2

Temple arranged as in diagram. Kerux takes up caduceus badge.

HIERO: Frater Kerux, you have my commands to instruct the Zelator in the proper alarm, and to present him with the necessary admission badge. Honoured Hegemon, guard the portal and admit them on giving the proper alarm.

Kerux takes caduceus admission badge and brings Zelator to the door to give the knocks. Hegemon opens the door and leads Zelator in a little way and faces him to Hierophant.

HIERO: Frater Periclinus de Faustis, as in the Zelator grade there were given the symbolical representations of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and of Evil, of the gate of Eden, and of the holy place, so in this grade of Theoricus, the sanctum sanctorum with the ark and the Kerubim is shown, as well as the garden of Eden with which it coincides; while in the thirty-second Path leading hereunto, through which you have just symbolically passed, the Kerubic guardians are represented, and the palm trees or trees of progression in the garden of Eden. Honoured Hegemon, conduct the Zelator to the west, and place him thus before the portal of the thirty-second Path of Tau by which he has symbolically entered.

Done. Zelator faced to west, Kerux returns to place.

HIEREUS: By what symbol dost thou enter herein?

HEG: By the peculiar emblem of the Kerux, which is the caduceus of Hermes.

Zelator hands it to Hiereus, who turns it towards Zelator, and reads:

HIEREUS: The Tree of Life and the three mother letters are the keys wherewith to unlock the caduceus of Hermes. The upper point of the wand rests on Kether, and the wings stretch out to Chokmah and Binah, the three supernal Sephiroth. The lower seven are embraced by the serpents, whose heads fall upon Chesed and Geburah.

They are the twin serpents of Egypt—the currents of the Astral Light. Furthermore, the wings and top of the wand form the letter Shin, the symbol of fire; the heads and upper halves of the serpents form Aleph, the symbol of air; while their tails enclose Mem, the symbol of water. The fire of life above, the waters of creation below, and the air symbol vibrating between them.

Hierophant comes to the east of altar. Hegemon directs Zelator to face him from the west of the altar, and then returns to his place.

Tree of Life

HIERO: The symbols before you represent alike the garden of Eden and the holy of holies. Before you stands the Tree of Life formed of the Sephiroth and their connecting Paths. Into its complete symbolism, it is impossible to enter here, for it is the key of all things when rightly understood. Upon each Sephira are written in Hebrew letters its name, the divine names, and those of angels and archangels attributed thereto.

The connecting Paths are twenty-two in number and are distinguished by the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet, making with the ten Sephiroth themselves the thirty-two Paths of Wisdom of the Sepher Yetzirah.

Sword and Serpent

HIERO: The course of the Hebrew letters, as placed on the Paths, forms as you see, the symbol of the serpent of wisdom, while the natural succession of the Sephiroth forms the flaming sword, and the course of the lightning flash, as shown in the drawing below. The cross within the triangle, apex downwards, placed upon the altar at the base of the Tree of Life, refers to the four rivers of paradise, while the angles of the triangles refer to the three Sephiroth—Netzach, Hod, and Yesod. The two pillars, right and left of the Tree, are the symbols of active and passive, male and female, Adam and Eve. They also allude to the pillars of fire and cloud which guided the Israelites in the wilderness, and the hot and moist natures are further marked by the red lamp and the cup of water.

The pillars further represent the two Kerubim of the ark—the right, Metatron, male, and the left, Sandalphon, female.

Above them ever burn the lamps of their spiritual essence, of which they are partakers in the eternal uncreated One.

Hierophant stands in the sign of Theoricus.

HIERO: Glory be unto Thee, Lord of the Land of Life, for Thy splendour filleth the universe.

After a short pause, Hierophant comes to the west of the altar, and says:

The 2° = 9th grade of Theoricus is referred to Yesod, as the Zelator grade is to Malkuth. The Path between them is assigned to the letter Tau, whose portal you now see in the west, and through which you have just symbolically passed.

To this grade, as to those preceding it, certain signs and tokens are attributed. They consist of a sign, token, grand word, mystic number, and password formed therefrom.

The sign is thus given. Stand with feet together and raise both arms upwards and back, palms up, as if supporting a weight, thus (makes sign). It represents you in the Path of Yesod, supporting the pillars of mercy and severity. It is the sign made by the Greek god Atlas, who supported the universe on his shoulders and whom Hercules was directed to emulate. It is the Isis of nature, supporting the heavens.

The grip is that of the First Order, which you received in the preceding grade.

The grand word is a name of seven letters, Shaddai El Chai, which means the almighty and living one.

The mystic number is forty-five, and from it is formed the password which is Mem He, the secret name of the world of formation. It should be lettered separately when given.

Unto this grade and unto the Sephirah Yesod, the ninth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah is referred. It is called the pure and clear intelligence, and it is so called because it purifieth and maketh clear the Sephiroth, proveth and emendeth the forming of their representation, and disposeth their duties or harmonies, wherein they combine, without mutilation or division.

The distinguishing badge of this grade, which you are now entitled to wear, is the sash of the Zelator, with the addition of a white cross above the triangle and the numbers two and nine in a circle and square respectively, left and right of its summit— and beneath the triangle, the number thirty-two between two narrow parallel white lines.

Hierophant returns to east and sits down. Hegemon guides Zelator to him.

HIERO: The three portals facing you are the gates of Paths leading from this grade. That on the right connects with the grade of Philosophus, that on your left with the grade of Practicus, while the central one leads to the Portal.

This grade especially refers to the element of air, and therefore the great watchtower or terrestrial tablet of the east forms one of its principal emblems. It is one of the four great tablets delivered unto Enoch by the great angel Ave.

From it are drawn the three holy secret names of God, ORO IBAH AOZPI, which are borne upon the Banner of the East, and numberless divine and angelic names which appertain unto the element of air.

To the moon, also, is this grade related. Its kamea or mystical square is shown in the east, with seals and names appropriate thereto.

It is also shown inscribed upon the Tree of Life, whereon its crescent in increase represents the side of mercy—in decrease the side of severity, while at the full it reflects the sun of Tiphareth.

Hegemon conducts Zelator to a seat west of the altar.

HIERO: I now congratulate you on having attained the grade of Theoricus and in recognition thereof, I confer upon you the mystic title of Poraïos de Rejectis which means “brought from among the rejected,” and I give you the symbol of ruach, which is the Hebrew name for air.

(Knocks) Frater Kerux, you have my command to declare that the Zelator has been duly advanced to the grade of Theoricus.

KERUX: In the name of Shaddai El Chai, and by command of the very honoured Hierophant, hear ye all that I proclaim that our Frater (name), having made sufficient progress in the study of occult science, has been duly advanced to the 2° = 9th grade of Theoricus, lord of the thirty-second Path, and that he has received the mystic title of Poraïos de Rejectis, and the symbol of ruach.

HIERO: Frater (name), before you are eligible for advancement to the next grade, you must be perfect in certain subjects, a manuscript of which will be supplied to you.

Closing of the 2° = 9th Grade

HIERO: (Knocks) Assist me to close the temple in the grade of Theoricus.

All rise.

Frater Kerux, see that the temple is properly guarded. (Done.)

KERUX: (Knocks) Very honoured Hierophant, the temple is properly guarded.

HIERO: (Knocks) Let us adore the Lord and King of Air.

All face east. New Theoricus is directed to stand facing east.

HIERO: Shaddai El Chai, almighty and ever-living, blessed be Thy name unto the countless ages. Amen.

All salute. Officers form in the east as in opening. Members stand facing east. Hiereus remains standing just behind new Theoricus.

HIERO: (Knocks) Let us rehearse the prayer of the sylphs or air spirits.

“Spirit of life! Spirit of wisdom! Whose breath giveth forth and withdraweth the form of all things:

“Thou, before whom the life of beings is but a shadow which changeth, and a vapour which passeth:

“Thou, who mountest upon the clouds, and who walkest upon the wings of the wind.

“Thou, who breathest forth Thy breath, and endless space is peopled:

“Thou, who drawest in Thy breath, and all that cometh from Thee, returneth unto Thee!

“Ceaseless motion, in eternal stability, be Thou eternally blessed!

“We praise Thee and we bless Thee in the changeless empire of created light, of shades, of reflections, and of images;

“And we aspire without cessation unto Thy immutable and imperishable brilliance.

“Let the ray of Thy intelligence and the warmth of Thy love penetrate even unto us!

“Then that which is volatile shall be fixed; the shadow shall be a body; the spirit of air shall be a soul; the dream shall be a thought.

“And no more shall we be swept away by the tempest, but we shall hold the bridles of the winged steeds of dawn.

“And we shall direct the course of the evening breeze to fly before Thee!

“O Spirit of Spirits! O eternal Soul of Souls!

“O imperishable breath of life! O creative sigh! O mouth which breathest forth and withdrawest the life of all beings, in the flux and reflux of thine eternal Word, which is the divine ocean of movement and of truth!”

Hierophant makes with sceptre the banishing circle and pentagrams in the air before the tablet.

HIERO: Depart ye in peace unto your habitations. May the blessing of Yod He Vau He rest with ye. Be there peace between us and you, and be ye ready to come when ye are called.

All return to their places.

In the name of Shaddai El Chai, I declare this temple closed in the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ grade of Theoricus.

Ceremony of Advancement in the Path of Shin

HIERO: Fratres and sorores, our Frater (or Soror) (name) having made such progress in the path of occult science as has enabled him to pass an examination in the requisite knowledge, is now eligible for advancement to the grade of Practicus, and I have duly received a dispensation from the greatly honoured Chiefs of the Second Order to advance him in due form. Honoured Hegemon, superintend the preparation of the Theoricus and give the customary alarm.

Hegemon rises. He proceeds to leave the temple, pausing before Hierophant's throne to salute with the grade sign. The Theoricus should be robed and wearing the sash of his grade. Hegemon gives him the badge—the solid triangular pyramid²³—hoodwinks him, and leads him to the door. Hegemon gives the alarm—וִוִּו וִוִּו. Hiereus opens the door, admits them, and returns to his seat.

HEG: His throne was like a fiery flame and the wheels as burning fire.

Hegemon conducts the Theoricus to the west and takes the pyramid. Theoricus is faced towards Hiereus who rises.

HIEREUS: Give me the sign of the grade of Theoricus. Give me the grip. Give the grand word, the mystic number, and password. Give me also the mystic title and symbol you received in that grade.

All these are given, prompted by the Hegemon if necessary.

HIERO: Frater Poraïos de Rejectis, do you solemnly pledge yourself to maintain the same strict secrecy regarding the mysteries of the thirty-first and thirtieth Paths of this grade of Practicus, which you have already sworn to maintain respecting those of the preceding grades?

THEO: I do. (Theoricus is faced west before tablet by Hegemon.)

HIERO: Then you will stretch forth your hand in the position of the saluting sign of a Neophyte and say: “I swear by the abyss of the waters.”

Done. Theoricus repeating the words.

Let the hoodwink be removed.

Done. Hegemon places in his hand the cup of water before the tablet.

Sprinkle with your hand a few drops of water towards the tablet of water in the west and say: “Let the powers of water witness my pledge.”

Done. Theoricus repeats the words. Hegemon replaces cup.

Conduct the Theoricus to the east and place him between the mystical pillars. (Done.)

Before you are the portals of the thirty-first, thirty-second, and twenty-ninth Paths. Of these, as you already know, the central one leads to the grade of Theoricus from that of Zelator. The one on your left hand now open to you is the thirty-first, which leads from the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ of Zelator to the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ of Practicus.

Take in your right hand the pyramid of flame, and follow your guide, Axiokersa, the Kabir,²⁴ who leads you through the Path of Fire.

Hegemon leads the Theoricus between the pillars, past Hierophant, making the saluting sign of a Neophyte in passing, circumambulates the hall and halts at Hierophant's throne. Hierophant rises as they approach, red lamp in hand.

Axieros, the first Kabir, spake unto Kasmillos the candidate, and said: “I am the apex of the triangle of flame. I am the solar fire pouring forth its beams upon the lower world—life-giving, light-producing. By what symbol dost thou seek to pass by?”

HEG: By the symbol of the pyramid of flame.

HIERO: Hear thou the voice of Axieros, the first Kabir: “The mind of the Father whirled forth in reechoing roar—comprehending by invincible will, ideas omniform, which flying forth from that one fountain issued. For, from the Father alike were the will and the end, by which yet they are connected with the Father, according to alternating life through varying vehicles.

“But as they were divided asunder, being by intellectual fire distributed into other intellectuals. For the King of all previously placed before the polymorphous world, by which the universe shines forth decked with ideas all various, of which the foundation is One and Alone. From this: the others rush forth distributed and separated through the various bodies of the universe and are borne in swarms through its vast abysses, ever whirling forth in illimitable radiation.

“They are intellectual conceptions from the paternal fountain, partaking abundantly of the brilliance of fire in the culmination of unresting time.

“But the primary, self-perfect fountain of the Father pours forth these primogenial ideas. These being many, ascend flashingly into the shining world and in them are contained the three supernals—because it is the operator—because it is the giver of the life-bearing fire—because it filleth the life-producing bosom of Hecate—and it instilleth into the synoches, the enlivening strength of fire, endued with mighty power.

“The Creator of all, self-operating, formed the world, and there was a certain mass of fire, and all these self-operating He produced, so that the cosmic body might be completely conformed—that the cosmos might be manifest and not appear membranous.

“And He fixed a vast multitude of in-wandering stars, not by a strain laborious and hurtful, but to uphold them with stability, void of movement—forcing fire forward into fire.”

Hereunto is the speech of Axieros.

Hegemon leads Theoricus to the seat of Hiereus who rises holding his red lamp. They halt before him.

HIEREUS: Axiokersos, the second Kabir, spake to Kasmillos the candidate and said: “I am the left basal angle of the triangle of flame. I am the fire volcanic and terrestrial, flashingly flaming through abysses of earth—fire rending—fire penetrating—tearing asunder the curtain of matter—fire constrained—fire tormented—raging and whirling in lurid storm. By what sign dost thou seek to pass by?

HEG: By the symbol of the pyramid of flame.

Hegemon returns to his place—signing Theoricus to remain.

HIEREUS: Hear thou the voice of Axiokersos, the second Kabir: “For not in matter did the fire which is in the beyond first enclose his power in acts, but in mind; for the former of the fiery world is the mind of mind, who first sprang from mind, clothing the one fire with the other fire, binding them together so that he might mingle the fountainous craters while preserving unsullied the brilliance of his own fire—and thence a fiery whirlwind drawing down the brilliance of the flashing flame—penetrating the abysses of the universe; thencefrom downwards all extend their wondrous rays, abundantly animating light, fire, aether, and the universe.

“From him leap forth all relentless thunders, and the whirlwind-wrapped, storm-enrolled bosom of the all-splendid strength of Hecate, Father-begotten, and he who encircleth the brilliance of fire and the strong spirit of the poles, all fiery beyond.” Hereunto is the speech of Axiokersos.

Hiereus leads Theoricus round to Hegemon who rises with lamp.

HEG: Axiokersa, the third Kabir, spake to Kasmillos the candidate, and said: “I am the right basal angle of the triangle of flame. I am the fire astral and fluid, winding and coruscating through the firmament. I am the life of beings—the vital heat of existence. By what sign dost thou seek to pass by?”

Hiereus prompts Theoricus and returns to his place after placing a seat west of the Altar for Theoricus.

THEO: By the symbol of the pyramid of flame.

HEG: Hear thou the voice of Axiokersa, the third Kabir: “The Father hath withdrawn Himself but hath not shut up His own fire in His intellectual power. All things are sprung from that one fire, for all things did the Father of all things perfect, and delivered them over to the second mind whom all races of men call first. The mind of the Father riding on the subtle girders which glitter with the tracings of inflexible and relentless fire.

“The soul, being a brilliant fire, by the power of the Father remaineth immortal and is mistress of life, and filleth up the many recesses of the bosom of the world, the channels being intermixed, wherein she performeth the works of incorruptible fire.” Hereunto is the speech of Axiokersa.

Hegemon places Theoricus in the seat in the west facing Hierophant.

HIERO: Stoop not down unto the darkly splendid world wherein continually lieth a faithless depth, and Hades wrapped in clouds delighting in unintelligible images, precipitous, winding, a black ever-rolling abyss, ever espousing a body, unluminous, formless, and void.

Nature persuadeth us that there are pure daemons and that even the evil germs of matter may alike become useful and good. But these are mysteries which are evolved in the profound abyss of the mind.

Such a fire existeth extending through the rushings of air, or even a fire formless whence cometh the image of a voice, or even a flashing light, abounding, whirling forth, crying aloud. Also there is the vision of the fire-flashing courser of light, or of a child borne aloft on the shoulders of the celestial steed, fiery or clothed in gold, or naked and shooting with a bow, shafts of light, and standing on the shoulders of a horse.

But if thy meditation prolongeth itself, thou shalt unite all these symbols in the form of a lion.

Then when no longer are visible to thee the vault of the heavens, and the mass of the earth; when to thee, the stars have lost their light and the lamp of the moon is veiled; when the earth abideth not and around thee is the lightning flame—then call not before thyself the visible image of the soul of nature, for thou must not behold it ere thy body is purged by the sacred rites—since, ever dragging down the soul and leading it from the sacred things, from the confines of matter, arise the terrible dog-faced demons, never showing true image unto mortal gaze.

So therefore first the priest who governeth the works of fire must sprinkle with the lustral water of the loud, resounding sea. Labour thou around the strophalos of Hecate. When thou shalt see a terrestrial demon approaching, cry aloud and sacrifice the stone Mnizourin.

Change not the barbarous names of evocation, for they are names divine, having in the sacred rites a power ineffable. And when, after all the phantoms have vanished, thou shalt see that holy and formless fire—that fire which darts and flashes through the hidden depths of the universe, hear thou the voice of fire. Hereunto is the speech of Kabir.

Hegemon conducts the Theoricus to the foot of Hierophant's throne, and taking the triangular pyramid, hands it to Hierophant.

The solid triangular pyramid is an appropriate hieroglyph of fire. It is formed of four triangles, three visible and one concealed, which yet is the synthesis of the rest. The three visible triangles represent fire, solar, volcanic, and astral, while the fourth represents the latent heat—Aud, active—Aub, passive—Aur, equilibrated—while Asch is the name of fire.²⁵

Puts pyramid aside.

The thirty-first Path of the Sepher Yetzirah which answereth unto the letter Shin is called the perpetual intelligence, and it is so called because it regulateth the proper motion of the sun and the moon in their proper order, each in an orbit convenient for it.

It is therefore a reflection of the sphere of fire, and the Path connecting the material universe as depicted in Malkuth with the pillar of severity and the side of Geburah, through the Sephirah Hod.

Hierophant rises. Hegemon steps back and when Hierophant has descended from the dais, indicates to Theoricus to follow him. He leads Theoricus to the west of the altar, Hegemon follows and stands on the south side—Hierophant being on the north.

Tarot Key 20, Judgment

HIERO: Before you upon the altar is the twentieth key of the tarot, which symbolically represents these ideas. To the uninitiated eye it apparently represents the last judgment with an angel blowing a trumpet and the dead rising from their tombs—but its meaning is far more occult and recondite than this, for it is a glyph of the powers of fire.

The angel encircled by the rainbow, whence leap coruscations of fire, and crowned with the sun, represents Michael, the great archangel, the ruler of solar fire.

The serpents which leap in the rainbow are symbols of the fiery seraphim. The trumpet represents the influence of the spirit descending from Binah, while the banner with the cross refers to the four rivers of paradise and the letters of the holy name.

He is also Axieros, the first of the Samothracian Kabiri, as well as Zeus and Osiris.

The left-hand figure below rising from the earth is Samael, the ruler of volcanic fire. He is also Axiokersos, the second Kabir, Pluto and Typhon.

The right-hand figure below is Anael, the ruler of Astral Light. She is also Axiokersa, the third Kabir, Ceres and Persephone, Isis and Nephthys. She is, therefore, represented in duplicate form, and rising from the waters. Around both these figures dart flashes of lightning.

These three principle figures form the fire triangle, and further represent fire operating in the other three elements of earth, air, and water.

The central lower figure with his back turned and his arms in the sign of the Two equals Nine, is Arel, the ruler of latent heat. He is rising from the earth as if to receive the properties of the other three. He is also Kasmillos, the candidate in the Samothracian Mysteries, and the Horus of Egypt. He rises from the rock-hewn cubical tomb and he also alludes to the candidate who traverses the Path of Fire. The three lower figures represent the Hebrew letter Shin, to which fire is especially referred. The seven Hebrew Yods allude to the Sephiroth operating in each of the planets and to the Schemhamphoresch.

Hierophant returns to his throne. Hegemon comes round to the north of the altar and stands before Theoricus, who remains in the west.

I have much pleasure in conferring on you the title of lord of the thirty-first Path.

You will now quit the temple for a short time, and on your return the ceremony of your passage of the thirtieth Path will take place.

Theoricus is led out by Hegemon, who makes the Neophyte sign on passing Hierophant's throne. Theoricus should also do this.

Ceremony of Advancement in the Path of Resh

Temple arranged as in diagram. Portal of Resh placed as shown.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, you have my commands to present the Theoricus with the necessary admission badge and to admit him.

Hegemon rises and goes to the east where he salutes in the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$. He then admits Theoricus after having given him the Greek cross of thirteen squares. As he brings him in, Hegemon says:

HEG: Behold He hath placed His Tabernacle in the sun.

He leads Theoricus to the northeast and places him facing the pillars.

HIERO: (Knocks) Frater Poraios de Rejectis, before you in the east lie the portals of the thirtieth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-eighth Paths leading from the Two equals Nine grade of Theoricus to those grades which are beyond. Of these, the only one now open to you is the thirtieth, which leads to the Three equals Eight grade of Practicus. Take in your right hand the solar Greek cross and follow your guide through the Pathway of the sun.

HEG: Before the intellectual whirlings of intellectual fire, all things are subservient through the will of the Father of all.

Hegemon leads Theoricus between pillars and halts before Hierophant, who rises, red lamp in hand.

HIERO: Axieros, the first Kabir, spake unto Kasmillos the candidate and said: “I am the sun in greatest elevation, bringing upon earth the ripening heat—fructifying all things —urging forward the growth of vegetable nature, life-giving, light-producing—crowning summer with golden harvest, and filling the lap of plenteous autumn with the purple vintage of the vine.” Thus far the voice of Axieros!

Hegemon leads Theoricus to the seat of Hiereus, who rises with red lamp.

HIEREUS: Axiokersos, the second Kabir, spake unto Kasmillos the candidate, and said: “I am the sun in greatest depression beneath the equator when cold is greatest and heat is least—withdrawing his light in darkening winter, the dweller in mist and storm.” Thus far the voice of Axiokersos!

Hegemon leads Theoricus to his own seat and taking red lamp says:

HEG: Axiokersa, the third Kabir, spake to Kasmillos the candidate and said: “I am the sun in equinox, initiating summer or heralding winter—mild and genial in operation, giving forth or withdrawing the vital heat of life.” Thus far the voice of Axiokersa!

Hiereus places a seat west of the altar. Hegemon indicates this to Theoricus. All are seated, facing Hierophant.

HIERO: The Father of all congregated the seven firmaments of the cosmos, circumscribing the heaven with convex form. He constituted a septenary of wandering existences, suspending their disorder in well-disposed zones. He made them six in number and for the seventh, he cast into the midst thereof the fire of the sun—into that centre from which all lines are equal—that the swift sun may come around that centre eagerly urging itself towards that centre of resounding light. As rays of light, his locks flow forth, stretching to the confines of space, and of the solar circles, and of the lunar flashings and of the aerial recesses, the melody of the aether and of the sun and of the passages of the moon and of the air.

The wholeness of the sun is in the supermundane orders, for therein a solar world and endless light subsist. The sun more true measureth all things by time, for he is the time of time, and his disc is in the starless above the inerratic sphere, and he is the centre of the triple world. The sun is fire and the dispenser of fire. He is also the channel for the higher fire.

O aether, sun and spirit of the moon, ye are the leaders of air. And the great goddess bringeth forth the vast sun and the brilliant moon and the wide air, and the lunar course and the solar pole. She collecteth it, receiving the melody of the aether and of the sun and of the moon, and of whatsoever is contained in air.

Unwearied doth nature rule over the worlds and works, so that the period of all things may be accomplished. And above the shoulders of the great goddess, is nature in her vastness exalted. Thus far the voice of the Kabiri.

Hegemon conducts Theoricus to Hierophant, to whom he hands the solar Greek cross.

HIERO: The solar Greek cross is formed of thirteen squares which fitly refer to the sun's motion through the zodiac, these signs being further arranged in the arms of the cross according to the four elements with the sun in the centre and representing that luminary as the centre of the whole.

The thirtieth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah which answereth to the letter Resh is called the collecting intelligence, and it is so called because from it the astrologers deduce the judgment of the stars, and of the celestial signs, and the perfections of their science according to the rules of their resolutions. It is therefore the reflection of the sphere of the sun and the Path connecting Yesod with Hod—Foundation with Splendour.

Hierophant rises. Hegemon and Theoricus step back and follow him to the altar where he places Theoricus in the west, Hierophant north, Hegemon south.

Tarot Key 19, The Sun

HIERO: Before you upon the altar is the nineteenth key of the tarot which symbolically resumes these ideas. The sun has twelve principal rays which represent the twelve signs of the zodiac. They are alternately waved and salient as symbolising the alternation of the masculine and feminine natures. These again are subdivided into the thirty-six decanates or sets of ten degrees in the zodiac, and these again into seventy-two, typifying the seventy-two quinances or sets of five, and the seventy-two-fold name Schemhamphoresch. Thus the sun embraces the whole creation in its rays.

The seven Hebrew Yods on each side, falling through the air, refer to the solar influence descending. The wall is the circle of the zodiac, and the stones are its various degrees and divisions.

The two children standing respectively on water and earth represent the generating influence of both, brought into action by the rays of the sun. They are the two inferior and passive elements, as the sun and air above them are the superior and active elements of fire and air. Furthermore, these two children resemble the sign Gemini, which unites the earthy sign of Taurus with the watery sign Cancer, and this sign was, by the Greeks and Romans, referred to Apollo and the sun.

Hierophant returns to his throne. Hegemon comes to the north by Theoricus, who remains in the west.

HIERO: I have much pleasure in conferring upon you the title of lord of the thirtieth Path. You will now quit the temple for a short time, and on your return the ceremony of your reception into the grade of Three equals Eight will take place.

Ceremony of Reception into the 3° = 8th Grade

Temple in Hod, arranged as in diagram.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, instruct the Theoricus in the proper alarm, present him with the necessary admission badge, and admit him.

Hegemon takes the badge, the cup of Stolistes, and brings Theoricus, telling him to knock רורר רורר

Place the Theoricus before the portal of the thirty-first Path by which he has symbolically entered this grade from the One equals Ten of Zelator. (Done.)

Place the Theoricus now before the portal of the thirtieth Path by which he has symbolically entered this grade from the Two equals Nine of Theoricus. (Done.)

HIEREUS: By what symbol dost thou enter herein?

HEG: By the peculiar emblem of the Stolistes, the cup of water.

HIEREUS: The Cup of the Stolistes partakes in part of the symbolism of the laver of Moses and the sea of Solomon. On the Tree of Life, it embraces nine of the Sephiroth, exclusive of Kether. Yesod and Malkuth form the triangle below, the former the apex, the latter the base. Like the caduceus, it further represents the three elements of water, air, and fire. The crescent is the water which is above the firmament, the circle is the firmament, and the triangle the consuming fire below, which is opposed to the celestial fire symbolised by the upper part of the caduceus.

Hiereus puts admission badge aside. Hegemon directs Theoricus to Hierophant whose chair should now be moved back towards the west, and placed in readiness for the candidate at the closing. Hiereus and Hegemon stand either side of the altar, facing it.

HIERO: Before you is represented the symbolism of the garden of Eden.²⁶ At the summit is the supernal Eden, containing the three supernal Sephiroth, summed up and contained in Aima Elohim, the mother supernal, the woman of the twelfth chapter of the Apocalypse, crowned with the sun and the moon under her feet, and upon her head the crown of twelve stars, Kether. And whereas the name, Yod He Vau He, is joined to the name Elohim, when it is said Tetragrammaton Elohim planted a garden eastward in Eden, so this represents the power of the Father joined thereto in the glory from the face of the Ancient of Days. And in the garden was the Tree of Knowledge of Good and of Evil, which latter is from Malkuth, which is the lowest Sephirah between the rest of the Sephiroth and the kingdom of shells, which latter is represented by the great red dragon coiled beneath, having seven heads (the seven infernal palaces) and ten horns—(the ten averse Sephiroth of evil, contained in the seven palaces).

And a river Naher went forth out of Eden, namely from the supernal triad, to water the garden (the rest of the Sephiroth), and from thence it was divided into four heads in Daath, whence it is said: “In Daath the depths are broken up and the clouds drop down dew.”²⁷ The first head is Pison, which flows into Geburah (whence there is gold.) It is the river of fire. The second head is Gihon, the river of waters, flowing into Chesed. The third is Hiddekel, the river of air, flowing into Tiphareth, and the fourth which receiveth the virtues of the other three, is Phrath, Euphrates, which floweth down upon the earth. This river going forth out of Eden is the river of the Apocalypse, the waters of life, clear as crystal proceeding out of the throne of God and the Lamb, on either side of which was the Tree of Life, bearing twelve manner of fruits. And thus do the rivers of Eden form a cross, and on that cross the great Adam, the Son who was to rule the nations with a rod of iron, is extended from Tiphareth and his arms stretch out to Gedulah and Geburah, and in Malkuth is Eve, mother of all, the completion of all, and above the universe she supporteth with her hands the eternal pillars of the Sephiroth. As it was said to you in the thirtieth Path, “And above the shoulders of that great goddess is nature in her vastness exalted.”

HIERO: The Three equals Eight grade of Practicus is referred to the Sephirah Hod and the thirtieth and thirty-first Paths, those of Resh and Shin, are bound thereto.

The sign of this grade is given thus. With the hands together, raise the arms till the elbows are level with the shoulders. With the thumbs and forefingers make a triangle on your breast thus (showing it)—a triangle apex downwards. This represents the element of water, to which this grade is attributed.

The grip or token is the general grip of the First Order. The grand word is a name of ten letters, Elohim Tzabaoth, which means lord of hosts. The mystic number is thirty-six, and from it is formed the password of this grade which is Eloah, one of the divine names. It should be lettered separately when given thus—Aleph, Lamed He. Unto this grade, and unto the Sephirah Hod, the eighth Path of the Sepher Yetsirah is referred. It is called the absolute or perfect intelligence, because it is the mean of the primordial, which hath no root to which it may be established, except in the penetralia of that Gedulah (Magnificence) which emanate from the subsisting properties thereof.

The distinguishing badge of this grade, which you are now entitled to wear, is the sash of the Theoricus with the addition of a purple cross above the white cross and the numbers three and eight within a circle and a square respectively, left and right of its summit—and below the number thirty-two, the numbers thirty and thirty-one in purple between two narrow purple lines.

This grade is especially referred to the element of water and therefore the great watchtower or tablet of the west forms one of its principal emblems.

Hierophant and Theoricus turn towards it.

It is known as the second or great western quadrangle or tablet of water, and it is one of the four great tablets delivered unto Enoch by the great angel Ave. From it are drawn the three holy secret names of God—MPH ARSL GAIOL—which are borne upon the Banner of the West, and numberless divine and angelic names which appertain unto the element of water. The meanings of the tablets of earth and air were explained to you in the preceding grades.

Turning to the altar, Hierophant indicates the cross and triangle.

HIERO: The cross above the triangle represents the power of the spirit of life rising above the triangle of the waters and reflecting the triune therein, as further marked by the lamps at the angles; while the cup of water placed at the junction of the cross and triangle represents the maternal letter Mem.

Hierophant returns to his throne in the east. Hegemon indicates the seat west of the altar to Theoricus, who sits down. Hegemon comes round the altar and removes the diagram stand, placing it in the southwest, and returns to his place. All are seated.

The portals in the east and southeast are those of the Paths which conduct to higher grades, while that in the south leads to the Four equals Seven of Philosophus, the highest grade in the First Order.

This grade of Practicus is especially related to the planet Mercury, whose kamea, or mystical square, together with seals and names formed from it, is shown in the east. The symbol of Mercury when inscribed on the Tree of Life is also shown. It embraces all but Kether. The horns spring from Daath, which is not properly a Sephirah, but rather the conjunction of Chokmah and Binah.

I now congratulate you on having passed through the ceremony of the Three equals Eight grade of Practicus, and in recognition thereof, I confer upon you the mystic title of Monocris de Astris, which means “Unicorn from the Stars;” and I give you the symbol of Mayim which is the Hebrew name for water. (Knocks.) In the name of Elohim Tzabaoth, I now proclaim that you have been duly advanced to the Three equals Eight grade of Practicus, and that you are lord of the thirtieth and thirty-first Paths.

Closing of the 3° = 8th Grade

HIERO: (Knocks) Assist me to close this temple in the Three equals Eight grade of Practicus.

All rise. The new Practicus is signed to rise.

Honoured Hegemon, see that the temple is properly guarded. (Done.)

HEG: Very honoured Hierophant, the temple is properly guarded.

HIERO: Let us adore the Lord and King of Water! (Knocks)

All face east.

HIERO: Let Elohim Tzabaoth be praised unto the countless ages of time, Amen!

Hegemon removes the seat of Practicus to the north, and leads Practicus to the east of altar, where he stands facing west. Hierophant goes to the west before the tablet of water. All face west—members arranging themselves in balanced disposition, facing west.

HIERO: (Knocks) Let us rehearse the prayer of the undines or water spirits!

“Terrible king of the sea, Thou who holdest the keys of the cataracts of heaven, and who enclosest the subterranean waters in the cavernous hollows of earth. King of the deluge and of the rains of spring. Thou who openest the sources of the rivers and of the fountains; Thou who commandest moisture which is, as it were, the blood of the earth, to become the sap of the plants. We adore Thee and we invoke Thee. Speak Thou unto us, Thy mobile and changeable creatures, in the great tempests, and we shall tremble before Thee. Speak to us also in the murmur of the limpid waters, and we shall desire Thy love.

O vastness! Wherein all the rivers of being seek to lose themselves—which renew themselves ever in Thee! O Thou ocean of infinite perfection! O height which reflectest Thyself in the depth! O depth which exhaled into the height! Lead us into the true life, through intelligence, through love! Lead us unto immortality through sacrifice, that we may be found worthy to offer one day unto Thee, the water, the blood, and the tears, for the remission of sins! Amen.”

Hierophant makes with his sceptre the banishing circle and pentagrams in the air before the tablet.

Depart ye in peace unto your habitations. May the blessing of Elohim Tzabaoth be upon you. Be there peace between us and you, and be ye ready to come when ye are called! (Knocks)

All return to their places—Practicus being directed to west of altar, facing west.

HIERO: ׀ ׀ ׀ ׀ ׀

HIEREUS: ׀ ׀ ׀ ׀ ׀

HEG: ׀ ׀ ׀ ׀ ׀

Hegemon leads out the new Practicus. They give the Neophyte sign as they pass

CEREMONY OF THE 4° = 7[□] GRADE OF PHILOSOPHUS

Arrangement of the temple for the opening and for the Path of Qoph. There are three officers—Hierophant, Hiereus, and Hegemon. The throne of the Hierophant, beside which is a cup of water and the Banner of the East, is placed before the dais in the northeast. The seat of the Hegemon is before the dais in the southeast, that of Hiereus in the west. Each officer has a cup of water. The pillars are placed about three feet in front of Hegemon's seat, and behind her is displayed the letter Qoph. The altar in the centre of the hall is supplied with a candle on either side. On it is the tarot key of the Path—the Moon. The elemental lights are lit. Incense is burning in the south. This sign represents one knock. The grade knock is 𐤒 𐤒 𐤒.

Opening of the 4° = 7th Grade

Members are assembled and clothed. Hierophant knocks. All rise.

HIERO: (Knocks) Honoured fratres and sorores, assist me to open the temple in the 4° = 7th grade of Philosophus. Honoured Hegemon, see that the temple is properly guarded. (Done.)

HEG: Very honoured Hierophant, the temple is properly guarded.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, see that none below the grade of Philosophus is present.

HIEREUS: Honoured fratres and sorores, give the signs of the 4° = 7th. (Done.) Very honoured Hierophant, all present have attained the grade of Philosophus.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, to what particular element is this grade attributed?

HEG: To the element of fire.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, to what planet does this grade especially refer?

HIEREUS: To the planet Venus.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, what Paths are attached to this grade?

HEG: The twenty-ninth, twenty-eighth, and twenty-seventh Paths of Qoph, Tzaddi, and Peh.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, to what does the twenty-ninth Path allude?

HIEREUS: To the reflection of the sphere of Pisces.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, to what does the twenty-eighth Path allude?

HEG: To the reflection of the sphere of Aquarius.

HIERO: Honoured Hiereus, to what does the twenty-seventh Path allude?

HIEREUS: To the reflection of the sphere of Mars.

HIERO: (Knocks) Let us adore the Lord and King of Fire.

Yod He Vau He Tzabaoth. Blessed be Thou—leader of armies is Thy name, Amen!

All salute. Hierophant quits his throne and goes to the south. Hegemon stands behind him in the southeast, Hiereus in the southwest. Hierophant makes the invoking pentagrams in a circle before the fire tablet.

And Elohim said, “Let us make Adam in our own image, after our own likeness, and let them have dominion.” In the name of Elohim, mighty and ruling, and in the name of Yod He Vau He Tzabaoth, spirits of fire, adore your Creator!

Hierophant takes incense from before fire tablet, and makes the sign of Leo in the air before it.

In the name of Michael, the great archangel of fire, and in the sign of the lion, spirits of fire, adore your Creator!

Makes cross with incense.

In the name and letters of the great southern quadrangle revealed unto Enoch by the great angel Ave, spirits of fire, adore your Creator!

Holds incense on high.

In the three great secret names of God borne upon the Banner of the South—OIP TEAA PEDOCE—spirits of fire, adore your Creator! In the Name of EDEL PERNAA,²⁸ great king of the south, spirits of fire, adore your Creator!

Replaces incense and returns to place. All return to places.

In the name of Yod He Vau He Tzabaoth, I declare this temple opened in the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus.

HIERO: וו וו וו ו

HIEREUS: וו וו וו ו

HEG: וו וו וו ו

Ceremony of Advancement in the Path of Qoph

HIERO: Fratres and sorores, our Frater (name) having made such progress in the paths of occult science as has enabled him to pass the examination in the requisite knowledge, and further, having been a member of the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ grade of Practicus for a period of three months, is now eligible for advancement to the grade of Philosophus, and I have duly received a dispensation from the greatly honoured Chiefs of the Second Order to advance him in due form. Honoured Hegemon, superintend the preparation of the Practicus and give the customary alarm.

Hegemon rises, salutes Hierophant with the grade sign, quits the temple, and sees that the Practicus is robed and wearing the sash of the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ grade. She hoodwinks him and places in his hand the admission badge, the Calvary Cross of twelve squares. She leads him to the temple door and gives the alarm saying, as they enter:

HEG: And the Ruach Elohim moved upon the face of the waters.

Hiereus admits them and returns to his place. Hegemon leads Practicus to the south by the tablet of fire, faces him east, and takes away cross.

HIERO: Give the Hegemon the signs and words of the Practicus grade.

HEG: Give me the sign of the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ grade. The grip or token—the grand word—the mystic number and the password of the grade of Practicus.

HIERO: Give me also the mystic title and symbol you received in that grade.

This done, Hegemon faces Practicus to the fire tablet.

Frater Monocris de Astris, do you solemnly pledge yourself to maintain the same strict secrecy regarding the mysteries of the twenty-ninth, twenty-eighth, and twenty-seventh Paths and of the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus which you have already sworn to maintain respecting those of the preceding grades?

PRACTICUS: (Prompted if necessary) I do.

HIERO: Then you will stretch your arms above your head to their full limit and say: “I swear by the torrent of fire.”

Practicus repeats words.

Let the hoodwink be removed.

Done. Hegemon gives Practicus the incense from before the tablet.

Wave the incense before the tablet of fire and say: “Let the powers of fire witness my pledge.”

Done. Practicus repeats words. Hegemon replaces incense.

Conduct the Practicus to the east and place him between the mystic pillars. (Done.) Before you are the portals of the thirty-first, thirty-second, and twenty-ninth Paths as in the grade of Zelator. The two former you have already traversed, and the portal of the twenty-ninth Path leading to the grade of Philosophus is now open to you. Take in your right hand the Calvary Cross of twelve squares and follow your guide through the Path of the Waters.

Hegemon circumambulates temple once with Practicus, having given him the Calvary Cross to carry. As they approach the east for the second time, Hierophant rises, holding up cup of water. Hegemon and Practicus halt.

The priest with the mask of Osiris spake and said: “I am water, stagnant and silent and still, reflecting all, concealing all. I am the past—I am the inundation. He who riseth from the great water is my name. Hail unto ye, dwellers of the land of night! For the rending of darkness is near.”

Hegemon leads Practicus round to Hiereus who rises, cup in hand, as they approach. Hegemon and Practicus halt before him.

HIEREUS: The priest with the mask of Horus spake and said: “I am water, turbid and troubled. I am the banisher of peace in the vast abode of the waters. None is so strong that can withstand the great waters—the vastness of their terror—the magnitude of their fear—the roar of their thundering voice. I am the future, mist-clad and shrouded in gloom. I am the recession of the torrent. The storm veiled in terror is my name. Hail unto the mighty powers of nature and the chiefs of the whirling storm!”

Hegemon takes Practicus round to his own seat, takes up cup, and says:

HEG: The priestess with the mask of Isis spake and said: “The traveller through the gates of Anubis is my name. I am water, pure and limpid, ever flowing on toward the sea. I am the ever-passing present that stands in the place of the past. I am the fertilised land. Hail unto thee, dwellers of the wings of the morning!”

Hegemon replaces cup, leads Practicus to a seat west of the altar, and returns to place.

HIERO: (Rising) I arise in the place of the gathering of the waters, through the rolled back cloud of night. From the Father of waters went forth the spirit, rending asunder the veils of darkness. And there was but a vastness of silence and of depth in the place of the gathering waters. Terrible was the silence of that uncreated world—immeasurable the depth of that abyss. And the countenances of darkness half-formed arose—they abode not—they hasted away—and in the darkness of vacancy, the spirit moved and the lightbearers existed for a space.

I have said darkness of darkness—are not the countenances of darkness fallen with kings? Do the sons of the night of time last for ever? And have they not yet passed away? Before all things are the waters and the darkness and the gates of the land of night. And the chaos cried aloud for the unity of form—and the face of the Eternal arose. Before the glory of that countenance the night rolled back and the darkness hasted away. In the waters beneath was that face reflected, in the formless abyss of the void. From those eyes darted rays of terrible splendour which crossed with the currents reflected. That brow and those eyes formed the triangle of the measureless heavens—and their reflections formed the triangle of the measureless waters. And thus was formulated the eternal hexad—the number of the dawning creation.

Hegemon conducts the Practicus to the foot of Hierophant’s throne—handing to Hierophant the Calvary Cross of twelve squares.

HIERO: The Calvary Cross of twelve squares fitly represents the zodiac which embraces the waters of Num as the ancient Egyptians called the heavens, the waters which be above the firmament. It also alludes to the eternal river of Eden, divided into four heads which find their correlations in the four triplicities of the zodiac.

Places cross aside.

The twenty-ninth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah which answereth unto the letter Qoph is called the corporeal intelligence, and it is so called because it forms every body which is so formed beneath the whole order of the worlds and the increment of them. It is therefore the reflection of the watery sign of Pisces and the Path connecting the material universe as depicted in Malkuth with the pillar of mercy and the side of Chesed, through the Sephirah Netzach, and through it do the waters of Chesed flow down.

Hierophant, Hegemon, and Practicus come to the west of the altar.

Before you upon the altar is the eighteenth key of the tarot which symbolically resumes these ideas. It represents the moon with four Hebrew Yods like drops of dew falling, two dogs, two towers, a winding path leading to the horizon, and, in the foreground, water with a crayfish crawling through it to the land.

Tarot Key 18, The Moon

The moon is in its increase on the side of mercy, Gedulah, and from it proceed sixteen principal and sixteen secondary rays, which make thirty-two, the number of the Paths of Yetsirah. She is the moon at the feet of the woman of Revelations, ruling equally over the cold and moist natures and the passive elements of earth and water. It is to be noted that the symbol of the sign ²⁹ is formed of two lunar crescents bound together. It thus shows the lunar nature of the sign. The dogs are the jackals of the Egyptian Anubis, guarding the gates of the east and of the west, shown by the two towers between which lies the path of all the heavenly bodies ever rising in the east and setting in the west. The crayfish is the sign Cancer and was anciently the scarabeus or Khephera, the emblem of the sun below the horizon as he ever is when the moon is increasing above. Also, when the sun is in the sign Pisces the moon will be well in her increase in Cancer as shown by the crayfish emblem.

Hierophant returns to place. Hegemon remains with Practicus west of altar.

I have now much pleasure in conferring upon you the title of lord of the twenty-ninth Path. You will now quit the temple for a short time, and on your return the ceremony of your passage of the twenty-eighth Path will take place.

Hegemon conducts Practicus out.

Ceremony of Advancement in the Path of Tzaddi

Philosophus Temple 2

The arrangement is the same. The letter Tzaddi is substituted for that of Qoph in the southeast. On the altar is the tarot key of the Star. Officers seated as before, each with a cup of water. Hegemon requires the admission badge of the solid pyramid of the elements.

The temple is symbolically in Yesod, whence the candidate is taken by the Path of Tzaddi to the gate of Netzach. Therefore the other Paths symbolically in the east are those of Resh in the northeast, and Samekh in the east.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, you have my commands to present the Practicus with the necessary admission badge and to admit him.

Hegemon goes out, presents Practicus with the solid pyramid of the elements, and admits him, saying:

HEG: And ever forth from their celestial source, the rivers of Eden flow.

Leads Practicus to the southeast before the pillars.

HIERO: Frater Monocris de Astris, the Path now open to you is the twenty-eighth leading from the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ of Theoricus to the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ of Philosophus. Take in your right hand the solid pyramid of the elements, and follow the guide of the Path.

Hegemon and Practicus circumambulate the hall once. As they approach Hierophant the second time, he rises, cup in hand. They halt.

The priestess with the mask of Isis spake and said: "I am the rain of heaven descending upon earth, bearing with it the fructifying and germinating power. I am the plenteous yielder of harvest. I am the cherisher of life."

Hegemon leads Practicus to seat of Hiereus. He rises, cup in hand. They halt.

HIEREUS: The priestess with the mask of Nephthys spake and said: "I am the dew descending viewless and silent, gemming the earth with countless diamonds of dew, bearing down the influence from above in the solemn darkness of night."

Hegemon leads Practicus to his own seat, takes cup, and says:

HEG: The priestess with the mask of Athor spake and said: "I am the ruler of mist and cloud wrapping the earth, as it were, in a garment, floating and hovering between earth and heaven. I am the giver of the dew-clad night."

Replaces cup and leads Practicus to a place west of the altar, facing Hierophant, and returns to place.

HIERO: Where the paternal monad is, the monad is enlarged and generateth two, and beside him is seated the duad and glittereth with intellectual sections. Also to govern all things and order everything not ordered. For in the whole universe shineth the triad over which the monad ruleth. This order is the beginning of all sections.

HIEREUS: For the mind of the Father said that all things should be cut into three, whose will assented and then all things were divided.

For the mind of the eternal Father said: “Into three, governing all things by mind.” And there appeared in it the triad, virtue, wisdom, and multiscient truth. Thus floweth forth the form of the triad, being pre-existent, not the first essence, but that whereby all things are measured.

HEG: For thou must know that all things bow before the three supernals. The first course is sacred—but in the midst thereof another, the third aerial, which cherisheth earth in fire, and the fountain of fountains and of all fountains—the matrix containing all. Thence springeth forth abundantly the generation of multifarious matter.

Hegemon conducts Practicus to the foot of Hierophant’s throne and hands to Hierophant the solid pyramid of the elements.

HIERO: This pyramid is attributed to the four elements. On the four triangles are their Hebrew names: Asch—fire; Mayim—water; Ruach—air; Aretz—earth. On the apex is the word Eth composed of the first and last letters of the alphabet and implying essence. The square base represents the material universe and on it is the word Olam meaning “world.”

Hiero puts pyramid aside.

The twenty-eighth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah which answereth unto the letter Tzaddi is called the natural intelligence—and it is so-called because through it is consummated and perfected the nature of every existing being under the orb of the sun. It is therefore the reflection of the airy sign Aquarius, the water-bearer, unto which is attributed the countenance of man, the Adam who restored the world.

Hierophant, Hegemon, and Practicus come west of the altar.

Before you upon the altar is the seventeenth key of tarot which symbolically resumes these ideas. The large star in the centre of the heavens has seven principal and fourteen secondary rays and this represents the heptad multiplied by the triad. This yields twenty-one—the number of the divine name Eheieh which, as you already know, is attached to Kether.

In the Egyptian sense, it is Sirius the dog star, the star of Isis-Sothis. Around it are the stars of the seven planets each with its sevenfold counterchanged operation.

Tarot Key 17, The Star

The nude female figure with the star of the heptagram on her brow is the synthesis of Isis, of Nephthys, and of Athor. She also represents the planet Venus through whose sphere the influence of Chesed descends. She is Aima, Binah, Tebunah, the great supernal mother—Aima Elohim, pouring upon the earth the waters of creation which unite and form a river at her feet, the river going forth from the supernal Eden which floweth and faileth not.

Note well, that in this key she is completely unveiled while in the twenty-first key she is only partially so.

The two urns contain the influences from Chokmah and Binah. On the right springs the Tree of Life, and on the left the Tree of Knowledge of Good and of Evil whereon the bird of Hermes alights, and therefore does this key represent the restored world, after the formless and the void and the darkness, the new Adam, the countenance of the man which falls in the sign Aquarius. And therefore doth the astronomical ripple of this sign represent, as it were, waves of water—the ripples of that river going forth out of Eden—but, therefore also, is it justly attributed to air and not unto water because it is the firmament dividing, and containing the water.

Hierophant returns to his place.

I have much pleasure in conferring upon you the title of lord of the twenty-eighth Path. You will now quit the temple for a short time and on your return the ceremony of your passage of the twenty-seventh Path will take place.

Hegemon leads Practicus out.

Ceremony of Advancement in the Path of Peh

Philosophus Temple 3

The temple is symbolically in Hod, and the Paths in the east and southeast, leading from it, are those of Mem, Ayin, Peh, Resh, and Shin. Of these, Peh is shown in the south, before which now stand the pillars. Hierophant returns to his throne on the dais, Hiereus with his banner is seated before the dais in the northeast, Hegemon in the southeast. The officers are supplied with red lamps.

On the altar is the tarot key of the Tower. The admission badge is the Calvary Cross of ten squares.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, you have my commands to present the Practicus with the necessary admission badge and to admit him.

Hegemon goes out, gives the Calvary Cross of ten squares to the candidate and admits him saying:

HEG: The river Kishon swept them away, that ancient river, the river Kishon.
O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength.

Hegemon leads Practicus to the south, and places him before the pillars.

HIERO: (Knocks) Frater Monocris de Astris, the Path now open to you is the twenty-seventh, which leads from the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ grade of Practicus to the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ of Philosophus. Take in your right hand the Calvary Cross of ten squares and follow your guide through the Pathway of Mars.

HEG: The Lord is a man of war; Lord of armies is his name!

Hegemon leads Practicus between the pillars and round to Hierophant, halting at the foot of the dais. Hierophant rises, red lamp in hand.

HIERO: Ere the Eternal instituted the formation, beginning and end existed not. Therefore, before Him, He expanded a certain veil, and therein He instituted the primal kings. And these are the kings who reigned in Edom before there reigned a king over Israel. But they subsisted not. When the Earth was formless and void—behold this is the reign of Edom. And when the Creation was established, lo, this is the reign of Israel. And the wars of titanic forces in the chaos of creation, lo, these are the wars between them.

From a light-bearer of unsupportable brightness, proceeded a radiating flame, hurling forth, like a vast and mighty hammer, those sparks which were the primal worlds. And these sparks flamed and scintillated awhile, but being unbalanced, they were extinguished. Since lo, the kings assembled, they passed away together, they themselves beheld, so they were astonished. They feared. They hasted away. And these be the kings of Edom who reigned before there reigned a king over Israel.

Hegemon takes Practicus round the temple, and halts before Hiereus who rises with red lamp in hand.

HIEREUS: The dukes of Edom were amazed, trembling they took hold of the mighty Moab. Lord, when Thou wentest out of Seir, when Thou marchedst out of the field of Edom, the earth trembled and the heavens dropped—the clouds also dropped water.

Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord—curse ye bitterly, the inhabitants thereof, because they came not to the help of the Lord—to the help of the Lord against the Mighty.

The river Kishon swept them away—that ancient river, the river Kishon. O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength!

He bowed the heavens, also, and came down and the darkness was under His feet. At the brightness that was before Him the thick clouds passed—hailstones and flashings of fire. The Lord thundered through the heavens and the highest gave forth His voice—hailstones and flashings of fire. He sent out His arrows and scattered them: He hurled forth His lightnings and destroyed them.

Then the channels of the waters were seen and the foundations of the world were discovered. At Thy rebuke, O Lord—at the blast of the breath of Thy nostrils, the voice of Thy thunder was in the heavens and Thy lightnings lightened the world. The earth trembled and shook. Thy way is in the sea and Thy path in the great waters and Thy footsteps are not known.

Hegemon leads Practicus to her own seat before the dais, takes lamp and says:

HEG: O Lord, I have heard Thy speech and was afraid. The voice of the Lord is upon the waters. The God of glory thundereth. The Lord is upon many waters. The voice of the Lord is powerful. The voice of the Lord is full of majesty. The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire. The voice of the Lord shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh.

Hegemon places Practicus in a seat west of the altar, facing Hierophant, and takes the Calvary Cross. He returns to his place.

HIERO: Eloah came from Teman of Edom and the holy one from Mount Paran. His glory covered the heavens and the earth was full of His praise. His brightness was as the light. He had *karmaim*³⁰ in His hands and there was the hiding of His power.

Before Him went the pestilence, and flaming fire went forth at His feet. He stood and measured the earth. He beheld and drove asunder the nations. And the everlasting mountains were scattered—the perpetual hills did bow. His ways are everlasting. I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction and the curtain of the land of Midian did tremble.

Was the Lord displeased against the rivers? Was Thy wrath against the sea that Thou didst ride upon Thy horses and chariots of salvation? Thou didst cleave asunder the earth with the rivers. The mountains saw Thee and they trembled. The deluge of waters rolled by. The deep uttered his voice and lifted up his hands on high. The sun and the moon stood still in their habitations. At the light of Thine arrows they went—at the shining of Thy glittering spear. Thou didst march through the land in indignation. Thou didst thrash the heathen in Thine anger. Thou didst march through the sea with Thy horses—through the depth of the mighty waters.

Hegemon leads practicus to Hierophant and gives Hierophant the Calvary Cross.

The Calvary Cross of ten squares refers to the ten Sephiroth in balanced disposition, before which the formless and the void rolled back. It is also the opened-out form of the double cube and of the altar of incense.

Places cross aside.

HIERO: The twenty-seventh Path of the Sepher Yetzirah which answereth unto Peh is called the exciting intelligence, and it is so called because by it is created the intellect of all created beings under the highest heaven, and the excitement or motion of them.

It is therefore the reflection of the sphere of Mars, and the reciprocal Path connecting Netzach with Hod, Victory with Splendour. It is the lowermost of the three reciprocal Paths.

Hierophant, Hegemon, and Practicus come to the west of altar.

Before you upon the altar is the sixteenth key of tarot, which symbolically resumes these ideas. It represents a tower struck by a lightning flash proceeding from a rayed circle and terminating in a triangle. It is the tower of Babel struck by the fire from heaven. It is to be noted that the triangle at the end of the flash, issuing from the circle, forms exactly the astronomical symbol of Mars.

Tarot Key 16, The Tower

It is the power of the triad rushing down and destroying the columns of darkness. Three holes are rent in the walls, symbolising the establishment of the triad therein, and the crown at the summit of the tower is falling, as the crowns of the kings of Edom fell, who are also symbolised by the men falling headlong. On the right-hand side of the tower is light and the representation of the Tree of Life by ten circles thus disposed.

On the left-hand side is darkness and eleven circles symbolising the Qliploth.

Hierophant returns to his throne. Hegemon and Practicus remain west of altar.

I have much pleasure in conferring upon you the title of lord of the twenty-seventh Path. You will now quit the temple for a short time and on your return, the ceremony of your reception into the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus will take place.

Hegemon leads Practicus out.

Ceremony of Reception into the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ Grade

Philosophus Temple 4

The pillars are placed on either side of the altar, north and south. On the altar are the cross and triangle placed to represent the symbol of sulphur. At each angle of the triangle a red lamp burns. East of the altar, suspended from a banner pole, is the diagram of the Fall, facing west. The temple is now symbolically in Netzach, so the Paths which enter it from the east and north are shown: east, Kaph; northeast corner, Nun; north, Peh; northwest, Tzaddi; northwest corner, Qoph. The symbol of Venus on the Tree of Life is shown in the east. Hierophant is seated in the east; Hiereus and Hegemon north and south of the altar, respectively, beside the pillars. Hegemon requires the sash of the grade and badge of the lamén of Hegemon.

HIERO: Honoured Hegemon, you have my commands to present the Practicus with the necessary admission badge and to admit him.

Hegemon instructs Practicus to knock, gives him lamen, and admits him.

In the northwest are the portals of the twenty-ninth and twenty-eighth Paths by which you have symbolically entered this grade from the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ and the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ grades respectively, while in the north is the portal of the twenty-seventh Path by which you have just passed from the grade of Practicus.

Hegemon leads Practicus to Hiereus.

HIEREUS: By what symbol dost thou enter herein?

HEG: By the peculiar emblem of the Hegemon which is the Calvary Cross of six squares.

HIEREUS: This cross embraces, as you see, Tiphareth, Netzach, Hod, and Yesod, and rests upon Malkuth. Also, the Calvary Cross of six squares forms the cube, and is thus referred to the six Sephiroth of Microprosopus which are Chesed, Geburah, Tiphareth, Netzach, Hod, and Yesod.

Hegemon faces Practicus to the diagram at the altar. Hierophant comes west of altar and points to diagram. Hegemon resumes seat.

HIERO: This is the symbolic representation of the Fall.³¹ For the great goddess who, in the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ grade was supporting the columns of the Sephiroth, in the sign of the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ grade, being tempted by the Tree of Knowledge (whose branches indeed tend upward into the seven lower Sephiroth, but also tend downward unto the kingdom of shells) reached down unto the Qlippoth, and immediately the columns were unsupported and the Sephirotic system was shattered, and with it fell Adam, the Microprosopus.

HIERO: Then arose the great dragon with seven heads and ten horns, and the garden was made desolate, and Malkuth was cut off from the Sephiroth by his intersecting folds, and linked unto the kingdom of shells. And the seven lower Sephiroth were cut off from the three supernals in Daath, at the feet of Aima Elohim.

And on the heads of the dragon are the names and crowns of the Edomite kings. And because in Daath was the greatest rise of the great serpent of evil, therefore is there, as it were, another Sephirah, making for the infernal or averse Sephiroth, eleven instead of ten.

And hence were the rivers of Eden desecrated, and from the mouth of the dragon rushed the infernal waters in Daath. And this is Leviathan, the crooked serpent.

But between the devastated garden and the supernal Eden, Yod He Vau He Elohim placed the letters of the name and the flashing sword, that the uppermost part of the Tree of Life might not be involved in the fall of Adam. And thence it was necessary that the second Adam should come to restore all things and that, as the first Adam had been extended on the cross of the celestial rivers, so the Son should be crucified on the cross of the infernal rivers of Daath. Yet, to do this, he must descend unto the lowest first, even unto Malkuth and be born of her.

The 4° = 7[□] grade of Philosophus is referred unto the Sephirah Netzach and the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth Paths are bound thereto. The sign of this grade is given by raising the hands to the forehead, and with the thumbs and index fingers forming a triangle, apex up thus. (Makes sign.) This represents the element of fire to which this grade is allotted, and also the spirit which moved upon the waters of creation. The grip or token is the general grip of the First Order. The grand word is a name of nine letters—Yod He Vau He Tzabaoth, which means Lord of Armies.

HIERO: The mystic number is twenty-eight and from it is formed the password Kaph Cheth, which should be lettered separately when given. It means power.

Unto this grade, and unto the Sephirah Netzach, the seventh Path of the Sepher Yetzirah is referred. It is called the recondite intelligence, and it is so called because it is the refulgent splendour of all the intellectual virtues which are perceived by the eye of the mind and by the contemplation of faith.

The distinguishing badge of this grade, which you will now be entitled to wear, is the sash of a Practicus, with the addition of a bright green cross above the violet cross and the number four in a circle and seven in a square on either side of its summit, and below the number thirty-one, the numbers twenty-seven, twenty-eight, and twenty-nine in bright green, between narrow bars of the same color.

This grade especially refers to the element of fire, and therefore the great watchtower or tablet of the south forms one of its principal emblems. It is one of the four great tablets delivered unto Enoch by the great angel Ave. From it are drawn the three great secret names of God, OIP TEAA PEDOCE, which are borne upon the Banner of the South, and numberless divine and angelic names which appertain unto the element of fire. The meanings of the other tablets have already been explained to you.

The triangle surmounting the cross upon the altar represents the fire of the spirit surmounting the cross of life and the waters of Edom. You will notice that it thus forms the alchemical emblem of sulphur. The red lamps at the angles of the triangle are the threefold form of fire.

Hierophant resumes his seat. Hegemon conducts Practicus to him.

HIERO: The portals in the east and northeast conduct to higher grades. The others are those of Paths you have already traversed.

This grade is also related to the planet Venus, ruler in Netzach. Its symbol, when inscribed on the Tree of Life, is shown in the east. It embraces the whole of the Sephiroth, and is therefore a fitting emblem of the Isis of nature; hence, also, its circle is represented larger than that of Mercury.

Hegemon leads Philosophus to a seat west of the altar, facing east, and removes the diagram of the Fall. He returns to his place.

HIERO: I now congratulate you, honoured frater, on having passed through the ceremony of the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus and in recognition thereof, I confer upon you the mystic title Pharos Illuminans, which means “illuminating tower of light,” and I give you the symbol of Asch which is the Hebrew name for fire.

And, as having attained at length to the highest grade of the First Order, and being, as it were, the connecting link with the Second Order, I further confer upon you the title of respect “honoured frater” and I give you the further symbol of Phrath or Euphrates, the fourth river. (Knocks) In the name of Yod He Vau He Tzabaoth, I now proclaim that you have been duly advanced to the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus and that you are lord of the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth Paths.

HIEREUS: Honoured frater, as a member of this important grade, you are eligible for the post of Hiereus when a vacancy occurs. You are furthermore expected, as having risen so high in the Order, to aid to your utmost the members of the Second Order in the working of the temple to which you are attached; to study thoroughly the mysteries which have been unfolded to your view in your progress from the humble position of Neophyte, so that yours may not be the merely superficial knowledge which marks the conceited and ignorant man, but that you may really and thoroughly understand what you profess to know, and not by your ignorance and folly bring disgrace on that Order which has honoured you so far.

Your duty is also to supervise the studies of weaker and less advanced brethren, and to make yourself as far as possible an ornament, alike to your temple and to your Order.

Closing of the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ Grade

HIERO: (Knocks) Assist me to close the temple in the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus. Honoured Hegemon, see that the temple is properly guarded.

HEG: (On inner side of the door, knocks. Sentinel knocks.) Very honoured Hierophant, the temple is properly guarded.

HIERO: Let us adore the Lord and King of Fire. (Knocks)
All face east.

HIERO: Yod He Vau He of hosts, mighty and terrible! Commander of the ethereal armies art Thou! Amen!

All salute. Hierophant goes to fire tablet. Hiereus stands behind him in the southwest, Hegemon places Practicus in the north facing south, and goes to the southeast. Any members present should arrange themselves in balanced formation behind Hiereus and Hegemon.

Let us rehearse the Prayer of the Salamanders or Fire Spirits. (Knocks)

“Immortal, eternal, ineffable, and uncreated Father of all, borne upon the chariot of worlds which ever roll in ceaseless motion. Ruler over the ethereal vastness where the throne of Thy power is raised, from the summit of which Thine eyes behold all and Thy pure and holy ears hear all—help us, thy children, whom Thou hast loved since the birth of the ages of time! Thy majesty, golden, vast, and eternal, shineth above the heaven of stars. Above them art Thou exalted.

“O Thou flashing fire, there Thou illuminatest all things with Thine insupportable glory, whence flow the ceaseless streams of splendour which nourish Thine infinite spirit. This infinite spirit nourisheth all and maketh that inexhaustible treasure of generation which ever encompasseth Thee, replete with the numberless forms wherewith Thou hast filled it from the beginning.

“From this spirit arise those most holy kings who are around Thy throne and who compose Thy court. O universal Father, one and alone! Father alike of immortals and mortals. Thou hast specially created powers similar unto Thy thought eternal and unto Thy venerable essence. Thou hast established them above the angels who announce Thy will to the world.

“Lastly, Thou hast created us as a third order in our elemental empire. There our continual exercise is to praise and to adore Thy desires: there we ceaselessly burn with eternal aspirations unto Thee, O Father! O Mother of mothers! O archetype eternal of maternity and love! O Son, the flower of all sons! Form of all forms! Soul, spirit, harmony, and numeral of all things! Amen!”

Hierophant makes banishing circle and pentagrams with sceptre before tablet.

Depart ye in peace unto your habitations. May the blessing of Yod He Vau He Tzabaoth be upon ye! Be there peace between us and you, and be ye ready to come when ye are called.

Hierophant returns to his place. The others follow. Hegemon leads Philosophus to his seat.

In the name of YOD HE VAU HE TZABAOTH, I declare this temple closed in the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus.

HIERO: יוֹ הֵ וָו הֵ תְזַבְאוֹת

HIEREUS: יוֹ הֵ וָו הֵ

HEG: יוֹ הֵ וָו הֵ

Hegemon conducts the Philosophus out.

Rituals of the Inner Order

The Roseae Rubeae
et Aureae Crucis

CEREMONY OF THE PORTAL OF THE VAULT OF THE ADEPTI

Chief Adept (white cassock, yellow shoes, red cloak of Hierophant, yellow and white nemyss, Rose Cross on yellow collar. Sceptre of five elemental colours surmounted by pentagram, white lamp and brazier, candle).

Second Adept (white cassock and collar, blue shoes, blue and orange cloak and nemyss, lamen of red triangle in green pentagram, red wand headed by red sulphur symbol, red lamp and incense sticks).

Third Adept (white cassock, blue collar, red shoes, red and green nemyss and cloak, blue wand headed by blue salt symbol, lamen of blue cup on orange octagram, cup of water).

Hiereus (black cassock, black collar, black and white nemyss, red shoes and collar, sword, lamen of four colours of Malkuth with white hexagram, salt).

Hegemon (black cassock, white cloak, red shoes, yellow and purple nemyss, mitre-headed sceptre, lamen of red and blue hexagram on white ground, yellow collar, rose leaves).

Opening of the Portal Grade

Chief Adept is behind the Veil in the east, symbolically in Tiphareth, other officers in their Sephirotic stations: Third Adept in the northeast, Second Adept in the southeast, Hiereus in west, Hegemon east of altar. The hall is in darkness, the elemental lamps unlit—no lights except those burning behind the Veil and shaded candles for officers.

Any members attending must give the Portal signs on entering the temple. Portal members sit in the north—full 5° = 6° members in the south.

2ND AD: (Knock. All rise.) Very honourable fratres and sorores, assist me to open the Portal of the Vault of the Adepti. Honourable Hiereus, see that the entrance is closed and guarded.

HIEREUS: Very honourable Second Adept, the entrance is closed and guarded.

2ND AD: Very honourable fratres and sorores, in token of our search for the light, give the sign of the 0° = 0° grade of Neophyte.

All turn east and stand in the Sign of the Enterer. From behind the curtain, the Chief Adept's hand is stretched out, holding a white lamp or candle. Chief Adept unseen, gives the Sign of Silence—all repeat sign as light is withdrawn.

CH. AD: The light shineth in darkness, but the darkness comprehendeth it not.

2ND AD: The dukes of Edom ruled in chaos, lords of unbalanced force. Honourable Hiereus, what is the symbol upon the altar?

HIEREUS: The symbol of the equated forces of the four elements.

2ND AD: Banished be the power of the dukes of Edom, and let the power of the cross be established.

Chief Adept signs cross with lighted candle. Hiereus goes to east, begins Lesser Banishing Ritual of the Pentagram. When he returns east all officers and members make Qabalistic cross, facing east, and repeat words with him. Hiereus returns to place west and makes $1^\circ = 10^\square$ sign.

Hegemon in the east makes $2^\circ = 9^\square$ sign and knocks.

Third Adept in north makes $3^\circ = 8^\square$ sign and knocks.

Second Adept in the south makes $4^\circ = 7^\square$ sign and knocks.

CH. AD: The cross upon the altar is also a cross of corrosion, corruption, disintegration, and death. Therefore doth it fall in the Paths of Death and the Devil, unless in Hod, the glory triumpheth over matter and the corruptible putteth on incorruption, thus attaining unto the beauty of Tiphareth; unless in Netzach, death is swallowed up in victory and the transformer becometh the transmuter into pure alchemic gold. "Except ye be born of water and the spirit, ye cannot enter the kingdom of God." ¹

What then, very honourable Third Adept, is the additional mystic title bestowed upon a Philosophus as a link with the Second Order?

3RD AD: Phrath, the fourth river of Eden.

HIEREUS: Tau.

HEG: Resh.

3RD AD: Peh.

CH. AD: Very honourable Second Adept, what may be added to this word?

2ND AD: Kaph (Knocks)

HIEREUS: Tau (Knocks)

HEG: Resh (Knocks)

3RD AD: Peh (Knocks)

CH. AD: The whole word is Paroketh, which is the Veil of the Tabernacle.

All make Signs of Rending of the Veil.

CH. AD: (Knocks) In and by that word, I permit the Portal of the Vault of the Adepts to be opened.

Second and Third Adepts draw aside curtains revealing Chief Adept who rises with pentacle and taper in left hand and sceptre in right.

Let us establish the dominion of the mystic Eth over the four elements.

Chief Adept faces east. All face east. Chief Adept having descended from the dais and taken his position in front of the air tablet, Hegemon stands behind Chief bearing rose leaves. All make Qabalistic cross. Hegemon places rose leaves before the air tablet and stands in the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ sign. Chief lights the lamps as he goes round. Chief Adept invokes air and lights lamp. Hegemon takes rose leaves to altar and puts them on air arm of cross and remains east of altar facing west.

Chief Adept goes to south. Second Adept comes behind, places sticks of incense before tablet and stands in $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ sign. Chief Adept invokes fire and lights lamp as before. Second Adept takes incense to altar and places it on fire arm of the cross and stands at the south of altar looking north.

Chief Adept goes to west and lights lamp. Third Adept stands behind him, places cup before tablet and stands in sign of $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$. Chief Adept invokes water. Third Adept takes cup to altar, places it on water arm of cross and stands at the west of altar facing east.

Chief Adept goes to north and lights lamp. Hiereus stands behind him, places salt before tablet and stands in $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ sign. Chief Adept invokes earth. Hiereus takes salt to the altar, places it on earth arm of cross and stands at the north of altar facing south. Chief Adept completes circle in east, then circumambulates with Sol to west of altar, having now lit all the elemental lamps.

CH. AD: In the great name Yod He Vau He.

All give $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$ signs towards altar, and then stand in elemental signs. Chief Adept makes invoking spirit pentagrams with deity names Eheieh and Agla closing with the Qabalistic cross. He moves round the altar to east, faces west, lays pentacle over cross and holds candle and wand on high.

May the cross of the four elements become truly purified and planted in incorruption. Wherefore in the name of Yod He Vau He and in the concealed name Yeheshua, do I add the power of the pentagram constituting the glorified body of Osiris, the sign of the microcosmos.

All lights are turned up. Chief Adept lays pentacle for a moment on cross then hangs it on hook in centre of hall, raises sceptre and candle on high, and invokes:

CH. AD: Ol sonuf va-orsagi goho Iada balata. Elexarpeh Comananu Tabitom. Zodakara, eka zodakare od zodameranu. Odo kikle qaa piape piamoel od vaoan.²

Chief Adept returns to dais. Second and Third Adepts follow and stand by pillars. Hiereus and Hegemon face east, standing north and south of altar respectively.

Let us adore the Lord and King of hosts.

Holy art Thou, Lord of the Universe.

Holy art Thou, whom nature hath not formed.

Holy art Thou, the vast and the mighty one,

Lord of the light and of the darkness.

By the word Paroketh and in the Sign of the Rending of the Veil, I declare that the Portal of the Vault of the Adepti has been opened.

CH. AD: וויוו ׀

2ND AD: וויוו ׀

3RD AD: וויוו ׀

HIEREUS: וויוו ׀

HEG: וויוו ׀

Chief Adept circumambulates once then returns to seat. All take seats after the elements are replaced in the four quarters by the respective officers.

The Ritual of the Cross and Four Elements

CH. AD: (Concealed behind the Veil.) The Portal symbolically opened for the Order, is yet closed to the unprepared candidate.

Elemental lamps are veiled. Temple in darkness save at east.

2ND AD: Very honoured fratres and sorores, our honoured Frater (name) having been a member of the 4° = 7[□] grade of Philosophus for the space of seven months and having passed the fivefold examination prescribed for admission to the Second Order, has been duly approved. I hold a dispensation from the greatly honoured chiefs of the Second Order to permit him to approach the Portal of the Vault of the Adepti.

Very honoured Third Adept, see that he is duly prepared by wearing the sash of the 4° = 7[□] grade; admit him, having placed around his neck the admission badge, and having examined him in his knowledge of the grip, sign, words, etc. of the 4° = 7[□] grade and of the word Phrath before you instruct him in the necessary knock.

Lights are extinguished. Second Adept stands before the Veil. Hiereus and Hegemon bar the way near the door. Third Adept, having prepared Philosophus, opens door showing darkness but for faint light in the east and brings Philosophus just within the door.

HEG: The realm of chaos and of ancient night, ere ever the aeons were, when there was neither heaven or earth, nor was there any sea, when naught was, save the shape un luminous, formless, and void.

HIEREUS: To and fro in the deeps swayed the coils of the dragon with eight heads and eleven horns. Eleven were the curses of Mount Ebal, eleven the rulers of the Qlipboth, and at their head were the dual contending forces.

Hiereus and Hegemon lower weapons and step back.

2ND AD: (Faces east.) Then breathed forth Tho-oth out of the unutterable abyss the word! Then stood forth Tho-oth in the Sign of the Enterer, on the threshold of the Hall of Time as time was born of the eternal. (Gives $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$ sign.) So stood Tho-oth in the power of the word, giving forth light, while the aeons that were unbegotten unfolded before him.

Philosophus directed to give $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$ sign.

2ND AD: And Elohim said “Let there be light.”

The hand of the Chief Adept hands out the candle. Second Adept receives it and gives Sign of Silence. Philosophus is directed to make sign. Third Adept leaves Philosophus and comes east, takes candle and returns with Sol. He holds candle before Philosophus and takes Banner of the West in left hand.

2ND AD: Honoured frater, what was the title you received in the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus?

PHIL: (Unprompted) Pharos Illuminans.

Third Adept gives Philosophus candle and takes his station on the left hand of Philosophus.

2ND AD: Honoured Frater Pharos Illuminans, we are here assembled to open for you the Portal of the Vault of the Adepti, which admits you to the Second Degree and brings you to the threshold of the Inner or Second Order.

But because of the increased influence over the members of the Order that such advancement necessarily confers, and because of the increased power for good or evil that will follow if, with steadfast will and aspiration, you take this step in essence as well as in form, it is needful that you take further pledges, which however, as in the previous degree, contain nothing contrary to your civil, moral, or religious duties. Are you willing to take these pledges?

PHIL: I am willing.

2ND AD: Then you will take in your right hand the Banner of the West (Third Adept gives it to him) and place your left hand in that of the very honoured Third Adept, who is the living symbol of the black pillar which ruleth in the Outer Order, and touch the corresponding emblem, the black sash of restriction, on your breast, and thus bind yourself while raising the light which you hold, in witness of your pledge.

2ND AD: Firstly, do you pledge yourself never to reveal the secrets and mysteries of these Paths and of this ceremony, either to the outer and uninitiated world, or to a member of the First Order, save in full temple and with due sanctions?

PHIL: I do.

2ND AD: Secondly, do you further solemnly promise to use whatever practical knowledge you may now, or at any future time, possess, for a good end alone?

PHIL: I do.

2ND AD: Thirdly, do you also promise to regard all the knowledge imparted to you as a trust, given into your hands, not for your selfish advantage, but for the service of all mankind, that the ancient tradition of initiation be kept pure and undefiled, and the light be not lost for those that seek it in this path?

PHIL: I do.

2ND AD: And lastly, do you solemnly promise to exercise brotherly love, charity, and forbearance towards the members of the Order, neither slandering, back-biting, nor reviling them, whether you have cause of the same or not, but uniting with them to form a fabric of mutual confidence and support; and do you further undertake, not to be a stirrer up of strife, of schism, or of opposition to the chiefs, but rather to uphold their authority in all loyalty?

PHIL: I do.

2ND AD: Then, realising the cross about your neck, you will lift up your right hand, holding the banner and the light, and say:

“I undertake to maintain the veil between the First and the Second Orders, and may the powers of the elements bear witness to my pledges.”

Done. Philosophus repeating words as directed. Third Adept leaves Philosophus and returns to his place, having replaced the Banner of the West.

2ND AD: The symbol of the first grade of Neophyte is $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$. To the first 0 is attached a circle—to the second, a square. The union of the circle and the square hath many meanings, of which one must be put before you, for this you must accomplish in your own person, ere you can advance further. For if in the mystic sphere of truth, the way of initiation may be trodden alone, yet in another sphere, it hath a threefold aspect. Part that can be given to man from without—part that can be attained by man himself—part that can only come from the divine. Now, in the Order, you were given intellectual teaching and won your grades in tests of what was taught. Here, you must prove that you have truly attained thus far of your own strength, and after, you may progress by the higher soul within you.

Round your neck, you wear the symbol of the cross of four elements, equilibrated and equated. Establish it firmly in the sphere of your own being and advance with courage.

Hiereus and Hegemon bar the way as in $1^\circ = 10^\square$.

HIEREUS: Give me the signs and words of the grade of Zelator.

Done. Hegemon returns to place.

HIEREUS: Give me also the grip of the First Order.

Done. He takes Philosophus to north, directing him to take up salt from before the earth tablet. They face north. Hiereus makes cross over salt with sword then stands in the $1^\circ = 10^\square$ sign while Philosophus circumambulates with Sol repeating earth names.

PHIL: Adonai ha-Aretz. Emor Dial Hectega. Auriel. Ic Zod Heh Chal.

He returns to north. Hiereus makes earth pentagram over salt. Philosophus reveals lamp.³ Hiereus takes Philosophus to altar and directs him to place salt at north side of altar. Hiereus then takes him to diagrams in west.

Maltese Cross of Four Triangles and Symbol of Malkuth

HIEREUS: The cross of four triangles, called the Maltese Cross, is a symbol of the four elements in balanced disposition. It is here given in the colours of the king's scale, and is also assigned to the four Sephiroth ruling the grades of the outer—earth to Malkuth, air to Yesod, water to Hod, and fire to Netzach.

It is again, the cross which heads the Praemonstrator's wand, who represents the Sephirah Chesed, the fourth Sephirah. Four is also the number of Jupiter, whose Path unites Chesed to Netzach. The cross is therefore a fit emblem for a Philosophus of the grade of $4^\circ = 7^\square$.

In this diagram are represented the circle, the point, the line, the cross, the square, and the cube. For the circle is the abyss, the nothingness, the Ain. The point is Kether. Now the point has no dimension, but in moving, it traces the line. This gives the first number—unity—yet therein lies duality unmanifest, for two points mark its ends. The movement of the line maketh the plane or square thus: (indicates). The motion of the point at angles to its first direction and intersecting it maketh the cross. So therefore are the square and the cross but one symbol, deriving from the circle and the point.

Below is shown the occult symbol of Malkuth, the tenth Sephirah. It is in four parts, corresponding to the Maltese Cross. They are fire of earth, water of earth, air of earth, earth of earth, as is indicated by the symbol. They correspond to the four grades of the First Order, which in one sense, quittance not Malkuth, being the grades of the four lowest Sephiroth of Malkuth in Assiah. Upon them is surcharged a white hexagram in a circle. The six and the four make ten, the number of Malkuth on the Tree. The hexagram is also the sign of the macrocosm—of Tiphareth, and of the six upper Sephiroth, wherefore here it is white—spirit ruling over matter. Six is a perfect number, for its whole equals the sum of its parts.⁴ Six are the middle points of the planes bounding a cube, which derives from the square, and from the cross, if the centre point moves thus (indicates third direction).

In these numbers and figures are hid many revelations. Remember that the whole number of Malkuth is 496⁵—which is again a perfect number. Malkuth must then be equated and perfected by the six ruling the four, and the link between six and four is the number of the pentagram.

2ND AD: Having achieved the entry into Malkuth, it is needful that you should pass through the Path of Tau, the dark Path of the astral plane. Go, therefore, to the tablet of the east.

Philosophus goes to east. Hiereus and Hegemon bar the way, points of implements downwards and touching. Hegemon demands 2° = 9° sign and words. Hiereus returns to place. Hegemon leads Philosophus to tablet, gives Philosophus rose leaves, makes cross over bowl and directs Philosophus to circumambulate repeating names. Hegemon stands in 2° = 9° sign while Philosophus traverses Path of Tau in the names of Shaddai El Chai, Raphael, ORO IBAH AOZPI, and Bataivah. Philosophus returns to east. Hegemon makes invoking pentagram and directs Philosophus to uncover lamp. Hegemon takes Philosophus to the altar and directs him to put rose leaves at east side, then, standing east of the altar in Yesod, Hegemon shows Great Hermetic Arcanum.

Great Hermetic Arcanum

HEG: This symbol represents the Great Hermetic Arcanum. The feet of the figure rest upon the earth and the sea. In the hand are represented the hot and moist natures, symbolized by the torch and the horn of water. These are further strengthened by the solar and fiery emblems of the king and lion, and the lunar and watery emblems of the queen and dolphin. Above the whole figure rise the wings of the aerial nature, the reconciler between the fire and the water. Compare this symbol with the angel described in the tenth chapter of the Apocalypse of St. John: "And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven clothed with a cloud; and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face as it were, the sun, and his feet were as pillars of fire, and he had in his hand a little book open; and he set his right foot upon the sea and his left foot upon the earth, and he cried with a loud voice as when a lion roareth, (the Green Lion, the Path of Leo above Tiphareth, referring to Teth) and when he cried, seven thunders uttered their voices (seven aeons, represented under the regimen of the planets).” The dragon issuing from the cave represents volcanic fires.

Hegemon leads Philosophus once round, and hands him over to Hiereus in the north and returns to place.

Vision of Nebuchadnezzar

HIEREUS: This is the image of the vision of Nebuchadnezzar, which was showed you in the passage of the twenty-seventh Path, leading to the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade of Philosophus.⁶ “Thou, O king, sawest and beheld a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee and the form thereof was terrible. This image’s head was pure gold, his breast and his arms were silver, his belly and his thighs were brass, his legs of iron and his feet part of iron and part of clay. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon its feet, which were part of iron and part of clay, and brake them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold broken to pieces together and became like the chaff of the summer threshing floors; and the wind carried them away and no place was found for them; and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole Earth. Thou, O king, art a king of kings, for the God in heaven hath given unto thee (makes Qabalistic cross) the kingdom, the power, and the glory!”

Thou art this head of gold. (To Philosophus:) Thou art this head of gold! Thy head represents in thee the dominion of the divine ruling over the rest of the body. The silver is the world of the heart, the brass is the material passion, the iron is the firm purpose, and the feet, part of iron and part of clay, are the mingled strength and infirmity of the natural man. And the stone made without hands is the eternal stone of the wise, which will become the mountain of initiation, whereby the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of God.

Hiereus takes Philosophus to second diagram.

HIEREUS: This tablet shows the symbolic manner in which certain names have been used by our ancient brethren. You will note that the initials of this sentence make the Latin word vitriolum, sulphuric acid. Furthermore, the words vitriol, sulphur, and mercury each consist of seven letters, answering to the alchemic powers of the seven planets. The initials of the following sentence in Latin—the subtle fluid, the light of the earth—make the word S.A.L.T., salt, and further, the four words of the sentence answer to the four elements—subtilis, air; aqua, water; lux, fire; and terra, earth. And the four words united yield twenty letters, that is, the product of four, the number of the elements, multiplied by five, the number of the pentagram. The words fiat lux, meaning “Let there be Light,” consist of seven letters. The letters of fiat form the initials of flatus, air; aqua, water; ignis, fire; and terra, earth. (Hegemon goes to south.) Which four names again yield twenty letters as in the previous case. And the word lux is formed from the angles of the cross, L.V.X.

He leads Philosophus once round and then to Hegemon who awaits them in the south.

HEG: The seraphim in the vision of Isaiah are described as having six wings: “With twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly.” That is, his synthesis is to be found in the hexagram and in the idea of the seven, more especially dominating the planetary region. But the Kerubim of Ezekiel have each four faces—those of the lion, the bull, the man, and the eagle—counterchanged with each other by revolution, whence the symbolic forms of the wheels beside them, wherein was the spirit; and with two of the wings they covered their bodies and two were stretched upwards one to another. So the synthesis of the Kerubim is found in the revolving cross, in the pentagram, and in the idea of one spirit dominating the four elements. But the Kerubim of St. John’s vision in the Apocalypse are uncompounded, having single heads, but they have six wings and thus unite the powers of the seven with the four. And their cry is similar to that of the seraphim of Isaiah: “Holy, Holy, Holy.”

Hegemon returns to place. Second and Third Adepts bar way in southwest and ask for $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ words. Third Adept comes forward and conducts Philosophus to west, gives Philosophus cup of water, and directs Philosophus to go round repeating the words while he remains standing in the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ sign. Philosophus returns to west. Third Adept makes invoking pentagram of water over cup. Philosophus removes shade from light. Third Adept takes him to altar where he places cup in the west.

Second and Third Adepts then bar way and ask for $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ words. Second Adept comes forward and conducts Philosophus to south, Third remaining at altar in $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ sign, while Hiereus and Hegemon come to north and west of altar and stand in grade signs. Second Adept in south gives Philosophus incense, and makes a cross over it. Philosophus walks round repeating $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ words while Second Adept stands in $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ sign.

Philosophus returns to the south and removes shade from lamp. Second Adept takes him to altar, directs him to place incense at south. He takes cross from Philosophus's neck and places it in the middle of the four elements. Philosophus is directed to stand west of altar in $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ sign, Third Adept behind Philosophus, the four officers in grade signs.

HIEREUS: From the centre outwards, so moveth the point as it traceth the line and the cross. Equated and equilibrated lie here the four elements of the body of Osiris slain.

2ND AD: May the corrosive cross return upon itself, from without inward from the four quarters to the centre, and become by sacrifice and transmutation, an offering acceptable, a body glorified.

Chief Adept unseen sounds gongs once.

2ND AD: (To Philosophus) You will now quit the temple for a short time, and on your return, the ceremony of your advance will be proceeded with.

Philosophus gives Sign of Silence and is led out by Hiereus.

The Ritual of the Pentagram and the Five Paths

Portal Temple 2

Temple arranged as in diagram. Second Adept sits on dais at southeast. Third Adept sits on dais to northeast. Altar in Yesod under hanging pentagram. On it are the four elemental emblems—incense, cup, rose leaves, and salt. In middle, Greek cross of five squares. Hegemon west of altar facing west. Hiereus in west facing east. The admission badge is the lamen of Hiereus. Temple lighted as at end of part one.

2ND AD: ¶

3RD AD: ¶

HEG: ¶

HIEREUS: ¶

Chief Adept parts curtain, makes pentagram with torch, knocks, and withdraws.

2ND AD: Honoured Hiereus, you have my permission to present the Philosophus with the necessary admission badge. Instruct him in the proper alarm and admit him.

Hiereus salutes, makes Qabalistic cross, and goes out. He gives lamen to Philosophus who knocks ¶¶¶¶. Hegemon opens door. Philosophus enters, gives Qabalistic cross. Hegemon returns to place. Hiereus takes Philosophus to west and points out diagram of Malkuth.

HIEREUS: Herein has been established the equated cross, which is ruler over the kingdom of matter. This symbol may be found even upon the crowns of the kings of this earth.

Hands Philosophus the Tau portal.

The letter Tau leads from the airy quarter of Malkuth into Yesod. Air is uppermost in the symbol as in the planet Earth where the atmosphere is farthest from the core. Moreover, the letter Tau signifieth the cross, the impact of spirit upon matter. My lamen is given you as your badge, for I am the ruler in Malkuth, and the guardian against the underworld. I am also lord of the Path of Tau, the link between the First and Second Degrees, and also between the outer and the inner. This Path of Tau, dark and full of mystery, under the presidency of Saturn and the tarot key of the Universe, leads, as you have learned in the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ grade, through the astral plane. Therefore, in the ritual of the thirty-second Path, you were passed by the four Kerubic stations, as a foreshadowing of the rites of the cross, the full completion of the First Order which you have now accomplished.

Having traversed the Path of Tau, the darkness of the astral plane and of the black pillar, stand firm in Yesod, that the black pillar may become the white.

Hiereus takes away Tau after leading Philosophus to Hegemon at altar. Hegemon rises but stands between Philosophus and the altar, so that Philosophus does not too clearly apprehend the change of symbols.

HEG: Before you, in the east, are the five portals of the twenty-first, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-third Paths. Five will divide the number of the letter of each of them, as it will divide without remainder that of every Path from Yod, the twentieth, to Tau, the thirty-second. The five Paths here visible are assigned to Mem, water; Ayin, Capricornus, an earthy sign; Samekh, Sagittarius, a fiery sign; Nun, Scorpio, a watery sign, but in its highest aspect also a ruler of fire; and Kaph, Jupiter, which planet is akin to spirit, and rules especially aspiration. Thus both in number and in significance these planets jointly set forth the eternal symbol of the pentagram. This symbol must now be established—wherefore advancing by the Kerubic Path of Aquarius approach the highest in Netzach.

Hegemon leads Philosophus to foot of dais to Second Adept before Kaph and Nun.

2ND AD: Wherefore do you stand at the base of the white pillar, being but lord of the First Degree?

PHIL: (Prompted) I seek the Path of Kaph, the Path of Aspiration.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) Beware. Temerity is not courage, lord of the First Degree. Remember the warning of the tower struck by lightning that was revealed in the highest Path you have yet adventured. As a house built upon the sand cannot endure, so without the strength of Geburah the height of Chesed cannot be scaled. Stay, therefore, ere your limbs be broken upon the wheel.

2ND AD: The portal of Kaph is barred, yet it is well to aspire, though it may be folly to attempt. This Path is governed by the wheel of life and death, and hard it is to be freed from that wheel.

PHIL: (Prompted by Hegemon) Let me seek then the Path of Nun.

2ND AD: It is open to you, unto the limit of your strength.

Hegemon returns to altar. Second Adept guides Philosophus to west. Hiereus bars way.

HIEREUS: In the power of Typhon the destroyer, and of Death the transformer, stand. (Knocks)

2ND AD: Thus far and no farther is it permitted to penetrate into the Path of Nun, whose mysteries may now partially be revealed unto you.

Second Adept takes Philosophus to tarot key of Death.

Tarot Key 13, Death

2ND AD: The thirteenth key of tarot represents the figure of a skeleton, upon which some portions of flesh still remain. In a field he is reaping off with the scythe of death the fresh vegetation which springs from corrupting bodies buried therein, fragments of which, such as hands, heads, and feet, appear above the soil. Bones also are strewn upon the surface. One of the heads wears a kingly crown; another is apparently that of a person of little note, showing that death is the equaliser of all conditions. The five extremities, the head, hands, and feet, allude to the powers of the number five, the letter He, the pentagram—the concealed spirit of life and the four elements—the originator of all living form. The sign of Scorpio especially alludes to stagnant and foetid water—that property of the moist nature which initiates putrefaction and decay. The eternal change from life into death, through death into life, is symbolized by the grass which springs from and is nourished by putrifying and corrupting carcasses; the herbage, in its turn, affords food to animals and man, which again when dead, nourisheth vegetable life and bring to growth and perfection the living herbage. This is further shown by the figure itself putrifying and decaying as it reaps the grass of the field. “As for man, his days are as grass, as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth.” ⁷ The top of the scythe forms the Tau cross of life, showing that what destroys also renews.

The whole is a representation of the eternal transmutation of the life of nature, which reforms all things into fresh images and similitudes. This symbol represents the corrosive and destructive action of the infernal fire as opposed to the celestial—the dragon of the waters, the Typhon of the Egyptians, the slayer of Osiris—which later yet rises again in Horus. The scorpion, serpent of evil, delineated before the figure of Death in the more ancient form of the key, refers to the mixed and transforming, therefore deceptive, nature of this emblem. Behind him is the symbol of the nameless one, representing the seed and its germ, not yet differentiated into life, therefore incapable of definition. The scorpion is the emblem of ruthless destruction; the snake is the mixed and deceptive nature, serving alike for good and evil; the eagle is the higher and divine nature, yet to be found herein, the alchemical eagle of distillation, the renewer of life. As it is said: “Thy youth shall be renewed like the eagle’s.” ⁸ Great indeed, and many, are the mysteries of this terrible key.

Second Adept and Hiereus show Philosophus the figure of Typhon.

Typhon

HIEREUS: This drawing represents the symbolic figure of Typhon, the destroyer. The eleven circles represent the eleven averse Sephiroth. He stands upon earth and ocean, his head lost in the clouds, a colossal image of evil and destruction. The brow denotes the confusion of opposing elemental forces in the higher regions of the air, and confusion of mind and madness in man. The eyes are the devouring flames of lust and violence—the breath is storm, devastation, and rage, alike in the universe which is the greater world, and in man who is the lesser. The arms and the hands are the swift executors of evil works, the bringers of pestilence and disease. The heart is malice and envy in man, the nourisher of evil in the atmosphere, which later are again symbolized by the numerous and twining serpents.

2ND AD: The twenty-fourth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah to which the tarot key of Death is referred is the imaginative intelligence, and it is so called because it giveth form to all similitudes which are created in like manner similar to its harmonious elegances. For the outward form always follows the hidden law, thus from chaos is produced harmony, just as a beautiful flower is produced from decaying matter. Return now to Yesod, for here no more may be spoken.

Second Adept returns to place. Philosophus goes to Hegemon near altar.

HEG: Approach now the station of Hod by the Path of Resh, the sun.

Philosophus approaches the Third Adept.

3RD AD: Already the sash of the black pillar is upon you—already you have passed the dark Path of Tau. What more do you seek of me, lord of the First Degree?

PHIL: (Prompted by Hegemon) I seek the Path of Mem, the Path of Sacrifice.

HIEREUS: (Knocks) Be warned, O vainglorious one. Samson broke down the two pillars and perished. Having but one pillar, can you bear up the might of Geburah, can you attain strength without the life of Tiphareth?

3RD AD: The portal of Mem is barred. Yet it is well to be willing for the sacrifice itself if, as yet, not fully prepared. For in the Path of Mem rules the Hanged Man, the power of the great waters. Can your tears prevail against the tide of the sea, your might against the waves of the storm, your love against the sorrows of all the world?

PHIL: (Prompted by Hegemon) Let me seek then the Path of Ayin.

3RD AD: It is open to you to the limit of your strength.

Hegemon returns to altar. Third Adept descends and leads Philosophus with Sol to west. Hiereus going to north. bars their way.

Tarot Key 15, The Devil

HIEREUS: (Knocks) By the power of Pan and the goat of Mendes, stand.

3RD AD: Thus far and no farther are you permitted to penetrate the Path of Ayin, whose mysteries may now be partially revealed to you. The fifteenth key of the tarot represents a goat-headed, satyr-like demon whose legs are hairy—his feet and claws, standing upon a cubical altar. He has heavy bat-like wings. In his left hand, which points downwards, he holds a lighted torch, and in his right, which is elevated, a horn of water. The left hand points downwards to show that it is the infernal and burning, not the celestial and life-giving flame which is kindled in his torch—just as when the sun is in Capricornus, to which cold and earthy sign this key corresponds, solar light is at its weakest and the natures of cold and moisture triumph over heat and dryness. The cubical altar represents the universe—right and left of it, bound thereto by a cord attached to a circle which typifies the centre of Earth, are two smaller demons, one male and one female. They hold a cord in their hands. The whole figure shows the gross generative powers of nature on the material plane, and is analogous to the Pan of the Greeks and the Egyptian goat of Mendes, the symbol of Khem. In certain aspects, this key represents the brutal forces of nature, which to the unbelieving man only obscure and do not reflect the luminous countenance of God. It also alludes to the sexual powers of natural generation. Thus therefore the key fitly balances the symbol of Death on the other side of the Tree of Life. Of the smaller demons, one points downwards and one upwards, answering to the positions of the hands of the central figure. Beneath his feet are pentagrams on which he tramples (whence comes their title of wizard's foot) and his head is covered with the evil and reversed pentagram. As his hands bear the torch and the horn, the symbols of fire and water, so does his form unite the earth in his hairy and bestial aspect, and the air in his bat-like wings. Thus he represents the gross and materialised elemental forces of nature; and the whole would be an evil symbol, were it not for the pentagram of light above his head which regulates and guides his movements. He is the eternal renewer of all the changing forms of creation in conformity with the law of the all-powerful one, blessed be He, which controlling law is typified by the controlling pentagram of light surmounting the whole. This key is an emblem of tremendous force; many and universal are its mysteries.

Hiereus and Third Adept go to diagram of Pan.

HIEREUS: This drawing represents the symbolic figure of Pan, the Greek god of nature. He stands upon the cube of the universe, holding in his right hand the pastoral staff of rural authority, and in his left the seven-reeded pipe symbolical of the harmony of the planetary spheres. The nine circles represent the Sephiroth with the exception of Kether, exactly those which are included in the symbol of Mercury on the Tree of Life. The ruddy face is the heat of the earth—the horns are the rays—the body contains the elements and the cube is the firm basis. Observe that the higher part of the figure is human, growing more bestial as it nears the earth.

3RD AD: The twenty-sixth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah, to which the tarot key of the Devil is referred, is called the renovating intelligence, because, by it, God the holy one reneweth all the changing forms which are renewed by the creation of the world. Return again to Yesod, for here no more may be spoken.

Third Adept returns to place, Hiereus goes with Philosophus to altar. Hegemon rises as Philosophus comes to altar. Hiereus and Hegemon stand on either side of Philosophus west of altar, facing east.

HIEREUS: In guardianship and not in enmity have I barred your venturing, O Philosophus. Now may it be revealed unto you how that in my lamén of office is hidden the key which you seek. For the triangle in the circle is the high symbol of the Holy Trinity and the first three Sephiroth, and of Binah, wherein is the Sphere of Saturn, ruler of the Path of Tau. Therefore do I wear it, and therefore, when you entered the hall of the Neophytes in the $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$, when first the hoodwink was raised, you beheld before you the sword that barred and the symbol which overcometh the barrier. The lamén in its more special attributions to the Hiereus has the following meanings. In the circle are the four Sephiroth, Tiphareth, Netzach, Hod, and Yesod. The first three mark the angles of the triangle inscribed within, while the sides are the Paths of Nun, Ayin and Peh, respectively. In the centre is marked the letter Samekh indicating the twenty-fifth Path.

While the wheel revolves, the hub is still. Seek ever then the centre, look from without to within. Behold the key of your path.

Puts badge aside.

HEG: Five Paths are before you—four have you attempted and each was guarded by a symbol sinister and dread.

Remember that in the $1^{\circ} = 10^{\square}$ grade it was told you that above Malkuth were the Paths Qoph, Shin, Tau, making qesheth, the bow of promise. From the many-coloured bow is loosed in Yesod the arrow of Sagittarius—Samekh, soaring upward to cleave open the Veil unto the sun in Tiphareth. Thus it is a fit symbol for hope and aspiration, for in the sign Sagittarius, Jupiter, ruler of Kaph, is lord. Thus, by this straight and narrow way only is advance between the dangers that have threatened you possible.

Third Adept descends to north side of altar.

3RD AD: But Sagittarius, the archer, is a bi-corporate sign—the centaur, the man and the horse combined. Recall what was said unto thee in the passage of the thirty-first Path of Fire, leading unto the $3^{\circ} = 8^{\square}$ grade of Practicus: “Also there is the vision of the fire flashing courser of light, or also a child borne aloft upon the shoulders of the celestial steed, fiery or clothed with gold, or naked and shooting from the bow, shafts of light, and standing on the shoulders of a horse. But, if thy meditation prolongeth itself thou shalt unite all these symbols in the form of a lion.” For thus wilt thou cleave upward by the Path of Sagittarius, through the sixth Sephirah into the Path of Teth, answering to Leo, the lion—the reconciling Path between mercy and severity, Chesed and Geburah, beneath whose centre hangs the glorious sun of Tiphareth. Therefore, by the straight and narrow Path of Sagittarius, let the Philosophus advance, like the arrow from the centre of Qesheth, the bow. And as this sign of Sagittarius lieth between the sign of Scorpio—Death and Capricornus the devil, so had Jesus to pass through the wilderness, tempted by Satan.

Second Adept descends to south of the altar.

2ND AD: Before you, upon the altar, lie the four emblems of your purified body, and over them is the symbol of the pentagram, while beneath in the midst is the five-squared cross of the four elements and the spirit within them. If you are willing, in service and in sacrifice to offer the purified powers of your body, bind about your neck the cross, and stretch the light (gives Philosophus light) you carry over the four emblems in prayer and offering.

Philosophus does so.

All come east of the altar, Philosophus in middle with candle and cross on neck, Second Adept right and Third Adept left, Hegemon and Hiereus behind. Each take elemental emblems—Hiereus salt, Hegemon rose leaves, Second Adept incense, Third Adept water, and Philosophus motto written on paper.

2ND AD: Honoured Philosophus, what was the additional title given you in the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ as a link with the Second Order?

All advance to dais.

PHIL: Phrath.

2ND AD: O hidden warden of the portal of the vault, here is one who cometh in the word Phrath.

CH. AD: (Knocks gong unseen.) If he would rend the Veil, let him complete the word.

2ND AD: Honoured Hiereus, what know you of the word?

HIEREUS: Tau, the letter of Saturn, ruling the Path of Malkuth to Yesod, linked to earth.

2ND AD: Honoured Hegemon, what know you of the word?

HEG: Resh, the letter of Sol, of the Path joining Yesod to Hod, and it is also the letter linked with rule over air as the sun ruleth the air in Tiphareth.

2ND AD: Very honoured Third Adept, what know you of the word?

3RD AD: Peh, the letter of Mars, of the Path joining Hod to Netzach, which is also a letter linked to water, as Mars ruleth water, and to fire, as Mars ruleth fire in Geburah.

2ND AD: Mars in Peh linketh the base of the black pillar to the base of the white pillar, and the converse of Mars is Jupiter—for Jupiter is lord of fire, but in Chesed he ruleth water, balancing Mars in Geburah. Now, the letter of Jupiter is Kaph, linking Netzach with Chesed; and Kaph continueth the Path of Peh to Chesed, and is the highest Path now visible to you. It is the Path of aspiration and its planet Jupiter rules also in Sagittarius. Therefore, take the light of the highest for guide, and thus do I reveal the letter Kaph unto you and complete the word:

3RD AD: Peh (Knocks, gives sign of water).

HEG: Resh (Knocks, gives sign of air).

2ND AD: Kaph (Knocks, gives sign of fire).

HIEREUS: Tau (Knocks, gives sign of earth).

ALL: Paroketh (All make Qabalistic cross saying the words).

PHIL: (Prompted by Third Adept) In the word Paroketh, in the power of the cross and the pentagram, I claim to behold the Portal of the Vault of the Adepts.

CH. AD: (Unseen, sounds gong.) It is the word of the Veil, the Veil of the Tabernacle, of the temple, before the holy of holies, the Veil which was rent asunder. It is the Veil of the four elements of the body of man, which was offered upon the cross for the service of man. (Chief Adept stands.) In the word Phrath, in the spirit of service and sacrifice draw nigh.

Second and Third Adepts stand at the Veil. Second shows Philosophus the opening sign.

2ND AD: This is the Sign of the Rending of the Veil, and thus standing, you form the Tau cross.

Philosophus gives the sign. Second and Third Adepts draw back Veil, revealing Chief Adept who stands also in the sign of Tau, with sceptre and white lamp. Second and Third Adepts and Philosophus mount dais. Philosophus if able should stand in sign during offering ritual. Lights turned up. Hiereus and Hegemon stand behind Philosophus, who is between the pillars—Second Adept is to the south and Third Adept to the north.

CH. AD: Freely and of full purpose and with understanding do you offer yourself upon the altar of the spirit?

PHIL: I do.

As they say their words, Hiereus and Hegemon ascend dais to drop their emblems into the brazier. Each officer makes his grade sign as he does so. Chief Adept makes appropriate pentagrams holding up white lamp.

HIEREUS: In the letter Tau. (Drops salt into brazier.)

CH. AD: In the letter Heh. (Does same with incense.)

HEG: In the letter Resh. (Does same with rose leaves.)

CH. AD: In the letter Vau. (Does same with incense.)

3RD AD: In the letter Peh. (Does same with water.)

CH. AD: In the letter Heh. (Does same with incense.)

2ND AD: In the letter Kaph. (Does same with incense.)

CH. AD: In the letter Yod. (Does same with incense.)

ALL: In the letter Shin. (Philosophus drops in motto.)

Chief Adept makes spirit pentagrams over the whole, then stretching out sceptre touches Philosophus on the breast.

CH. AD: May this offering be as the offering of Abel, which ascended unto God.

Philosophus lowers his arms. Chief Adept sits down.

CH. AD: Stretch out your left hand to touch the black pillar, (done) the pillar of the First Degree, wherein all was as yet in the darkness of the Path of Tau. This was a period of restriction and of groping, as was shown by the black sash, the sign of the First Degree. Among its symbols were the cross, upon which meditate, that the mysteries of growth and change may become revealed.

Stretch out now your right hand to touch the white pillar, (done) the pillar of the Second Degree, wherein is the fire of the Path of Samekh. Its token in our Order is the white sash. Standing thus you are in the point of equilibrium, master of both, lord of the Second Degree, lord of the Paths of the Portal of the Vault of the Adepti—wherefore, in recognition of your achievement, I confer upon you the white sash of probation. (Third Adept puts on white sash). The grip of this degree is the grip of the First Order, but given with the left hand, and represents the Sephirah Chesed, and the white pillar. The sign is given thus—(gives it) and symbolizes the rending asunder of a curtain or Veil. The answering sign is given by the converse thus. (Gives it.) The password is, as you have been told, Paroketh, which is the Veil of the Tabernacle, and is exchanged by letter thus:

CH. AD: Peh.

PHIL: (Prompted) Resh.

CH. AD: Kaph.

PHIL: Tau.

CH. AD: Further, I give you the word Eth, which crowns the pyramid of the four elements in the $4^{\circ} = 7^{\square}$ grade, and is one symbol of the spirit which converts the cross into the pentagram. Wherefore above my throne is this tablet (points to the Tablet of Union) which is called the Tablet of Union, and binds together the four tablets into one under the presidency of the spirit.

Thus far by work of the intellect, and by aid of our rites, have you come. Now must you labour to establish the pentagram in yourself. That it be the pentagram of good, upright and balanced, not the evil and reversed pentagram of the goat of Mendes; to make yourself truly a microcosm reflecting the macrocosm whose symbolic hexagram of Tiphareth presides above you.

This degree is in one sense attributed to Yesod, base of the Path of probation, Sagittarius. In Yesod is the sphere of Luna, who in her fullness reflects the sun of Tiphareth. The number given to the moon in the $2^{\circ} = 9^{\square}$ is nine, but in a more esoteric sense the number of Luna is five, the number of the pentagram and the microcosm.

Chief Adept rises with sceptre and white lamp. Second Adept places the Tablet of Union on the altar in readiness. Hegemon places two forms of temperance west of the altar. Chief Adept puts white lamp on altar. Officers replace elements before their respective tablets and return to form a cross round the altar.

Old Tarot Key 14, Temperance

CH. AD: This drawing represents the more ancient form of the fourteenth key of tarot, for which the latter and more usual form of Temperance was soon substituted, as better representing the natural symbolism of the Path of Sagittarius. The earlier figure was considered not so much a representation of this Path alone, as the synthesis of that and the others conjoined. The later figure, therefore, is better adapted to the more restricted meaning. The more ancient form shows a female figure crowned with the crown of five rays, symbolizing the five principles of nature, the concealed spirit and the four elements of earth, air, water, and fire. About her head is a halo of light. On her breast is the sun of Tiphareth. The five-rayed crown further alludes to the five Sephiroth Kether, Chokmah, Binah, Chesed, and Geburah. Chained to her waist are a lion and an eagle, between which is a large cauldron whence arise steam and smoke. The lion represents the fire in Netzach—the blood of the lion—and the eagle represents the water in Hod, the gluten of the eagle—whose reconciliation is made by the air in Yesod, uniting with the volatilised water arising from the cauldron through the influence of the fire beneath it. The chains which link the lion and the eagle to her waist are symbolic of the Paths of Scorpio and Capricornus as shown by the scorpion and the goat in the background. In her right hand, she bears the torch of solar fire elevating and volatilising the water in Hod by the fiery influence of Geburah, while with her left hand, she pours from a vase the waters of Chesed to temper and calm the fires of Netzach.

New 14th Key of Tarot, Temperance

This later form is the usual figure of Temperance, symbolizing in a more restricted form than the preceding, the peculiar properties of this Path. It represents an angel with the solar emblem of Tiphareth on her brow and wings of the aerial and volatilising nature, pouring together the fluidic fire and the fiery water—thus combining, harmonising, and temperating those opposing elements.

One foot rests on dry and volcanic land, in the background of which is a volcano whence issues an eruption. The other foot is in the water by whose border springs fresh vegetation, contrasting strongly with the arid and dry nature of the distant land. On her breast is a square, the emblem of rectitude. The whole figure is a representation of that straight and narrow way of which it is said “few there be that find it” which alone leads to the higher and glorified life. For to pursue that steady and tranquil mean between two opposing forces, is indeed difficult, and many are the temptations to turn aside either to the right or to the left—wherein, remember, are but to be found the menacing symbols of Death and the Devil.

The twenty-fifth Path of the Sepher Yetzirah to which the tarot key of Temperance is referred, is called the intelligence of probation, and it is so called because it is the primary temptation by which the Creator tries all righteous persons. That is, that in it, there is ever present the temptation to turn aside to the one hand or the other.

Second and Third Adepts give cup and red lamp to Philosophus and prompt him to hold them in form of Tau cross.

CH. AD: Let this remind you once more, that only in and by the reconciliation of opposing forces is the pathway made to true occult knowledge and practical power. Good alone is mighty and truth alone shall prevail. Evil is but weakness and the power of evil magic exists but in the contest of unbalanced forces, which in the end will destroy and ruin him who hath subjugated himself thereto. As it is said, “Stoop not down, for a precipice lieth beneath the earth—a descent of seven steps; and therein is established the throne of an evil and fatal force. Stoop not down unto that dark and lurid world. Defile not thy brilliant flame with the earthy dross of matter. Stoop not down, for its splendour is but seeming, it is but the habitation of the sons of the unhappy.”

Second and Third Adepts take back red lamp and cup and restore them to their tablets. On the altar is the white lamp and the Tablet of Union. Philosophus is seated west of altar. Second and Third Adepts return to places. Hiereus goes to north, Hegemon to south. Chief Adept returns to throne in east, takes up the Banner of the East and Hierophant's lamen.

CH. AD: Seeing that you are now lord of the Paths of the Portal of the Vault of the Adepts, and are entered into the Second Degree, approaching the Second or Inner Order, it is fitting that you should have the knowledge of these emblems to complete, as far as may be, your understanding of the powers of the officers of the First or Outer Order. Both refer in natural succession of numbers to the six following the five. Thus all progress is by steps, gradual and secure. The inner revelation may come suddenly to some, even in the twinkling of an eye or it may be after long waiting—a slow and gradual process from the beginning, yet ever the liquid must be prepared to the point of saturation.

The Hierophant's lamen is a synthesis of Tiphareth, to which the Calvary Cross of six squares, forming the cube opened out, is fitly referred. The two colours, red and green, the most active and the most passive, whose conjunction points out the practical application of the knowledge of equilibrium, are symbolic of the reconciliation of the celestial essences of fire and water, for the reconciling yellow unites with blue in green, which is the complementary colour to red, and with red in orange, which is the complementary colour to blue. The small inner circle placed upon the cross alludes to the rose that is conjoined therewith in the symbolism of the Rose and the Cross of our Order.

The field of the Banner of the East is white, the colour of light and purity. As in the previous case, the Calvary Cross of six squares is the number six of Tiphareth, the yellow cross of solar gold, and the cubical stone bearing in its centre the sacred Tau of life, and having bound together upon it the form of the macrocosmic hexagram, the red triangle of fire and the blue triangle of water—the Ruach Elohim and the waters of creation. The six angles of the hexagram described upon the Tree of Life will give the planets referred to it as follows: Daath, Saturn; Chesed, Jupiter; Geburah, Mars; Netzach, Venus; Hod, Mercury; Yesod, Luna—while in the centre is the sun of Tiphareth.

Upon my breast is a symbol, which, O lord of the Paths of the Portal of the Adepti, is as yet unknown to you. It is no symbol of the Order of the Stella Matutina, nor of the First or Outer Order, nor even of your degree. It is the symbol of the red rose and the cross of gold, uniting the powers of the four and five and of the six within itself; but to learn its full meaning, it is needful that you be admitted to the fellowship of that other Order to which the Stella Matutina is one of the Veils. Of this matter, you have no right to speak to any below your degree.

Admission further can be earned no more by excellence in intellectual learning alone, though that also is required of you. In token that all true knowledge cometh of grace, not of right, such admission is granted, not on demand, but at the discretion of the greatly honoured chiefs of the Second Order. Moreover, an interval of nine months must elapse before the Portal is again opened to you. Nine is the number of Luna in Yesod, nine lunar months are the period of gestation before birth. Five is the number of the pentagram of the Microcosm, the esoteric lunar number—the number of the spirit and the four elements—of the soul entering the body. Nine multiplied by five yields forty-five, the number of Yesod, and the supreme number of the square of Saturn, as the triad expanded into matter.

1. Note by JMG: John 3:5.

2. Note by JMG: This Enochian invocation is again written out in a form suitable for pronunciation.

The correct spelling is: Ol sonf vorsag goho iad balt. Lexarph comanan tabitom. Odo cicle qaa piap píamol od vaoan. See the Book of the Concourse of the Forces, pages 787–792, for details.

3. Note by JMG: That is, removes the Veil from it so that it shines freely. This is done by Philosophus with each of the elemental lamps.
4. Note by JMG: That is, six can be divided evenly into 1, 2, and 3 parts, and $1 + 2 + 3 = 6$. Number properties of this kind were much used in ancient, medieval, and Renaissance magic.
5. Note by JMG: That is, the sum of the Hebrew letters of the word “Malkuth” is 496, and this number is also equal to the sum of its factors.
6. Note by JMG: An interesting echo of older versions of the ritual work; in the ritual of the twenty-seventh Path as presented by Regardie, the vision of Nebuchadnezzar does not appear.
7. Note by JMG: Psalm 103:13.
8. Note by JMG: Psalm 103:5.

2ND AD: The Tomb of the Adepti is the symbolic burying place of Christian Rosenkreutz, which he made to represent the universe.⁹

3RD AD: He is buried in the centre of the heptagonal sides and beneath the altar, his head being towards the east.

2ND AD: He is buried in the centre because that is the point of balanced forces.

3RD AD: The mystic name of Christian Rosenkreutz signifies the Rose and Cross of Christ—the fadeless rose of creation, the immortal cross of light.

2ND AD: This place was entitled by our still more ancient fratres and sorores, the tomb of Osiris Onnophris, the justified one.

3RD AD: The shape of the tomb is that of an equilateral heptagon, a figure of seven sides.

2ND AD: The seven sides allude to the seven lower Sephiroth, the seven palaces, and the seven days of creation. Seven is the height above. Seven is the depth beneath.

3RD AD: The tomb is symbolically situated in the centre of the earth, in the mountain of the caverns, the mystic mountain of Abiegnus.

3RD AD: The meaning of this title of Abiegnus—Abi-Agnus, lamb of the Father. It is by metathesis Abi-Genos, born of the Father. Bia-Genos, strength of our race, and the four words make the sentence: Abiegnus Abi-Agnus Abi-Genos Bia-Genos. “Mountain of the lamb of the Father, and the strength of our race.” I.A.O. Yeheshua. Such are the words.

All salute with $5^{\circ} = 6^{\square}$ signs.

CH. AD: Mighty Adeptus Major, what is the key to this tomb?

2ND AD: The Rose and the Cross, which resume the life of nature, and the powers hidden in the word I.N.R.I.

3RD AD: The emblem which we bear in our left hands is a form of the Rose and the Cross, the ancient crux ansata, or Egyptian symbol of life.

2ND AD: It represents the force of the ten Sephiroth in nature, divided into a hexad and a tetrad. The oval embraces the first six Sephiroth, and the Tau cross of the lower four answering to the four elements.

CH. AD: Associate Adeptus Minor, what is the emblem which I bear upon my breast?

3RD AD: The complete symbol of the Rose and Cross.

CH. AD: Mighty Adeptus Major, what is its meaning?

2ND AD: It is the key of sigils and rituals and represents the force of the twenty-two letters in nature, as divided into a three, a seven, and a twelve. Many and great are its mysteries.

3RD AD: I bear a simple wand, having the colours of the twelve signs of the zodiac between light and darkness, and surmounted by the lotus flower of Isis. It symbolizes the development of creation.

2ND AD: Mine is a wand terminating in the symbol of the binary, and surmounted by the Tau cross of life, or the head of the phoenix, sacred to Osiris. The seven colours of the rainbow between light and darkness are attributed to the planets. It symbolizes rebirth and resurrection from death.

CH. AD: My wand is surmounted by the winged globe, around which the twin serpents of Egypt twine. It symbolizes the equilibrated force of the spirit and the four elements beneath the everlasting wings of the Holy One.

Associate Adeptus Minor, what are the words inscribed upon the door of the tomb? And how is it guarded?

3RD AD: Post centum viginti annos patebo. After 120 years I shall open. The door is guarded by the elemental tablets and the Kerubic emblems.

CH. AD: To the 120 years are referred symbolically the five grades of the First Order, and to the revolution of the powers of the pentagram. Also the five preparatory examinations for this grade. It is written "His days shall be 120 years," and 120 divided by 5 equals 24, the number of hours in a day, and of the thrones of the elders in the Apocalypse. Further, 120 equals the number of the ten Sephiroth multiplied by that of the zodiac, whose key is the working of the spirit and the four elements, typified in the wand which I bear.

All face west. Chief Adept opens the door wide, passes to east or head of Pastos of C.R.C., and faces west. Second Adept enters and passes to south facing north. Third Adept enters and passes to north facing south. Other members remain without, but Hodos may enter vault to form fourth side in making signs. The three officers raise their wands to form pyramid above altar, cruces touching below wands.

All present give L.V.X. signs.

First Point

The tomb is prepared as before, but closed, and curtains drawn. Chief Adept is not seen as such; Second Adept is principal officer, Third is Associate Adept, introducing adept is Hodos Chamelionis.

2ND AD: Very honoured fratres et sorores, our honoured Frater (name), lord of the twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth Paths of the Portal of the Vault of the Adepti, is a candidate for admission to the Second Order, and is waiting without.

Very honoured Frater Hodos Chamelionis, prepare the aspirant and act as his introducer. Associate Adeptus Minor, guard the hither side of the Portal, and admit them in due form.

Aspirant is prepared by making him wear Portal sash across that of the 4° = 7°. He carries lamen of Hiereus, recommendation from the chiefs of his temple, a certificate of having passed the requisite examinations, and a written out speech.

3RD AD: (Opening door) Whom bringest thou here with thee?

Aspirant: (Loudly and firmly) Hear ye all that I, the honoured Frater (motto) stand before you, being a member of the 4° = 7° grade of the First Order, the highest grade of the Stella Matutina in the Outer, a Philosophus; one qualified to fill the important post of Hiereus in a temple of the First Order, one who hath passed the five examinations prescribed between the First and Second Orders, and hath been declared lord of the twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth Paths in the Portal of the Adepti. I bear a written recommendation from the chiefs of my temple guaranteeing my qualifications, honour, and fidelity; as also an attestation of my having passed the pentagonal examination. By virtue of these honours and dignities, I now come to demand my reception and acknowledgement as an Adeptus Minor of the 5° = 6° grade of the Second Order.

2ND AD: O Aspirant! It is written that he who exalteth himself shall be abased, but that he who humbleth himself shall be exalted, and that blessed are the poor in spirit for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. It is not by proclamation of honours and dignities, great though they may be, that thou canst gain admission to the Tomb of the Adepti of the Rose of Ruby and the Cross of Gold, but only by that humility and purity of spirit that befitteth the aspirant unto higher things.

Associate Adeptus Minor, bring unto me the recommendation and attestation which he beareth; and test thou his knowledge ere he be rejected for the sins of presumption and spiritual pride.

3RD AD: Thou knowest the arrangement of the ten Sephiroth on the Tree of Life; now what symbolic weapon doth their natural succession form?

Aspirant answers unprompted.

3RD AD: And what symbolic creature is traced by the natural succession of the Paths?

Aspirant answers unprompted.

2ND AD: O Aspirant, let this be a sign unto thee. For the flaming sword and the serpent of wisdom shall be the symbol which shall procure thee admission. Return thou then, and divest thyself of these ornaments. They are not humble enough to entitle thee to be received. Very honoured Frater Hodos Chamelionis, clothe him in the black robe of mourning. Let his hands be bound behind his back, symbolic of the binding force of his obligations, and put a chain about his neck, the emblem of repentance and humility.

HODOS: Mighty Adeptus Major, it shall be done.

Hodos Chamelionis salutes and retires with aspirant, strips him of all ornaments, brings him back to door in plain black robe, roped and carrying diagram of sword and serpent. Gives one gentle knock. Third Adept opens door, saying:

3RD AD: By the aid of what symbol do ye seek admission?

HODOS: (Shows diagram.) By the aid of the flaming sword and the serpent of wisdom.

Third Adept takes badge, admits them, and recloses door.

2ND AD: Whom bringest thou there?

HODOS: Mighty Adeptus Major, I bring with me one who has passed the trial of humiliation and who humbly desireth admission to the tomb of the mystical mountain.

2ND AD: Let the aspirant be assisted to kneel.

Aspirant is brought to curtained door of tomb between Third Adept and Hodos Chamelionis. All face east and kneel.

2ND AD: From Thine hand, O Lord, cometh all good. The characters of nature with Thy fingers Thou hast traced; but none can read them unless he hath been taught in Thy school. Therefore, even as servants look unto the hands of their masters and handmaidens unto their mistresses, even so our eyes look unto Thee, for Thou alone art our help. O Lord our God, who should not extol Thee? Who should not praise Thee?

All is from Thee—all belongeth unto Thee. Either Thy love or Thy anger all must again re-enter. Nothing canst Thou lose, for all must tend unto Thy honour and majesty.

Thou art Lord alone, and there is none beside Thee. Thou dost what Thou wilt with Thy mighty arm, and none can escape from Thee. Thou alone helpest in their necessity the humble, the meek-hearted, and the poor, who submit themselves unto Thee; and whosoever humbleth himself in dust and ashes before Thee, unto such a one Thou art propitious.

Who should not praise Thee, then, O Lord of the Universe, unto whom there is none like? Whose dwelling is in heaven, and in every virtuous and God-fearing heart. O God the vast one, Thou art in all things. O nature, Thou self from nothing, for what else can I call Thee? In myself I am nothing. In Thee I am self, and exist in Thy selfhood from nothing. Live Thou in me, and bring me unto that self which is in Thee. Amen.

Let the hands of the aspirant be unbound.

This is done. Aspirant remains kneeling. Officers rise.

3RD AD: Think not, O Aspirant, that the trial of humility through which thou hast passed, was ordained but to jest with thy feelings. Far from us be any such design. But it was intended to point out to thee that the truly wise man is but little in his own eyes, however great his attainments may appear to the ignorant, and that even the highest intellectual achievements are but as nothing in the sight of the Lord of the Universe, for He looketh at the heart. It is written: “When I consider the heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and stars which Thou hast ordained, what is man that Thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that Thou visitest him?”¹⁰ And couldst thou even attain unto the height of a god upon this earth, how small and insignificant yet wouldst thou be in the presence of God the vast one.

2ND AD: Rise, then, O Aspirant of the Rose of Ruby and the Cross of Gold. Rise, glorified by suffering. Rise, purified by humility.

Aspirant rises.

2ND AD: Despise not sadness, and hate not suffering, for they are the initiators of the heart; the black robe of mourning which thou wearest is at once the symbol of sorrow and of strength. Boast not thyself above thy brother if he hath fallen, for how knowest thou that thou couldst have withstood the same temptation? Slander not, and revile not. If thou canst not praise, do not condemn. When thou seest another in trouble and humiliation, even though he be thy enemy, remember the time of thy own humiliation when thou didst kneel before the door of the tomb, clothed in the robe of mourning, with the chain of affliction about thy neck, and thy hands bound behind thy back, and rejoice not at his fall.

And in thine intercourse with the members of our Order, let thy hand given unto another be a sincere and genuine pledge of fraternity. Respect his or her secrets and feelings as thou wouldst respect thine own. Bear with one another and forgive one another, even as the Master hath said.

Very honoured Frater Hodos Chamelionis, what is the symbolic age of the aspirant?

HODOS: His days are 120 years.

2ND AD: It is written: “My spirit shall not always strive with man, seeing that he also is flesh, yet his days shall be 120 years.”¹¹

Associate Adeptus Minor, unto what do those 120 years of the aspirant's symbolic age correspond?

3RD AD: To the five grades of the First Order through which it is necessary for the aspirant to have passed before he can enter the tomb of the sacred mountain. For the three months' interval between the grades of Practicus and Philosophus are the regimen of the elements; and the seven months between the Philosophus and the Portal symbolize the regimen of the planets; while the elements and the planets both work in the zodiac; so that three plus seven multiplied by twelve yieldeth the number 120.

2ND AD: O Aspirant, ere thou canst enter the tomb of the Adepts of the Rose of Ruby and the Cross of Gold, it is necessary to take a solemn obligation of secrecy, fidelity, fraternity, and justice. But as in all the previous obligations, there is nothing contained therein contrary to thy civil, moral, or religious duties. Art thou willing to take such a pledge?

ASPIRANT: I am.

2ND AD: Let the aspirant be bound to the Cross of Suffering.

The aspirant is led to the cross, and his hands are put through the running nooses and cords are bound about his waist and feet. Two adepts stand on either side to support him, and Third Adept takes his place ready to hand cup and dagger to Second Adept, who stands in front of and facing aspirant.

Second Adept holds out rose crucifix to aspirant, saying:

2ND AD: The symbol of suffering is the symbol of strength. Wherefore bound as thou art, strive to raise this holy symbol in thy hands, for he that will not strive shall not attain.

Aspirant takes crucifix in both hands, the cords being allowed to run out long enough to allow him to do so.

2ND AD: I invoke thee, the great avenging angel Hua, in the divine name I.A.O., that thou mayest invisibly place thy hand upon the head of the aspirant in attestation of his obligation.

Second Adept raises his hands on high to invoke the force; then lowers them and takes crucifix which is replaced by Third Adept on altar. Aspirant is now bound more firmly to the cross.

2ND AD: Repeat after me your sacramental name, and say:

(Kether) I, (motto), a member of the Body of Christ, do this day spiritually bind myself, even as I am now bound physically upon the Cross of Suffering.

(Chokmah) That I will to the utmost lead a pure and unselfish life and will prove myself a faithful and devoted servant of this Order.

(Binah) That I will keep secret all things connected with the Order, and its secret knowledge, from the whole world, equally from him who is a member of the First Order of the Stella Matutina, as from an uninitiated person, and that I will maintain the veil of strict secrecy between the First and Second Orders.

(Chesed) That I will uphold to the utmost the authority of the chiefs of the Order, and that I will not initiate or advance any person in the First Order, either secretly or in open temple, without due authorization and permission; that I will neither recommend a candidate for admission to the First Order without due judgment and assurance that he or she is worthy of so great confidence and honour, nor unduly press any person to become a candidate; and that I will superintend any examination of members of lower grades without fear or favour in any way, so that our high standard of knowledge be not lowered by my instrumentality; and I further undertake to see that the necessary interval of time between the grades of Practicus and Philosophus and between the latter grade and the Portal, be, when possible, maintained.

(Geburah) Furthermore, that I will perform all practical work connected with this Order in a place concealed and apart from the gaze of the outer and uninitiated world, and that I will not display our magical implements, nor reveal the use of the same, but will keep secret this inner Rosicrucian knowledge even as the same hath been kept secret through the ages; that I will not make any symbol or talisman in the flashing colours for any uninitiated person without a special permission from the chiefs of the Order. That I will only perform any practical magic before the uninitiated which is of a simple and already well-known nature; and that I will show them no secret mode of working whatsoever, keeping strictly concealed from them our modes of tarot and other divination, of clairvoyance, of astral projection, of the consecration of talismans and symbols, and the rituals of the pentagram and hexagram, and most especially of the use and attribution of the flashing colours, and the vibratory mode of pronouncing the divine names.

2ND AD: (Tiphareth) I further promise and swear that with the divine permission I will, from this day forward, apply myself to the Great Work—which is, to purify and exalt my spiritual nature so that with the divine aid I may at length attain to be more than human, and thus gradually raise and unite myself to my higher and divine genius, and that in this event I will not abuse the great power entrusted to me.

(Netzach) I furthermore solemnly pledge myself never to work at any important symbol without first invoking the highest divine names connected therewith, and especially not to debase my knowledge of practical magic to purposes of evil and self-seeking, and low material gain or pleasure, and if I do this, notwithstanding this my oath, I invoke the avenging angel Hua, that the evil and material may react on me.

(Hod) I further promise to support the admission of both sexes to our Order, on a perfect equality, and that I will always display brotherly love and forbearance towards the members of the whole Order, neither slandering nor evil-speaking, nor repeating nor tale-bearing, whereby strife and ill-feeling may be engendered.

(Yesod) I also undertake to work unassisted at the subjects prescribed for study in the various practical grades from Zelator Adeptus Minor to Adept Adeptus Minor, on pain of being degraded to that of Lord of the Paths of the Portal only.

(Malkuth) Finally, if in my travels I should meet a stranger who professes to be a member of the Rosicrucian Order, I will examine him with care before acknowledging him to be such.

Such are the words of this my obligation as an Adeptus Minor, whereunto I pledge myself in the presence of the Divine One, and of the great avenging angel, Hua, and if I fail herein, may my rose be disintegrated and my power in magic cease.

Third Adept hands dagger to Second Adept and holds cup conveniently for him. Second Adept dips point of dagger in wine and makes crosses on aspirant, on brow, feet, right hand, left hand, and heart, saying:

(for brow) There are three that bear witness in heaven; the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one.

(for feet) There are three that bear witness on earth; the spirit, the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one.

(right hand) Except ye be born of water and the spirit, ye cannot enter the kingdom of Heaven.

(left hand) If ye be crucified with Christ, ye shall also reign with Him.

He marks heart in silence, then says:

2ND AD: Let the aspirant be released from the Cross of Suffering. It is written, that he who humbleth himself shall be exalted.

Very honoured Frater Hodos Chamelionis, remove from the aspirant the chain of humility and the robe of mourning, and re-invest him with the crossed sashes.

This is done.

3RD AD: Know, then, O Aspirant, that the mysteries of the Rose and the Cross have existed from time immemorial, and that the rites were practiced, and the wisdom taught, in Egypt, Eleusis, Samothrace, Persia, Chaldea, and India, and in far more ancient lands.

The story of the introduction of these mysteries into medieval Europe has thus been handed down to us.

In 1378 was born the chief and originator of our fraternity in Europe. He was of noble German family, but poor, and in the fifth year of his age was placed in a cloister where he learned both Greek and Latin. While yet a youth he accompanied a certain brother P.A.L. on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, but the latter, dying at Cyprus, he himself went to Damascus. There was then in Arabia a temple of the Order which was called in the Hebrew tongue “Damkar” (דַּמְכָר), that is, “The Blood of the Lamb.” There he was duly initiated and took the mystic title Christian Rosenkreutz, or Christian of the Rosy Cross. He then so far improved his knowledge of the Arabian tongue that in the following year he translated the book M into Latin, which he afterwards brought back with him to Europe.

After three years he went on into Egypt, where there was another temple of the Order. There he remained for a time still studying the mysteries of nature. After this, he travelled by sea to the city of Fessa, where he was welcomed at the temple there established, and he there obtained the knowledge and the acquaintance of the habitants of the elements, who revealed unto him many of their secrets. Of the fraternity he confessed that they had not retained their wisdom in its primal purity, and that their Kabala was to a certain extent altered to their religion. Nevertheless, he learned much there. After a stay of two years he came to Spain, where he endeavoured to reform the errors of the learned according to the pure knowledge he had received. But it was to them a laughing matter, and they reviled and rejected him, even as the prophets of old were rejected. Thus also was he treated by those of his own and other nations when he showed them the errors that had crept into their religions. So, after five years residence in Germany, he initiated three of his former monastic brethren, Fratres G.W., I.A., and I.O., who had more knowledge than many others at that time. And by these four was made the foundation of the Fraternity in Europe.

3RD AD: These worked and studied at the writings and other knowledge which C.R.C. had brought with him, and by them was some of the magical language transcribed (which is that of the elemental tablets) and a dictionary thereof made; and the rituals and part of the book M were transcribed.

For the true Order of the Rose Cross descendeth into the depths, and ascendeth into the heights—even unto the throne of God Himself—and includeth even archangels, angels, and spirits.

These four fratres also erected a building to serve for the temple and headquarters of their Order, and called it the Collegium ad Spiritum Sanctum, or the College of the Holy Spirit. This being now finished, and the work of establishing the Order extremely heavy, and because they devoted much time to the healing of those sick and possessed, who resorted to them, they initiated four others, viz., Fratres R.C. (the son of the deceased father's brother of C.R.C.), C.B. a skillful artist, G.C., and P.D., who was to be Cancellarius; all being Germans except I.A., and now eight in number. Their agreement was:

1. That none of them should profess any other thing, than but to cure the sick, and that freely.
2. That they should not be constrained to wear any distinctive dress, but therein follow the custom of the country.
3. That every year on the day of Corpus Christi, they should meet at the Collegium ad Spiritum Sanctum or write the cause of absence.
4. Every one should look for some worthy person of either sex, who after his decease might succeed him.
5. The word R.C. to be their mark, seal, and character.
6. The Fraternity to remain secret for one hundred years.

Five of the fratres were to travel in different countries, and two were to remain with Christian Rosenkreutz.

2ND AD: Frater I.O. was the first to die, and then in England where he had wrought many wonderful cures. He was an expert Kabbalist as his book H witnesseth. His death had been previously foretold him by C.R.C. But those who were later admitted were of the First Order, and knew not when C.R. died, and save what they learned from Frater A., the sucessor of D. of the Second Order and from their library after his death, knew little of the earlier and higher members, and of the founder, nor yet whether those of the Second Order were admitted to the wisdom of the highest members. The discovery then of the tomb wherein that highly illuminated man of god, our Father C.R.C., was buried occurred as follows:

After Frater A. died in Gallia Narbonensi, there succeeded in his place Frater N.N. He, while repairing a part of the building of the College of the Holy Spirit, endeavoured to remove a brass memorial tablet which bore the names of certain brethren, and some other things. In this tablet was the head of a strong nail or bolt, so that when the tablet was forcibly wrenched away it pulled with it a large stone which thus partially uncovered a secret door, (he draws back curtain, revealing door); upon which was inscribed in large letters “Post CXX Annos Patebo”—After a hundred and twenty years I shall open, with the year of our Lord under, 1484. Frater N.N. and those with him then cleared away the rest of the brickwork, but let it remain that night unopened as they wished first to consult the Rota.

3RD AD: You will now quit the Portal for a short time, and on your return the ceremony of opening the tomb will be proceeded with. Take with you this wand and crux ansata, which will ensure your readmission.

Aspirant goes out, carrying the wand and crux of Chief Adept.

Second Point

Adeptus Minor Temple, Second Point

Prepare tomb as in diagram. Chief Adept lies in Pastos on his back to represent C.R.C. He is clothed in full regalia; on his breast is the complete symbol of the Rosy Cross suspended from the double phoenix collar. His arms are crossed on breast, and he holds crook and scourge; between them lies the book T. Lid of Pastos closed and circular altar stands over it. Other adepts outside tomb as before. On the altar are replaced Rose Cross, cup of wine, chain, and dagger.

2ND AD: Associate Adeptus Minor, let the aspirant now be admitted.

Third Adept opens the door and admits aspirant, who carries wand and crux of Chief Adept. He is placed in front of and facing vault door.

2ND AD: Before the door of the tomb, as symbolic guardians, are the elemental tablets and the Kerubic emblems, even as before the mystical gate of Eden stood the watchful Kerubim and the sword of flame. These Kerubic emblems be the powers of the angles of the tablets. The circle represents the four angles bound together in each tablet through the operation of the all-pervading spirit, while the cross within forms with its spokes the wheels of Ezekiel's vision; and therefore are the cross and the circle white to represent the purity of the divine spirit. And inasmuch as we do not find the elements unmixed, but each bound together with each—so that in the air we find not only that which is subtle and tenuous, but also the qualities of heat, moisture, and dryness, bound together in that all-wandering element; and further also that in fire, water, and earth we find the same mixture of nature—therefore the four elements are bound to each Kerubic emblem counterchanged with the colour of the element wherein they operate; even as in the vision of Ezekiel each Kerub had four faces and four wings. Forget not therefore that the tablets and the Kerubim are the guardians of the tomb of the Adepti. Let thy tongue keep silence on our mysteries. Restrain even the thought of thy heart lest a bird of the air carry the matter.

3RD AD: Upon more closely examining the door of the tomb, you will perceive, even as Frater N.N. and those with him did perceive, that beneath the CXX in the inscription were placed the characters IX thus:

POST CXX ANNOS PATEBO

being equivalent to Post Annos Lux Crucis Patebo. At the end of 120 years, I, the light of the cross, will disclose myself. For the letters forming L.V.X.

are made from the dismembered and conjoined angles of the cross and 120 is the product of the numbers from one to five, multiplied in regular progression, which number five is symbolized in the cross with four extremities and one centre point.

2ND AD: On the following morning, Frater N.N. and his companions forced open the door (he opens it wide) and there appeared to their sight a tomb of seven sides and seven corners. Every side was five feet broad, and eight feet high, even as the same is faithfully represented before you.

Second Adept enters and passes by north to east of Vault and turns to face west. Third Adept places aspirant on north facing south and takes his place at south facing north.

Circular Altar of Vault

2ND AD: Although in the tomb the sun does not shine, it is lit by the symbolic Rose of our Order in the centre of the first heptagonal ceiling. In the midst of the tomb stands a circular altar with these devices and descriptions on it:

A.G.R.C.—Ad Gloriam Roseae Crucis.

A.C.R.G.—Ad Crucis Roseae Gloriam.

Hoc Universalis Compendium Unius Mihi Sepulchrum Feci—Unto the glory of the Rose Cross I have constructed this tomb for myself as a compendium of the universal unity.

Within the next circle is written:

Yeheshua Mihi Omnia—Yeheshua is all things to me.

In the centre are four figures of the Kerubim enclosed within circles surrounded by the following four inscriptions and each distinguished by one of the letters of the Tetragrammaton:

Yod—Lion—Nequaquam Vacuum—nowhere a void

Heh—Eagle—Libertas Evangelii—liberty of the gospel

Vau—Man—Dei Intacta Gloria—unsullied glory of God

Heh(f)—Ox—Legis Jugum—yoke of the law

And in the midst of all is Shin, the letter of the spirit forming thus the divine name Yeheshua, from the Tetragrammaton. Therefore, by God's grace, having come thus far, let us kneel down together, and say:

All kneel, joining wands above altar.

2ND AD: Unto Thee, sole wise, sole mighty, and sole eternal one, be praise and glory forever, who hast permitted this aspirant who now kneeleth before Thee to penetrate thus far into the sanctuary of Thy mysteries. Not unto us, but unto Thy name be the glory. Let the influence of Thy divine ones descend upon his head, and teach him the value of self-sacrifice, so that he shrink not in the hour of trial, but that thus his name may be written on high, and that his genius may stand in the presence of the holy ones, in that hour when the Son of Man is invoked before the Lord of spirits and His name in the presence of the Ancient of Days.

It is written: "If any man will come after Me, let him take up his cross, and deny himself, and follow Me."

Third Adept hands chain to aspirant and takes wand and cross from him.

2ND AD: Take therefore this chain, O Aspirant, and place it about thy neck and say: I accept the bonds of suffering and self-sacrifice.

Second and Third Adepts rise. Aspirant repeats words as directed.

2ND AD: Rise, then, my frater, in the symbol of self-renunciation and extend thine arms in the form of a cross.

Aspirant rises, feet together, and arms extended.

2ND AD: Associate Adeptus Minor, take from the altar the dagger of penance and the cup of tribulation, that I may confirm the vow of the aspirant forever by marking him afresh with the stigmata of the cross.

Second Adept takes dagger from Third Adept and marks aspirant anew as at obligation: brow, feet, right hand, left hand, and heart. Gives dagger back to Third Adept who replaces it on altar, and then hands aspirant the rose crucifix.

2ND AD: Take that symbol, raise it with both hands above thy head, and say: "Thus will I uphold the sign of suffering and of strength." And I heard the voice of the King of Earth cry aloud and say: "He that aideth Me in my suffering, the same shall partake with Me in my rising." Replace then, O Aspirant, that cross upon the altar, and say: "In and by that sign, I demand that the Pastos of our founder be opened, for my victory is in the Cross of the Rose."

For it is written: "If ye be crucified with Christ, ye shall also reign with Him."

Aspirant replaces crucifix and repeats words as directed. Third Adept gives him back wand and crux of Chief Adept. Second and Third Adepts move away from the altar, revealing upper part of Pastos. They open lid, disclosing Chief Adept within.

3RD AD: And the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not.

2ND AD: Touch with the head of thy wand the Rose and the Cross upon the breast of the form before thee, and say: "Out of the darkness, let the light arise."

Done. Chief Adept, without moving or opening his eyes, says:

CH. AD: Buried with that light in a mystical death, rising again in a mystical resurrection, cleansed and purified through Him our master, O brother of the Cross and the Rose. Like Him, O adepts of all ages, have ye toiled. Like Him have ye suffered tribulation. Poverty, torture, and death have ye passed through. They have been but the purification of the gold.

In the alembic of thine heart, through the athanor of affliction, seek thou the true stone of the wise.

Aspirant gives wand and crux to Chief Adept who gives in exchange the crook and scourge.

CH. AD: Quit then this tomb, O Aspirant, with thine arms crossed upon thy breast, bearing in thy right hand the crook of mercy and in thy left the scourge of severity, the emblems of those eternal forces betwixt which the equilibrium of the universe dependeth; those forces whose reconciliation is the key of life, whose separation is evil and death. Therefore thou art inexcusable, whosoever thou art, that judgest another, for in that thou condemnest another, thou condemnest but thyself. Be thou therefore merciful, even as thy Father who is in heaven is merciful. Remember that tremendous obligation of rectitude and self-sacrifice which thou hast voluntarily taken upon thyself, and tremble thereat. And let the humble prayer of thy heart be: "God, be merciful to me a sinner, and keep me in the pathway of Truth."

3RD AD: Thus, then, did Frater N.N. and his companions, having moved aside the circular altar and having raised the brazen plate or lid of the Pastos, discover the body of our founder, with all the ornaments and insignia as here shown before you. Upon his breast was the book T, a scroll explaining in full the mystic tarot, at the end of which was written a brief paragraph concerning Christian Rosenkreutz, beneath which the earlier fratres had inscribed their names. Following this came the names of the three highest chiefs of the order, viz.:

Frater Hugo Alverda, the Phrisian, in the 576th year of his age.

Frater Franciscus de Bry, the Gaul, in the 495th year of his age.

Frater Elman Zata, the Arab, in the 463rd year of his age.

Last of all was written: Ex Deo Nascimur; In Yeheshuah Morimur; Per Spiritum Sanctum Reviviscimus. “In God are we born, in Yeheshuah we die, through the Holy Spirit we rise again.”

They reclose the Pastos and replace altar.

2ND AD: So, then, our Frater N.N. and his companions reclosed the Pastos for a time, set the altar over it, shut the door of the tomb, and placed their seals upon it.

All quit the Vault. Aspirant carries crook and scourge; the door is closed, and aspirant is led out of the Portal. The tomb is then reopened and Chief Adept released.

Third Point

Tomb prepared as in diagram. Door not quite closed. In southeast angle is diagram of Minutum Mundum; in northeast that of sword and serpent. Due east, the Mountain. Altar as before with crook and scourge added later. Chief Adept stands at east with arms extended. Pastos outside in Portal, head to the east. Lid laid side by side with space between. Second Adept seated at head, Third Adept at foot of Pastos. Aspirant is admitted, still carrying crook and scourge. Second and Third Adepts discard cloaks.

2ND AD: And lo, two angels in white apparel sitting, the one at the head and the other at the foot, where the body of the master had lain, who said: “Why seek ye the living among the dead?”

CH. AD: I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. And whosoever liveth and believeth in Me, shall never die.

2ND AD: Behold the image ¹² (points to lower half of lid) of the Justified One, crucified on the infernal rivers of Daath, and thus rescuing Malkuth from the folds of the red dragon.

Third Adept points to upper half of lid.

3RD AD: And being turned, I saw seven golden light-bearers, and in the midst of the light-bearers, one like unto the ben Adam, clothed with a garment down to the feet, and girt with a golden girdle. His head and his hair were white as snow, and his eyes were flaming fire; his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace. And his voice as the sound of many waters. And he had in his right hand seven stars, and out of his mouth went the sword of flame, and his countenance was as the sun in his strength.

CH. AD: I am the first, and I am the last. I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold! I am alive for evermore and hold the keys of death and of hell.

2ND AD: He that hath an ear, let him hear what the spirit saith unto the assemblies.

Second and Third Adepts open door of tomb and lead aspirant in. They kneel down west of altar with heads bent. Chief Adept stands at east of altar with arms extended.

CH. AD: For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man cometh unto the Father but by me.

I am the purified. I have passed through the gates of darkness into light. I have fought upon Earth for good. I have finished my work. I have entered into the invisible.

I am the sun in his rising. I have passed through the hour of cloud and of night.

I am Amoun, the concealed one, the opener of the day. I am Osiris Onnophris, the justified one. I am the lord of life triumphant over death. There is no part of me which is not of the gods.

I am the preparer of the pathway, the rescuer unto the light; out of the darkness, let that light arise.

ASPIRANT: (Prompted) Before I was blind, but now I see.

CH. AD: I am the reconciler with the ineffable. I am the dweller of the invisible. Let the white brilliance of the spirit divine descend.

Chief Adept raises his hands, invoking the divine white brilliance. There is a pause.

CH. AD: (To aspirant) Arise now as an Adeptus Minor of the Rose of Ruby and the Cross of Gold in the Sign of Osiris Slain.

All rise. Second and Third Adepts raise aspirant, and extend his arms in a cross. They then recross his arms on his breast and turn him to face west. Chief Adept advances within reach of aspirant. Second Adept southwest; Third Adept northwest. They all join wands over his head and cruces a little lower.

ALL: We receive thee as an Adeptus Minor in the sign of rectitude and self-sacrifice.

Still keeping wands joined over the lower cruces, Chief Adept touching base of brain, Second Adept left temple, Third Adept right temple.

CH. AD: Be thy mind opened unto the higher.

2ND AD: Be thy heart a centre of light.

Chief Adept places crux at the base of the spine. Second Adept at left hip. Third Adept at right hip.

3RD AD: Be thy body the temple of the Rosy Cross.

Aspirant is faced to east, and Adepts return to former positions. Crook and scourge are laid on altar over dagger, crossing at yellow bands.

CH. AD: Repeat with us the following words which are the signs of the hidden wisdom of our order.

Aspirant is made to repeat each word after the officer.

CH. AD: I.

2ND AD: N.

3RD AD: R.

ALL: I.

CH. AD: Yod.

2ND AD: Nun.

3RD AD: Resh.

ALL: Yod.

CH. AD: Virgo, Isis, mighty mother.

2ND AD: Scorpio, Apophis, destroyer.

3RD AD: Sol, Osiris, slain and risen.

ALL: Isis, Apophis, Osiris, I.A.O.

All separate wands and give Sign of Osiris Slain.

ALL: The Sign of Osiris Slain.

CH. AD: L. The Sign of the Mourning of Isis. (With bowed head)

2ND AD: V. The Sign of Typhon and Apophis. (With head erect)

3RD AD: X. The Sign of Osiris Risen. (With head bowed)

ALL: L.V.X., the light of the cross. (Saluting sign and head bowed)

They give the saluting sign with heads bowed. A pause.

CH. AD: The mystic number of this grade is twenty-one, the heptad multiplied by the triad; and from it is derived the password of this grade, which is Eheieh, which should be lettered separately when given thus, Aleph.

ASPIRANT: (Prompted) Heh.

CH. AD: Yod.

ASPIRANT: Heh.

CH. AD: The keyword is I.N.R.I., which is inscribed with its correspondences upon this complete symbol of the Rose and the Cross which I bear upon my breast. These letters have been occasionally used as the initials of the following sentences: Jesus Nazareus Rex Judeorum, whence it symbolizes the grand word of this grade which is Yeheshua or the Hebrew name of Jesus, formed of the holy letter Shin, representing the Ruach Elohim, placed within the centre of the name Tetragrammaton. Also it has been interpreted as: Ignis Natura Renovatur Integra; Ignis Natura Renovando Integrat; Ignis Nitrum Roris Invenitur; Intra Nobis Regnum dei.¹³

CH. AD: (Indicating diagram of the Minutum Mundum) Behold the diagram Minutum Mundum sive Fundamentum Coloris ¹⁴—the small universe or foundation of colour. Treasure it in thy heart, and mark it well, seeing that herein is the key of nature. It is, as thou seest, the diagram of the Sephiroth and the Paths, with the colours appropriately attributed thereto. See that thou reveal it not to the profane, for many and great are its mysteries.

Kether is the highest of all, and herein scintillates the divine white brilliance, concerning which it is not fitting that I should speak more fully. Chokmah is grey, the mixture of colours. Binah is darkness, the absorption of colours. And thus is the supernal triad completed. In Kether is the root of the golden glory, and thence is the yellow reflected into Tiphareth. In Chokmah is the root of blue, and this is reflected into Chesed; in Binah is the root of red, and this is reflected into Geburah. And thus is the first reflected triad completed. The beams of Chesed and Tiphareth meet in Netzach and yield green. The beams of Geburah and Tiphareth meet in Hod and yield a tawny orange. The beams of Chesed and Geburah fall in Yesod and yield purple. And thus is the third triad completed. And from the rays of the third triad are these three colours shown in Malkuth, together with a fourth which is the synthesis. For from the orange tawny of Hod and the greening nature of Netzach is reflected a certain greenish citrine—citron; from the orange tawny mixed with the puce of Yesod proceedeth a red russet brown—russet; and from the green and the puce cometh a certain other darkening green—olive. The synthesis of all these is blackness and bordereth on the Qlippoth.

But the colours of the twenty-two Paths are derived from and find their roots in those of the first reflected triad of the Sephiroth, the three supernals not otherwise entering into their composition, and thus are their positive colours found. Unto the air is ascribed the yellow colour of Tiphareth. Unto the water is ascribed the blue colour of Chesed. Unto the fire is ascribed the red colour of Geburah. The colours of earth are to be found in Malkuth.

Those of the planets are in the rainbow scale; thus: Saturn—indigo; Jupiter—violet; Mars—red; Sol—orange; Venus—green; Mercury—yellow; Luna—blue.

Unto the signs of the zodiac are ascribed the following: Aries—scarlet; Taurus—red-orange; Gemini—orange; Cancer—amber; Leo—greenish-yellow; Virgo—yellowish-green; Libra—emerald; Scorpio—greenish-blue; Sagittarius—blue; Capricornus—indigo; Aquarius—purple; Pisces—crimson. Further, thou wilt observe that the colours of the Paths and the Sephiroth form a mutual balance and harmony on the Tree. Colours are forces, the signatures of the forces; and the child of the children of the forces art thou. And therefore about the throne of the Mighty One is a rainbow of glory, and at His feet is the crystal sea. But there are many other attributions of colour also, seeing that the respective rays meet and blend with each other. And therefore do I greet thee with the mystic title of “Hodos Chamelionis,” the Path of the Chameleon, the path of mixed colours, and I give thee the symbol of Hiddekel, the third river which floweth towards the east of Assiah.

They return to altar, and Second Adept indicates crook and scourge thereon.

2ND AD: The colours of the crook and scourge are taken from those of the Minutum Mundum diagram, and they thus represent the just equilibrium between mercy and severity on the Tree of Life. The crook therefore is divided into the colours symbolic of: Kether, Aleph, Chokmah, Taurus, Chesed, Leo, Aries, Tiphareth, Capricornus, Hod. And the scourge into those symbolizing: Netzach, Scorpio, Tiphareth, Gemini, Binah, Cancer, Geburah, Mem.

3RD AD: (Indicates sword and serpent) The colours of the Minutum Mundum are also the key to those which compose the admission badge of the sword and serpent; and thus by their aid it may be the better examined and comprehended. The one is ascending, the other is descending; the one is fixed, the other is volatile; the one unites the Sephiroth, the other the Paths. Furthermore, in the serpent of wisdom is shown the ascending spiral, and in the sword the rush of the descending white brilliance from beyond Kether, differentiated into various shades and colours, darkening more and more as they near Malkuth.

CH. AD: (Indicates diagram of mountain) This is the symbolic mountain of God in the centre of the universe, the sacred Rosicrucian mountain of initiation, the mystic mountain of Abiegnus. Below and around it are darkness and silence, and it is crowned with the light ineffable. At its base is the wall of enclosure and secrecy, whose sole gateway, invisible to the profane, is formed of the two pillars of Hermes. The ascent of the mountain is by the spiral path of the serpent of wisdom. Stumbling on between the pillars is a blindfolded figure, representing the Neophyte, whose ignorance and worthlessness while only in that grade is shown by the $0^{\circ} = 0^{\square}$, and whose sole future claim to notice and recognition by the Order is the fact of his having entered the pathway to the other grades, until at length he attains to the summit.

I now proceed to instruct you in the mystic symbolism of the tomb itself. Let the altar be moved aside. (Done.) It is divided into three parts—the ceiling which is white; the heptagonal walls of seven rainbow colours, and the floor whose prevailing hue is black; thus showing the powers of the heptad between the light and the darkness.

On the ceiling ¹⁵ is a triangle enclosing a rose of twenty-two petals, within a heptangle formed of a heptagram reflected from the seven angles of the wall. The triangle represents the three supernal Sephiroth; the heptagram, the lower seven; the rose represents the twenty-two Paths of the serpent of wisdom.

The floor ¹⁶ has upon it also the symbol of a triangle enclosed within a heptagram, bearing the titles of the averse and evil Sephiroth of the Qlipoth, the great red dragon of seven heads, and the inverted and evil triangle. And thus in the Tomb of the Adepti do we tread down the evil powers of the red dragon (Chief Adept stamps thrice on diagram) and so tread thou upon the evil powers of thy nature. For there is traced within the evil triangle the rescuing symbol of the golden cross united to the red rose of seven times seven petals. As it is written: “He descendeth into hell.”¹⁷ But the whiteness above shines the brighter for the blackness which is beneath, and thus mayest thou comprehend that the evil helpeth forward the good.

CH. AD: And between the light and that darkness vibrate the colours of the rainbow, whose crossed and reflected rays, under the planetary presidency, are shewn forth in these seven walls.¹⁸ Remember that thou hast entered by the door of the planet Venus, whose symbol includes the whole ten Sephiroth of the Tree of Life. Each wall of the tomb is said mystically to be in breadth five feet and in height eight feet, thus yielding forty squares, of which ten are marked and salient, representing the ten Sephiroth in the form of the Tree of Life, acting throughout the planet. The remaining squares represent the Kerubim and the eternal spirit, the three alchemic principles, the three elements, the seven planets, and the twelve signs, all operating in and differentiating the rays of each planet. Note that in all, the central upper square alone remains white and unchanged, representing the changeless essence of the Divine Spirit, thus developing all from the one, through the many under the government of one.

The colours of the varying squares may be either represented by the colour of the planet and the colour of the force therein mixed together, or by these colours being placed in juxtaposition, or in any other convenient manner; but the foundation of them all is the Minutum Mundum diagram.

The symbolism of the altar was briefly explained to you in the second point. Upon the altar stands a black Calvary Cross, charged with a rose of five times five petals, representing the interchanging energies of the spirit and the elements.

Chief Adept leads aspirant out of tomb. Two adepts replace altar, and all resume their places as at beginning of third point.

CH. AD: The head of the Pastos ¹⁹ is white, charged with a golden Greek cross and red rose of forty-nine petals. The foot is black with a white Calvary Cross and circle placed upon a pedestal of two steps. On the sides are depicted the twenty-two colours of the Paths, between light and darkness.

Aspirant is placed between lid and Pastos. Chief Adept stands facing him on opposite side of the Pastos.

CH. AD: Frater (or soror), I now greet you with the grip of this grade which is given thus. (Shows it.) The fingers of the right hand are held so as to form the letters L.V.X. The thumb and first fingers are stretched to form the letter L. The first and middle fingers are extended to suggest the V. The little finger is crossed over the third finger to make X. This may be done with both hands, and is always exchanged by placing the hands, with fingers thus arranged, over the wrist of the frater or soror being greeted.

You will note that this grip must never be exchanged except across the Pastos. You will also remember that you must observe strict silence in regard to the place where you received this rite.

It is well for you to understand that you are expected to promise that you will never tell anyone when, at what time, or where, or from whom you received this grip, or who was present at your initiation into this Order.

The signs and passwords you have already received. Finally, you must understand that you are never permitted to say to anyone not a member of this Order that you are a Rosicrucian. Let the Pastos be replaced within the Vault.

The adepti replace Pastos as before, and all resume places as at opening of ceremony.

Closing of the 5° = 6th Grade

Chief Adept knocks. All rise.

CEREMONY OF THE EQUINOX

This ceremony is held twice yearly on the vernal equinox about March 21 and the autumnal equinox about September 21.

Officers assemble and robe. Chiefs seat themselves on the dais. Members gowned and wearing their sashes enter and sit as far as possible by members of the same grade—Inner members in the east, Philosophi in the south, Practici and Theorici in the west, Zelatores and Neophytes in the north. The temple is opened in the Neophyte grade. All are seated.

HIERO: (Knocks) Fratres and sorores of all grades of the Stella Matutina in the (name) Temple, let us celebrate the festival of the vernal (autumnal) equinox.

All rise except Hierophant.

(Knocks) Frater Kerux, proclaim the equinox and announce that the password is abrogated.

Kerux passes to the northeast, raises his wand, and facing west, says:

KERUX: In the name of the Lord of the Universe, who works in silence and whom naught but silence can express, and by command of the very honoured Hierophant, I proclaim that the vernal (autumnal) equinox is here and that the password (gives it) is abrogated.

Kerux returns to his place.

Members stand facing towards the altar and follow the officers in making the signs towards it.

HIERO: Let us consecrate according to ancient custom the return of the equinox.

HIERO: Light.

HIEREUS: Darkness.

HIERO: East.

HIEREUS: West.

HIERO: Air.

HIEREUS: Water.

HEG: (Knocks) I am the reconciler between them.

All make Neophyte signs towards the altar.

DAD: Heat.

STOL: Cold.

DAD: South.

STOL: North.

DAD: Fire.

STOL: Earth.

HEG: (Knocks) I am the reconciler between them.

All make signs towards the altar.

HIERO: One Creator.

DAD: One Preserver.

HIEREUS: One Destroyer.

STOL: One Redeemer.

HEG: (Knocks) One Reconciler between them.

All make signs towards the altar.

Hierophant goes to the west of the altar and lays down his sceptre, saying:

HIERO: With the password (gives it) I lay down my sceptre.

Hierophant takes the rose from the altar and returns to his place. Hiereus passes direct to the altar and lays down his sword, saying:

HIEREUS: With the password (gives it) I lay down my sword.

Hiereus takes the cup of wine and returns to his place. Hegemon comes direct to the east of the altar and lays down sceptre, saying:

HEG: With the password (gives it) I lay down my sceptre.

Hegemon remains standing east of the altar. Kerux comes direct to the altar, hands his lamp to Hegemon, and lays down his wand, saying:

KERUX: With the password (gives it) I lay down my lamp and wand.

Kerux returns to his place. Hegemon also returns, taking lamp of Kerux. Stolistes comes round by east and south to west of altar and puts down cup, saying:

STOL: With the password (gives it) I lay down my cup.

Stolistes takes the paten of bread and salt and returns to place. Dadouchos comes direct to the altar and lays down his censer, saying:

DAD: With the password (gives it) I lay down my censer.

Dadouchos takes the red lamp from the altar and returns with sun to his place. Sentinel comes by south to east of the altar and puts down his sword, saying:

SENT: With the password (gives it) I lay down my sword.

He returns by north and east to his place.

Kerux passes to the northeast to begin his circumambulation. As he reaches each quarter, and the prayer is said, officers and members face that quarter, and, at the end of the prayer, all make signs towards the quarter. Kerux moves to the east and halts before Hierophant, who, holding up the rose, faces east. All face east.

HIERO: Let us adore the Lord of the Universe.

Holy art Thou, Lord of the air, who hast created the firmament.

Hierophant makes a cross in the air with the rose and salutes. All salute.

Kerux passes to the south and faces Dadouchos, who turns south holding up the lamp. All face south.

DAD: Let us adore the Lord of the Universe.

Holy art Thou, Lord of fire, wherein Thou hast shown forth the throne of Thy glory.

Dadouchos makes a cross with the lamp and salutes. All salute. Kerux passes to west and faces Hiereus, who turns west holding cup on high. All face west.

HIEREUS: Let us adore the Lord of the Universe.

Holy art Thou, Lord of the waters, whereon Thy spirit moved at the beginning.

Hiereus makes a cross with the cup, and salutes. All salute. Kerux passes to the north and faces Stolistes, who turns north, holding paten on high, and says:

STOL: Let us adore the Lord of the Universe.

Holy art Thou, Lord of the earth, which Thou hast made for Thy footstool!

Stolistes makes a cross with the paten and salutes. All salute. Kerux passes round the temple to his place. All face towards the altar. Hegemon stands east of the altar, facing west, and holding Kerux's lamp on high, says:

HEG: Let us adore the Lord of the Universe.

Holy art Thou, who art in all things—in whom are all things. If I climb up to heaven, Thou art there and if I go down to hell Thou art there also!

If I take the wings of the morning and flee unto the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall Thy hand lead me and Thy right hand shall hold me.

If I say, peradventure the darkness shall cover me, even the night shall be turned light unto Thee!

Thine is the air with its movement!

Thine is the fire with its flashing flame!

Thine is the water with its ebb and flow!

Thine is the earth with its enduring stability!

Hegemon makes a cross over the altar with the lamp. All salute towards the altar. Hegemon keeps the lamp. All sit down.

Imperator rises, knocks, and says:

IMPERATOR: By the power and authority vested in me, I confer the new password. It is (gives it).

Hierophant, taking the rose, quits his throne, which is taken by Imperator. Hierophant then goes east of the altar and lays down the rose. He returns to the east, lays his lamen and cloak at the foot of the throne, and takes his place in the east as a member of the temple. In the same manner, Hiereus puts down the cup, Hegemon the lamp of Kerux, Stolistes the paten, Dadouchos the red lamp in turn, and lay their lamens at the foot of the throne and all are seated with members of their own rank.

Praemonstrator rises to read out the names of the new officers.

PRAEM: The officers appointed to do the work of the temple for the ensuing six months are ...

At the end, he says:

PRAEM: The brethren of the Outer Order will now retire for a season.

Kerux gathers up and leads out all who have not attained the white sash. There is a pause while the new officers are provided with nemysses and lamen collars. Outer Order members, taking office, should take these things with them and clothe outside in readiness for their installation by the new Hierophant now to be appointed.

All Inner Order members now present assume their rose crosses. Chief Adept takes his place on the throne of east. Second Adept on his left; Third Adept on his right. Lesser officers leave dais and take seats among other members.

CH. AD: Peace profound, my brethren. (He rises.)

2ND AD: Emmanuel. (He rises.)

3RD AD: God is with us. (He rises.)

CH. AD: In Nomine Dei viventis.

2ND AD: Et vivificantis.

CH. AD: *Qui vivit et regnet in saecula saeculorum.*²⁰

3RD AD: Amen.

CH. AD: Avete, Fratres et Sorores.

2ND AD: Roseae Rubeae

3RD AD: Et Aureae Crucis.

CH. AD: Very honoured fratres et sorores, seeing that the things which are above do continually lift up unto their high estate the things which are below, and do thence return them after a certain great transfiguration, that the work of wisdom may continue and that the grace and sanctification of the holy and glorious Zion may be communicated to the Zion which is on earth, wherefore the worlds rejoice together and are fulfilled in all completion, I beseech you to join with me in my intention, and to ratify in your hearts, the solemn and sacramental words by which I assume this external and visible temple of the Stella Matutina into the house not made by hands, builded of lively stones—the company of the adepts. And it is so assumed accordingly.

2ND AD: *Cum potestate et gloria.*²¹

3RD AD: Amen!

The chiefs are seated.

CH. AD: Fratres et sorores of the Roseae Rubeae et Aureae Crucis. We know that the mystic temple, which was erected of old by wisdom, as a witness of the mysteries which are above the sphere of knowledge, doth abide in the supernal triad—in the understanding which transcends reason, in the wisdom which comes before understanding and in the crown which is the light of the supernals. We know that the Shekinah, the cohabiting glory, dwelt in the inner sanctuary, but the first creation was made void. The holy place was made waste and the sons of the house of wisdom were taken away into the captivity of the senses. We have worshipped since then in a house made with hands, receiving a sacramental ministration by a derived light in place of the cohabiting glory. And yet, amidst signs and symbols the tokens of the higher presence have never been wanting in our hearts. By the waters of Babylon we have sat down and wept, but we have ever remembered Zion, and that memorial is a witness testifying that we shall yet return with exultation into the house of our Father. As a witness in the temple of the heart, so in the outer house of our initiation, we have ever present certain watchers from within, deputed by the Second Order to guard and lead the lesser mysteries of the Stella Matutina and those who advance therein, that they may be fitted in due course to participate in the light which is beyond it. It is in virtue of this connecting link, this bond of consanguinity, that I have assumed the things which are without in this temple of the Stella Matutina into the things which are within the company of the Second Order at this secret meeting held at the (vernal or autumnal) equinox for the solemn purpose of proclaiming a new Hierophant charged with the rites of the temple during the ensuing six months, being a part of the temporary period which intervenes between us and our rest.

2ND AD: Let us work, therefore, my brethren, and effect righteousness, because the night cometh.

3RD AD: Wherein no man shall labour.

CH. AD: (Rises) Fratres and sorores of the Roseae Rubeae et Aureae Crucis, by the power in me vested, I proceed to the installation and investiture of the Hierophant of the (name)²² Temple in the Order of the R.R. et A.C. in the Portal of the Vault of the Adepti.

2ND AD: (Rises) Benedictus qui venit.

3RD AD: *(Rises) In nomine Domini.*²³

The three adepts give L.V.X. signs and seat themselves.

CH. AD: Very honoured frater, at the discretion of the chiefs of the Second Order you have been appointed to the office of Hierophant of this temple for the ensuing six months. Are you willing to assume its duties and responsibilities?

HIERO: I am.

CH. AD: Then I will thank you to advance to the east, giving the grand sign of the order of the R.R. et A.C. (Done.)

2ND AD: Benedictus Dominus deus noster.

3RD AD: *Qui dedit nobis hoc signum.*²⁴ (Touches Rose Cross on breast.)

CH. AD: Very honoured Frater (name), standing in the eastern place of the temple, I will thank you to give me the secret word of the order R.R. et A.C. (Done.)

2ND AD: Habes verbum.

3RD AD: *Et verbum caro factum est, et habitavit in nobis.*²⁵

CH. AD: (Rises) Wherefore, brethren, let us remember that when the body is assumed by the word, the man becomes a living soul. For which reason we persevere in the pathway of the Cross as we look for the assumption of the Rose. The very honoured Adeptus Secundus will now deliver the charge before installation. (He sits down.)

2ND AD: (Rises) The high office to which you have been appointed by the decree of the chiefs of the Second Order involves duties of a solemn kind and their proper fulfillment is a sacred responsibility which rests for a period upon you. While the rule of the Outer Order is more particularly committed to the Imperator, while the instruction of its members is entrusted to the Praemonstrator above all, and the general business of the temple devolves especially upon the Cancellarius, amidst the distinction of these services there is still a common ground of interaction which must be maintained by a perfect adjustment to ensure the right conduct and harmony of the whole. In like manner, the chief officers of the temple are distinct and yet allied; the perfection and beauty of its ritual depends indeed upon the Hierophant as the expounder of the mysteries, but not on him alone. For all must work together to encompass the good of all. I invite you, therefore, not only to take counsel with the chiefs of the Second Order on all important occasions and to maintain a regular communication with the guardians of the outer temple, but to consult and assist the lesser officers so that these rites which, under the supreme authority, are about to be placed in your hands, may, after your term of office, be restored to the Chief Adept not merely intact in their working but showing an increased beauty and a greater light of symbolism. Thus and thus only will you give, when the time comes, a good account of your stewardship. Let me further remind you that the guardians of the outer temple should at all times, in all things, command your respect as the deputies of the absolute power which dwells behind the Veil, directing all things in the two orders for the attainment of its divine ends. Let the memory of these objects abide with you, even as it abides in them and do you assist them in their labour so to direct the temple that peace may be maintained with power.

He sits down. Chief rises.

CH. AD: In the presence of this solemn convocation of adepts of the Second Order, seated in this assumed temple, I again ask you whether you are prepared in your mind to accept the responsible office to which you have been appointed?

HIERO: I am.

CH. AD: Then you will kneel down, repeat the sacramental name by which you are known in the order, and say after me:

I, Frater (motto), in the name of the Lord of the Universe, and of that eternal and unchangeable unity which I seek in common with my brethren, do solemnly promise that I will, to the utmost of my power, fulfill the high office which has been imposed upon me, and by me accepted freely, for the good of the whole Order; that I will maintain the rites of the Order and observe the duties of my position with conscientiousness and loving care, not alone towards the temple itself, but every individual member; that I will cooperate with the guardians of the temple; that I will execute the decree of the chiefs of the Second Order, acting with justice and without fear or favour in accordance with the dictates of my conscience. This I affirm by the symbol worn upon the breast of the officiating adept.

Hierophant is directed to stretch out his hand in the direction of the Rose Cross on the Chief Adept's breast.

Arise, very honoured frater, and receive at my hand the highest office I can bestow upon you in this temple. By the power in me vested, I now appoint you Hierophant of the (name) Temple to work and confer the grades of the Outer Order, under the dispensation of the chiefs, during the ensuing six months. May the light which is behind the Veil shine through you from your throne in the east on the fratres and sorores of the Order, and lead them to the perfect day.

2ND AD: When the glory of this world passes.

3RD AD: And a great light shines over the splendid sea.

Chief Adept invests Hierophant with robes assisted by a server.

CH. AD: I clothe you with the robe of a Hierophant. Bear it unspotted, my brother, during the period of your office. Keep clean your heart beneath it, so shall it sanctify your flesh and prepare you for that great day when you, who are now clothed by the power of the Order, shall be unclothed from the body of your death. I invest you also with the lamen of your office; may the virtue which it typifies without, be present efficaciously within you, and after the term of your present dignity, may such virtue still maintain you in your search after the white stone on which a new name is written which no man knoweth save he who receiveth it. You will now pass to the symbolic Altar of the Universe and assume the sceptre of the Hierophant.

Hierophant goes to west of altar, raises sceptre in both hands, and says:

HIERO: By the password (gives it) I claim my sceptre.

He returns to east. Chief Adept takes him by both hands and enthrones him with the grip of the Second Order.

CH. AD: By the power in me vested, I install you Hierophant of the (name) Temple. May the steps of this throne lead you to your proper place among the seats of the mighty which are above. (He turns to members.) Behold, my brethren, him who now stands amongst us, clothed with the attribute of lawful revealer of the mysteries for those whom we are leading towards the light. You are the adepts of those mysteries and you can assist him to proclaim them, that those who are still without may be led by loving hands to that which is within. Fratres and sorores of the R.R. et A.C., I now invite you to join with me in a common act of prayer.

All face east.

We give Thee thanks, supreme and gracious God, for the manifestation of Thy light which is vouchsafed to us, for that measure of knowledge which Thou hast revealed to us concerning Thy mysteries, for those guiding hands which raise the corner of the Veil and for the firm hope of a further light beyond. Keep, we beseech Thee, this man our brother, in the justice of Thy ways, in the spirit of thy great council, that he may well and worthily direct those who have been called from the tribulation of the darkness into the light of this little kingdom of Thy love; and vouchsafe also, that going forward in love for Thee, through him and with him, they may pass from the desire of Thy house into the light of Thy presence.

2ND AD: The desire of Thy house hath eaten me up.

3RD AD: I desire to be dissolved and to be with Thee.

CH. AD: God save you, fratres et sorores. The work of the light for which we have assumed this temple has been accomplished faithfully, and the temple has received its Hierophant. By the power in me vested, I now remit it into its due place in the outer world taking with it the graces and benedictions which at this time we have been permitted to bestow thereon. And it is so remitted accordingly. In nomine Dei viventis.

2ND AD: Et vivificantis.

CH. AD: *Qui vivit et regnet in saecula saeculorum.*²⁶

3RD AD: Amen.

All adepts give L.V.X. signs, and resume their proper places in the temple. They remove rose crosses. Praemonstrator goes to the door, opens it, and says:

PRAEM: The brethren of the Outer Order will resume their places in the temple.

Done. Door closed. Chief Adept rises, and says:

CH. AD: Fratres et sorores of the Order of the Stella Matutina, behold your Hierophant, our Frater (name), who has been regularly installed and enthroned, and by the power in me vested, I proclaim him the revealer of mysteries among you for the ensuing six months, being part of that temporal period through which we are conducted into light. Very honoured frater, in the presence of the children of your temple, I call upon you to make your confession.

HIERO: (Rising) Fratres et sorores of the Order, seeing that the whole intention of the lower mysteries, or of external initiation, is by the intervention of the symbol, ceremonial, and sacrament, so to lead the soul that it may be withdrawn from the attraction of matter and delivered from the absorption therein, whereby it walks in somnambulism, knowing not whence it cometh nor whither it goeth; and seeing also, that thus withdrawn, the soul by true direction must be brought to study of divine things, that it may offer the only clean oblation and acceptable sacrifice, which is love expressed towards God, man, and the universe; now, therefore, I confess and testify thereto, from my throne in this temple, and I promise, so far as in me lies, to lead you by the rites of this Order, faithfully conserved, and exhibited with becoming reverence, that through such love and such sacrifice, you may be prepared in due time for the greater mysteries, the supreme and inward initiation.

He sits down. The installation of the lesser officers is now proceeded with.

Cloaks and lamens are arranged at the foot of the dais, ready for the server to hand them to Hierophant. The ceremony of installation follows immediately the confession of the Hierophant. The outer members are called in by Praemonstrator and Kerux sees that all have places. Hierophant reads his confession, then says:

HIERO: In virtue of the power to me committed, I proceed to invest my officers. Let the Hiereus come to the east.

Hiereus, standing in the east, is invested with the cloak by the server, who also clips the lamen in place. Hierophant holds the lamen while saying:

By the power to me committed, I ordain you Hiereus of this temple for the ensuing six months, and I pray that from your throne in the west, symbolizing the failing light, you also may lead the fratres and sorores of the Order to the full light in the end, and that you and they, in the midst of material gloom, will ever remember that the divine darkness is the same as the divine glory.

Hiereus passes to the east of the altar and takes up the sword, saying:

HIEREUS: By the password (gives it) I claim my sword.

He goes to his throne. When he is seated, Hierophant says:

HIERO: Let the Hegemon come to the east.

Hegemon is given the cloak and lamen in the same way, and Hierophant, holding the lamen, says:

By the power to me committed, I ordain you Hegemon of this temple for the ensuing six months, and I pray that from between the pillars, you may lead the fratres and sorores into the equilibrium of perfect reconciliation.

Hegemon goes to the east of the altar, takes his sceptre, and says:

HEG: By the password (gives it) I claim my sceptre. (Takes his place.)

HIERO: Let the Kerux come to the east.

Kerux and other officers to follow are served with the lamen, which Hierophant holds while addressing them.

By the power to me committed, I ordain you Kerux of this temple for the ensuing six months, to guard the inner side of the portal, and to lead all mystic processions. I pray that you may ever go before us with the torch of the higher luminaries, uttering the watchwords of the day. Thanks be to God, my brother, for the admirable light.

KERUX: By the password (gives it) I claim my lamp and wand.

HIERO: Let the Stolistes come to the east.

Stolistes and other officers to follow are served with the lamen, which Hierophant holds while addressing them.

By the power to me committed, I ordain you Stolistes of this temple for the ensuing six months, to watch over the cup of clear water, and to purify the hall, the brethren, and the candidate. May you also, in your own soul, be sprinkled with hyssop and be cleansed—may you be washed and made whiter than snow. Thanks be to God, my brother, for the living water which purifies the whole creation.

STOL: By the password (gives it) I claim my cup.

HIERO: Let the Dadouchos come to the east.

Dadouchos and other officers to follow are served with the lamen, which Hierophant holds while addressing them.

By the power to me committed, I ordain you Dadouchos of this temple for the ensuing six months, to watch over the fires of the temple and to perform the consecrations by fire. Remember the sweet odour of the greater sanctuary, and the savour of the beauty of the house. Thanks be to God, my brother, for the true incense which hallows our life.

DAD: By the password (gives it) I claim my censer.

HIERO: Let the Sentinel come to the east.

Sentinel and other officers to follow are served with the lamen, which Hierophant holds while addressing them.

By the power to me committed, I ordain you Sentinel of this temple for the ensuing six months. Be thou faithful, keep strict watch without, lest any evil enter our sacred hall.

SENT: By the password (gives it) I claim my sword.

Hierophant sits down. All are seated.

Kerux comes forward and arranges the elements properly upon the altar. The chiefs will now make any announcements.

The Hierophant can address the temple.

When he has finished, he gives one knock and Kerux comes forward to begin the closing, which is that of the Neophyte grade.

THE CONSECRATION CEREMONY OF THE VAULT OF THE ADEPTI

(To be used for a new vault and on each day of Corpus Christi.)

Members assemble and wear regalia. Three chiefs robed and seated as in opening of 5° = 6°. Door of Vault closed; Pastos remains inside Vault, but circular altar is placed in the outer chamber, in the centre. Upon the altar are the cross, cup, dagger, and chain as usual; also the crossed scourge and crook. Incense burning is also placed over letter Shin. Water is placed in the cup.

CH. AD: Associate Adeptus Minor, see that the portal of the Vault is closed and guarded. (Done.)

Chief Adept advances to altar, lifts his wand on high, and says:

Hekas, hekas, esti bebeloi! Associate Adeptus Minor, let the chamber be purified by the Lesser Banishing Ritual of the Pentagram.

Returns to place. Third Adept performs ritual with black end of wand, holding it by the white band.

Mighty Adeptus Major, let the place be purified by the Lesser Banishing Ritual of the Hexagram.

Second Adept performs this with black end of wand, holding it by the white band. He faces east, performs Qabalistic cross, tracing the four forms from right to left, and saying at each quarter, ARARITA. On completing the circle in the east, he gives the 5° = 6° signs, and the analysis of the keyword I.N.R.I.²⁷ Chief Adept again advances to the altar without his wand, taking cross from altar, goes to south, raises cross above head, and slowly circumambulates chamber with Sol, repeating:

CH. AD: And when, after all the phantoms are banished, thou shalt see that holy and formless fire, that fire which darts and flashes through the hidden depths of the universe, hear thou the voice of fire.

On reaching south, he faces south, and makes with the cross the invoking pentagram of fire, saying:

CH. AD: OIP TEAA PDOCE. In the names and letters of the great southern quadrangle, I invoke ye, ye angels of the watchtower of the south.

Replaces cross on lion. Takes cup, goes to west, sprinkles water, and circumambulates with Sol, saying:

So therefore first the priest who governeth the works of fire must sprinkle with the lustral water of the loud resounding sea.

On reaching west, he faces west, and makes the invoking pentagram of water with cup, saying:

MPH ARSL GAIOL. In the names and letters of the great western quadrangle, I invoke ye, ye angels of the watchtower of the west.

Replaces cup on eagle's head. Takes dagger and strikes forward with it; then circumambulates with Sol, repeating:

Such a fire existeth extending through the rushings of air, or even a fire formless whence cometh the image of a voice, or even a flashing light, abounding, revolving, whirling forth, crying aloud.

On reaching east, he strikes forward with dagger, makes invoking air pentagram, and repeats:

ORO IBAH AOZPI. In the names and letters of the great eastern quadrangle, I invoke ye, ye angels of the watchtower of the east.

Replaces dagger on Aquarius. Takes chain, goes to north, raises it on high, shakes thrice, circumambulates place, saying:

Stoop not down into the darkly splendid world wherein lieth continually a faithless depth, and Hades wrapped in gloom, delighting in unintelligible images, precipitous, winding—a black, ever-rolling abyss, ever espousing a body, formless, unluminous, and void.

Reaches north and facing it, shakes chain thrice and describes the invoking earth pentagram, saying:

MOR DIAL HCTGA. In the names and letters of the great northern quadrangle, I invoke ye, ye angels of the watchtower of the north.

In the names and letters of the mystical Tablet of Union, I invoke ye, ye divine forces of the spirit of life. I invoke ye, ye angels of the celestial spheres whose dwelling is in the invisible. Ye are the guardians of the gates of the universe! Be ye also the watchers of our mystic Vault. Keep far removed the evil; strengthen and inspire the initiates, that so we may preserve unsullied this abode of the mysteries of the eternal gods.

Let this place be pure and holy, so that we may enter in and become partakers of the secrets of the divine light.

He replaces incense upon Shin and resumes his place, saying:

The sun daily returning is the dispenser of light to the earth. Let us thrice complete the circle of this place, the abode of the invisible sun.
